PRIZE ARTICLE,

Written for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

The Blind Widow and her Family.

By Mrs. JULIA H. SCOTT, of Towanda, Pa.

"Is it not much that I may worship Him
With nought my spirit's breathings to control?
* * * * * Shall I not rejoice
That I have learned at last to know his voice
From man's? I will rejoice; my soaring soul
Now hath redeemed her birthright of the day,
And won through clouds to him her own unfettered way."
Mrs. Hemans' Forest Sanctuary.

It is a pleasant thing to cast, occasionally, life's little cares and perplexities aside, and let oppressed memory fill up her beautiful casket with the gem-like reminiscences of early years. She brings us the impression of many a bright form, now mouldering in earth—she recalls to us many a thrilling scene of the long, long past, whose very remembrance sends the warm blood to the heart, and we awake and look round us for the performers of those generous deeds—those high and princely acts which were, in early manhood, the themes of our admiration; forgetting the partiality of change for our fair earth's loveliest features, and that the north wind scatters not more readily the frail flowers of Summer, than does change the cherished blossoms of humanity. But they leave (thank Heaven!) their memory, and we linger with melancholy fondness upon the Christian fortitude, the self-denial, the pure, impartial benevolence, until, from these, we go back to the holy principles from whence they emanated, and lose ourselves in contemplating the religion which taught those blessed ones to gather smiles at the fountain of tears, and overcome the temptations of this world by the low-voiced spirit of pious love.

I was but a child when Mrs. Hamilton became a widow; but I was permitted to attend her husband's funeral, and can never forget the small group of darkly clad forms that clustered round his grave, nor how, with childish curiosity, I caught the hand of one of the little orphans, and gazed rudely into his face, to see if he were crying. Nor can I forget how I turned away and wept, when I saw the Widow, with clasped hands, raise her sightless eyes to heaven, and heard the deep sobbings of the eldest daughter, and son, who had led their blind mother to the grave. I wept, but with infantile selfishness; for I reflected, what if it were our own dear father who was dead, how would Charles and Harriet cry, and how bad we should all feel if our poor mother could not see. Such were the natural suggestions of simple, childish feeling; and so deeply does the pen of early impression engrave its characters on the tablets of the immortal mind, that the little scene just described, though of no particular importance to myself, shines forth to recollection as vividly as if but a yesterday's transaction, although many long years have since gone by. But to my narrative.

Mr. Hamilton married with very good prospects in life. I mean in humble life. He was the owner of a small dry goods shop in one of our Southern cities, and his well known honesty and persevering business habits, rendered it probable that he would arrive, if not at opulence, to at least respectable independence. But who, alas! may calculate on the certainty of any human event? Mr. Hamilton had the misfortune to render himself unpopular among his friends, by the open and earnest advocacy of a system of religion (Universalism) which was deemed, in those days, the root of incalculable evils, and the very kernel of heresy. This was an offence not to be tolerated, and it injured his business materially. He had, beside, one failing (for it is conceded that Universalists have some failings, although, in view of their doctrines, one would almost deem the thing impossible) which was not at all calculated to win the smiles of father Mammon; namely, a benevolence of heart, which always caused him to shed tear for tear with the unfortunate, and to open freely his purse for their relief.

Notwithstanding, however, the unpopularity and too-far-carried effects of his religion, there was little doubt of his having obtained a competency, but for the breaking out of a fire which resulted in the destruction of his shop, and nearly all its uninsured effects. This was an almost overwhelming disaster, as it reduced him to the necessity of accepting an offer of clerkship in a large mercantile establishment, the proprietor of which, a Mr. Ward, enjoyed no very enviable reputation. This man had been recently excommunicated from some Christian church, the doctrines of which he continued to advocate, long after his expulsion, for the purpose, it was said, of furthering the more easily, his dark intrigues, under the fair covering of piety. But we will leave his character to develop itself in the course of these details.

Long and faithfully had Mr. Hamilton labored in the service of "Merchant Ward," as he was called; the avails of that labor barely affording his family a subsistence, including the expense of educating his two eldest children—the first, a beautiful daughter of seventeen, and a son two years younger; when he was taken away by sudden and severe sickness from the active scenes of life, leaving his afflicted wife and five children to struggle unprotected through a cold, uncharitable world!

It was with a heavy heart that Widow Hamilton returned from the funeral to her humble home. "The one dear voice" was not there to welcome her; neither the kind hand which had often, since the development of that dreadful disease, called cataract of the eye, been extended to direct her uncertain steps. The pale mourner sank for a moment, overcome with painful emotions, but the many sweet consolations of the faith whose hopes had brightened her whole life, and sustained her husband in the hour of death, sent down their precious encouragements to her heart, and gave her peace. "Thou art not an orphan, my little James," cried she, clasping her youngest son fondly in her arms. "Neither are ye fatherless," she continued, drawing closely together her little bevy of bereaved ones, "the Father of the fatherless is yours. He watches you, and will spread his mantle of love over you, and ye shall not be hurt. He watches you, and will gather, in due time, your immortal spirits, with the whole world's purified intelligences, to bloom like sweet flowers, as it were, in his own bright garden forever! The storm of adversity, 'tis true, is gathering darkly above your heads; but remember the injunctions of the dear parent that is gone, and trust in your Saviour. Let your hearts go up to him in frequent prayer, and believe me, Oh my precious, sorrowing ones! believe me, he will bless you—he will bless you!" Oh, who could have seen the grateful tears of those affectionate children as they caught the inspiring words of their pious mother—who could have felt their young, innocent hearts beating warmly with high, devotional resolves—who could have heard their fervent aspirations to Him who once took such as themselves to his bosom, and blessed them—who could have seen and felt all this, and said, This is the spirit of Antichrist! Or, rather, who could have witnessed these things, and refrained from saying, This is the light which must ultimately dawn upon every one that cometh into the world?

The death of Mr. Hamilton, it will of course be supposed, from his extremely small income, left his family in very depressed circumstances. The expenses incurred in his sickness and burial, were considerable; and the Widow found herself under the immediate necessity of disposing of her pleasant home, and removing to miserable lodgings, in a narrow by-street, in order to save the additional cost of high rent. Here, with the assistance of her eldest son, Robert—who, at his father's decease, was taken into the establishment of Merchant Ward—the slight avails of Marian's sewing, and her own small jobs of knitting, (being the only work her afflicted situation allowed her to do,) she contrived to live; although the strictest and most ingenious economy was necessary to keep them from a state of actual pauperism. But no complaint was made, and when they were all seated around their scant evening fire—for Robert staid with them at nights—the closest observer could not have detected a single cloud upon their smiling faces, nor heard a sentence from their lips, betokening aught but the most peaceful serenity. And when the long evening's sweet and cheerful conversation was over, they all joined in singing a family hymn, which was succeeded by the low-voiced mother in prayer and thanksgiving, and the young members of that holy family sought their pillows, with the seeds of eternal life spreading beautifully their warm roots through the soul's deep avenues. But the hour of temptation was at hand, for one, at least, of their number; and wily were the snares of the enemy, laid to entrap his victim.

Merchant Ward had, during the lifetime of Mr. Hamilton, tried every art in his power to obtain the services of that excellent man in some of his dishonest schemes. He commenced by endeavoring to sap Mr. Hamilton's religious principles; thinking that, by converting him to his own partial system—by doing away the parental relationship between man and his Maker—he might destroy that love for his fellow-creatures, which had ever induced Mr. Hamilton to consider their interest as his own. But it was of no use, and of this the crafty merchant was soon convinced, and therefore changed the form of his attack. He next attempted to confound principle with interest and necessity—to erase those nice distinctions between virtue and the form thereof, and lead his victim blindfolded, as it were, into "by and forbidden paths." The practised eye of James Hamilton, however, detected all his subtleties and scorned them; as, also, his delicately managed hints at bribery; and the vexed and baffled merchant would have discarded him, but for the reflection, that he could find no one to fill his place. Of the young and inexperienced son, however, he hoped different things—and many were the guarded lectures to which the unsuspecting young man was obliged to listen, often wondering to what such things tended.

It was late one stormy evening, when, in a dark and unfrequented street, some one touched Robert's arm, and the voice of Merchant Ward sounded in his ear. "Robert," said he, "I forgot, to-day, to speak with you on a subject of some importance. But I presume 't will do just as well now, as this spot seems to be perfectly private. You recollect, I dare say, Col. Hartley's giving me a check on the Mobile Bank, a few days since, while in the store?" "I recollect, Sir," replied Robert, after a moment's musing, "seeing him sign a check; but I thought it was on a Bank in this city." "No, no, 't was Mobile. Don't you know he spoke of its permanency, and also mentioned his extensive interest in it?" "He did; but I have still an impression that the check related to a Bank here." "No doubt you have, but a moment's reflection must convince you of your mistake. 'Tis a subject of considerable consequence to me, and it will, I assure you, be greatly to your advantage to remember right—for should the matter be called in question, as report says it will, I shall depend on you to evidence the facts of the case. The thing is undoubtedly coming to your memory?"

"No, Sir," answered Robert, after some pause, "my mind is quite confused on the subject, and reflection only seems to confirm my first impression."

"Well, it is very strange," muttered the merchant, inwardly provoked to find the lad's memory so perversely pertinacious—"tis very strange you should get things so mixed up. You remember the Colonel's mentioning, particularly, the Mobile Bank—you recollect his signing the check; and I remember that said check related to said Bank. You will, therefore, I presume, have no objection to telling the good jury of the court, should one be called, that you saw Colonel Hartley give me a Mobile check, remembering, all the time, that in performing this little act of friendship, or, I might say duty, you are materially benefiting yourself."

"I will, most cheerfully, tell them all I know about it," rejoined Robert, "for I should be glad to oblige you; but I would not, for worlds, testify to a circumstance, of the truth of which I am not perfectly positive."

"Poh!" replied the merchant, "there can be no harm in it, at all—you have my word for its truth, and you have got it all yourself, except the little minutia. Beside, if that exquisite conscience of yours should ever trouble you, a priest will absolve it. Or, you may repent on Protestant principles, and be none the worse. And then," he continued in a soft, insinuating tone, (feeling the arm he had taken endeavoring to withdraw itself), "the reward you shall receive will make your family independent, and the day may come that will see you a partner in my establishment. Only think, Robert, a partner with Merchant Ward!"

Robert Hamilton was, by no means, destitute of ambition; and we will not say that his heart did not beat quicker at the thought of seeing his dear mother, and her little ones, in a more comfortable situation; or of being, himself, at some future period, in independent circumstances. But whatever his thoughts may have been, they glided by, like shadows across the dial plate, without marring the pure polish of pious virtue.

"You have certainly mistaken my character," said he, slowly, but firmly—his fine youthful form expanding into manliness, as the tide of indignant blood rushed impetuously through his swelling veins—"you have mistaken my character; for, young as I am, I have learned to love and keep my heavenly Father's commandments. And sooner shall this body be consumed by hunger—sooner shall this tongue be torn out by the roots, than it shall infringe one little hair's breadth upon the law which says, Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

"Then, may these curses fall upon thee," shouted the enraged merchant, his voice almost choked with the hoarseness of immoderate passion—"may these curses, and worse than these, fall upon thee, baser son of a base father! Ay, and they shall, if I have any influence over thy destiny. Presume not, henceforth, to set thy foot within my door, but beware. Thou hast goaded the lion and may test his strength!"

"Say, rather," said a deep voice near them, "he has disturbed the viper, and may feel his fangs."

And at that moment two human figures passed them, but slowly, as if to witness the result of the conference. The merchant turned upon his heel, without another word, and Robert hastened home to relieve the anxiety of those who, he knew, must be wondering at his long absence.

"What ails you, Robert?" said his little sister Rose, as the light fell upon his face at the door—"what ails Robert, Marian?"

"You are very pale, my brother," said Marian, laying aside her work—"I hope nothing has happened."

"Are you sick?" added the anxious voice of Mrs. Hamilton.

"No, mother, I am only a little melancholy. I have been strongly tempted to-night, and—"

"And you resisted"—half exclaimed, half inquired the Widow, hurriedly.

"Yes, mother, I did."

"Thank God! thank God!" came from the full heart of Mrs. Hamilton.

"I did resist," continued Robert, "but Heaven knows whether it may not be the ruin of us all."

"Fear not that, my beloved child," she replied, clasping her hands affectionately round his neck, "thou hast foiled thy most bitter enemy; and dearer, far dearer art thou to me, with thy pure, unspotted heart, than if thou hadst returned laden with the spoils of many conquered nations. Fear not—but trust in Him who never forsakes the innocent, and thou shalt ever find cause to rejoice!"

The circumstances of his meeting with Merchant Ward were soon related by Robert, with the exception of what had excited in his mind a suspicion of forgery. This he carefully suppressed, and after a few brief and charitable comments, the evening passed away, as if nothing had happened.

It was but a few days after this, that, as Robert was strolling through the city, hoping to find some employment, he met John Surrey, a former companion, of nearly his own age, who was living with Merchant Ward, and with whom Robert had associated on terms of affectionate intimacy.

"We were all sorry to lose you, Robert," said John, grasping his hand, "and I guess Master 'll be sorry, too, some day—and this brings me to a secret, which I want you should promise to keep for me."

"I do not like secrets, John," replied Robert, "they are very apt to make mischief."

"That is because they are not well kept. This will hurt nobody, unless it is told, and I hope you will not refuse to gratify me in so small a matter."

"Why, certainly not," rejoined the warm-hearted, unsuspecting boy, "if it can do no harm."

"You promise, then," said the other, "not to reveal what I am going to tell you?"

"I do."

"Well, then, here it is; the very eyetooth of old hardhearted Ward;" and he took from his pocket an elegant gold repeater, suspended by a chain of great value. Robert drew back with a look of painful astonishment.

"It cannot be possible, John," said he, "that you have really—really—"

"That I have really learned hocus pocus, you would say, Bob. There is nothing truer, I assure you; and Master is undoubtedly looking for it, by this time. Now, he will suspect me, in the start, and I want you to keep it for me till the fuss is over, and then you shall have half it is worth."

"Oh, foolish, ruined boy!" exclaimed Robert, "what have you done? Did you not know that a greater eye than Merchant Ward's was upon you? And that you might as well expect to escape the shaft of death, as the thunderbolt retribution of thy God? Go back to Mr. Ward, John; confess before him, and your heavenly Father, your fault; and you may yet obtain mercy. But ask not me to become a partaker in your wickedness."

"Am I an idiot, Robert," answered the boy, sullenly, "that you expect me to beg forgiveness of a man whose very creed is revenge?—But I see you are not disposed to befriend me, and I suppose I must stand or fall by myself." And starting off abruptly, he was out of sight ere Robert could renew the exhortation, which rose with redoubled tenderness to his lips.

It was on the evening succeeding this event, that a loud rap was heard at the door of Widow Hamilton, and on its being opened, two police officers entered, and seizing Robert by the arm, pronounced him their prisoner.

"And of what, gentlemen, am I accused?" asked he, eyeing them with a look of calm surprise. But how was that look changed to one of deep consternation, when, from his outer pocket, one of the officers produced the identical watch which he had seen in the hands of John Surrey! The whole truth and its fearful consequences flashed upon him at once; and turning away from them, he said, in a mournful voice, "mother, I fear it is all over with me. I am caught in the toils of the adversary, and see no chance of escape. But pray for me, dear mother; for, believe me, I am innocent." And he tore himself from the sobbing group that surrounded him, and accompanied the officers to prison. One moment gave the Widow to tears, and petitioning for Heaven's aid, but the next was for action. Counsel must be obtained; but how, alas, could it be, without that general stimulator to good deeds—money? Various plans were thought of, and rejected, till at length Marian proposed selling her harp, a present from her dear father, in his prosperous days. A sale was ultimately effected, and the services of a young and inexperienced lawyer, (the only one, however, with whom they were acquainted,) were immediately engaged.

The trial came on at an early day, and Merchant Ward and the treacherous Surrey were nearly the first to enter the court-room. The prisoner was soon called, and the spectators were surprised to behold, instead of a dark, heartless looking culprit, a lad of frank, open countenance, on which sat an expression of sweet, but melancholy resignation.

"That does not look like guilt," exclaimed one, as he passed.

"It may be but the hypocrisy of its callousness," was the reply.

The trial commenced. The evidence of the officers who arrested the prisoner, was first taken, and then arose John Surrey, who detailed very correctly the conversation had between himself and young Hamilton, a few days previous—with which the reader has been already favored—taking care, however, to put his own dark words into the mouth of poor Robert. The case seemed too clear to need any farther investigation, and when the counsel for the defendant commenced cross-examination, his extreme embarrassment showed plainly that he was convinced of his client's guilt. He had asked but two or three faint, irrelevant questions, when a stern voice, from the farther end of the room, cried, "Stop!" and a tall, manly figure strode fearlessly through the room, and after consulting the prisoner a moment, and whispering to his lawyer an emphatic "sit down!" took the latter's place.

"Tis the People's Lawyer," said an old gentleman near Robert, in reply to the question, "Who is he?"—"Tis the People's Lawyer—the best and wealthiest man in the city, and one who never pleads except when he sees oppression preying upon poverty and innocence. Merchant Ward had best look to himself; for, an old man's word for it! something is going wrong."

The People's Lawyer, as he was significantly termed, was a man aged about twenty-eight, possessed of superior beauty of person, and it was said of commanding eloquence, which was often successfully employed in the cause of the widow and orphan. He was, therefore, the fear of the oppressor, and the almost idol of the poor and honest. He was master, moreover, of a penetration of mind which, in some cases, seemed almost intuition. And as his dark eye now glanced upon the face of the witness, it seemed to read his character at once. He gazed for one long moment, sternly and fixedly upon his quailing eye and varying cheek—then raising his right hand, and pointing his forefinger at his very heart, he cried in a voice that might have startled the conscience of a Nero,—

"John Surrey—John Surrey—knowest thou not that the eye of the eternal God is upon thee? Knowest thou not that his pen hath this day written perjury against thy soul? And knowest thou not, oh, thrice miserable young man! that he will lay in thy sickening bosom the fiery coils of that worm which dieth not, but writhes, and writhes, and sends its deadly venom into all the channels of thought, and feeling, and hope, until the poor victim looks down with melancholy longing into the gloomy grave, and would give worlds for its cold serenity? Knowest thou not that peace shall visit thee no more, day nor night, forever, unless thou dost recall the dark words which thou hast this hour spoken? Look at thy victim, deluded boy! think of his affection and brotherly kindness to thee, and then tell me how thou wilt feel to see his youthful form wasting away under the cruel labor of a State's prison. Tell me how thou wilt feel to see his friends weeping over him, as one dead—ay, worse than dead—disgraced—and all for a few false words of thine. Look, young man, and tell me."

The eye of John Surrey turned involuntarily towards the prisoner's box, and his cheek grew paler, and his lip quivered; for memory was busy at his heart. He thought of the unvarying gentleness of that injured friend—of the many little sacrifices he had made for his comfort and gratification; he thought of their many sweet moments of tender intimacy, when Robert had talked to him of heaven, and called him dear brother, and his own black treachery rose in hideous contrast. He forgot Merchant Ward and his bribe—he forgot his own danger—he forgot every thing, save present injustice and former love—and rushing forward, and throwing his arms round the neck of Robert Hamilton, he sobbed out a full confession of his own and his Master's base schemes for Robert's ruin, upon his bosom. Twice did the enraged merchant rise—twice did he attempt to speak—but the eye of the People's Lawyer frowned him down, and he was glad to escape unharmed, out of court.

Who shall describe the joy of the little family of Hamiltons, on the evening of Robert's restoration to their society?

"If I could only see your benefactor, the People's Lawyer," said Marian, "I am sure I should quite worship him. And did you not find out where he lives, Robert?"

"No; in the hurry of the moment, I suppose, he forgot to mention his address. But I remember, perfectly, the few words he spoke to me, on leaving. 'Go home,' said he, 'dear, honest boy, and gladden your friends by your presence. But come to me, next week, when I shall be at home; for I would like to have further conversation with you. But, forget not, meanwhile, to return thanks to your Maker, for the happy termination of your difficulties.'"

"Noble, generous soul," exclaimed Mrs. Hamilton, "let us not forget his injunction, my children; but return thanks to Him whose hand is so plainly manifest. Let us not cease giving glory, and honor, and praise to his name, forever and ever." And her two pious children responded, fervently, "Amen."

[To be concluded in our next.]

For the Magazine and Advocate.

EPISCOPALIANISM.....NO. I. ITS ORIGIN.

In the progress of Universalism thus far, its advocates have been generally brought into contact with those denominations who have taken the widest range, and embraced the greatest portion of the community. Hence, the controversies of the denomination have, almost uniformly been, with Presbyterians, Baptists and Methodists. And to the exposure of the doctrines, policy and movements of these respective sects, much of our efforts have been directed. And that Universalists and Universalist publications have done much—very much, towards awakening and keeping alive the public attention to the church and State policy, spiritual oppression, and absurd dogmas of these sects, is undeniable.

Of late too, some attention has been paid to the progress of Popery, and to the possible dangers of its more general prevalence in the United States. Its scientific and monastic establishments are counted up, and the influence they are calculated to exert, is carefully noted and pointed out: while its encroachments upon certain territories have excited the counteracting efforts of several denominations. The voice of admonition has been lifted up, and heard in every part of our common country; and our citizens are partially excited to resist what is supposed, a common enemy. For ourselves, we think there is less to fear from Popery, than from some Protestant sects—as gross and palpable superstitions are less likely to mislead even the unthinking, than the policy that is more covert, but equally dangerous.

But while our own, and the efforts of others, have been thus directed, a denomination has existed in our midst—planted in high places, and arrogating to itself the dis-function of great liberality, but from which all the spiritual and political evils so much to be dreaded are as likely to proceed, has hitherto received no particular notice. It has spared neither wealth nor exertions, to monopolize the fellowship of the rich and the powerful, while its doctrines, discipline and worship have never, for a period of more than two hundred years, been warmed by the touch of a single coal from the altar of the reformation. It is the "Protestant Episcopal church."

While we solemnly disclaim all personal hostility to the members of that church, we still deem it a duty which we owe to the interests of Christianity and to the public, to lay before that public an epitome of facts, relating to Episcopalianism, in which every well-wisher to our institutions, and to the cause of strictly liberal Christianity is deeply interested. Thousands now bow at the altar of that church, who neither know its claims upon their homage, nor understand its pretensions to liberality. Let the ignorant be informed; let those who are misled by appearances be disabused; and equivocal pretences be unmasked.

Episcopacy, or the government of the church by bishops, is of much greater antiquity, than the Protestant Episcopal establishment of England. For though the apostles neither claimed for themselves, nor, as the New Testament abundantly shows, authorized others to do so, any authority more than presbyter or elder, their successors soon assumed particular prerogatives in certain districts, which was called a diocese, and denominated themselves bishops. This resulted in the enormous power, and unparalleled presumption of the bishops of Rome, under the general appellation of father, or pope. What we are now concerned with, is, the origin of the English, or Episcopal church.

Notwithstanding the labors of Wickliff, the reformation had been in progress sometime in Germany, before it obtained a permanent footing in England. The king, Henry VIII., was with his characteristic obstinacy, greatly opposed to the proceedings of Luther, and wrote against him with much spirit and acrimony. For this decisive evidence of his devotion to the doctrines and interests of the church of Rome, he received, and his successors have retained with the utmost care, the title of "defender of the faith." Yet it was by this sturdy monarch, that the authority of the pope was abrogated, and the "Protestant Episcopal church" established in England.

The circumstances which led to this important result, were as unpropitious as can well be imagined—while the temper with which, and the motives for which it was effected, were as incompatible with the spirit of Christianity as any other transaction in the history of this extraordinary prince. And it seems difficult to conceive of any immediate connexion between the amours and intrigues of one of the haughtiest monarchs of the sixteenth century, and the reformation of the church from its abounding corruptions. Yet this was in fact the case, as far as the establishment of the church of England is concerned.

In A. D. 1527, the king having become enamoured of Anne Boleyn, was desirous of dissolving his marriage with Catherine of Arragon, the sister of Charles V., emperor of Germany. And for this purpose he applied to the pope for permission to divorce the queen, and to marry the other. The pope appears to have been favorable to the wishes of the king; but was probably afraid of offending the emperor; and consequently, under various pretexts, delayed giving an answer for several years.

In the meantime, Cranmer, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, but then a student in the university of Cambridge, proposed to Henry, to apply to the universities for settling the question respecting the divorce of the queen. This was accordingly done; and as she was known to have been the wife of the king's brother, (on which account Henry had become very conscientious,) most of the universities decided that her marriage to the king was illegal—it being contrary to the Mosaic institution. Henry, impatient and vexed at the equivocal delays of the pope to act upon his request, took the decision of the universities as sufficient authority—divorced Catherine, and in A. D. 1533, formally married Anne Boleyn.

Catherine, now in turn appealed to the pope for redress; and being seconded by the representations and intercessions of the emperor, a decision was speedily obtained in her favor. The pope, contrary to the opinion of many of the principal universities of Europe, annulled the recent marriage of the king, declared the former to be valid, and directed him to live with Catherine.

This so exasperated the imperious Henry, that he determined on disavowing the authority of his holiness, and he accordingly procured an act of parliament, by which it was declared that England was no longer subject to the see of Rome. But lest this measure should be construed into a disposition to favor the reformation, it was declared that the Catholic faith would be preserved inviolate. And these proceedings received the sanction of the whole body of the clergy in solemn convocation. It being obviously indifferent to them so long as they must have a temporal master, whether he was a prince or a priest—whether he wore the diadem of an earthly monarch, or the triple crown of the pope.

In a short time, the rough, obstinate, and tyrannical Henry was declared by act of parliament to be "supreme head of the church of England." And this first British pope was invested with full power "to reform all heresies and abuses" in the church, and to receive "the first-fruits and tenths of all church livings," as the pope had formerly done.

But the hatred entertained by the king against the monks, added to his probable apprehensions from their influence, as they still adhered to the pope, induced him, A. D. 1536-7, to suppress the monasteries throughout the realm. But no man who attends to the general motives which plainly actuated the king—who considers his unequivocal devotion to the doctrines of Popery, can allow himself for a moment to suppose, that the suppression of the monastic establishments was owing to their corruption. This was plainly but a pretext for gratifying the king, who was well aware, that the monks were not only his enemies, but powerful enough to disturb the new order of things. Besides, many of these institutions had become odious to the people, and Henry well knew, that any severities he might practice upon the monks, would be repaid with popular favor.

In the exercise of his spiritual prerogatives, this prince was as arbitrary and uncompromising, as in other things he was headstrong and persevering. And the only real mitigation of the utmost rigors of Popery against heretics, was—that they must now be convicted of heresy, on the testimony of at least two witnesses; and should not then be put to death without the king's writ for burning heretics, (de heretico comburendo.) But the act of Richard II., which says, that "all who preach without license against the Catholic faith, should be arrested and kept in prison till they justified themselves according to the law and reason of holy church," together with the act of Henry V., which provides, that "the Lollards or Wickliffites should forfeit all the lands they had in fee simple, and all their goods and chattels to the king," were continued in full force.

The great zeal of the king to preserve the Catholic faith unimpaired and unimproved, induced him, on the publication of Tyndal's Bible in English, to put to death several of those concerned in the translation. And others were burned for denying the doctrine of the real presence (the actual body and blood of Christ) in the eucharist. And this led to a practice which has universally prevailed in the Episcopal church, from that time to the present—the practice of writing sermons. Before this time, ministers delivered their discourses extemporaneously; but advantage being taken of that circumstance, to accuse them of heresy, they adopted the practice of writing, as a measure of self-defence.

Henry VIII. died in A. D. 1547, and was succeeded by his son Edward VI., who was devoted to the interests of the reformation. During his short reign, Cranmer and others exerted themselves to regulate the affairs of the church. Hence the little of Popery which was ever expunged from the faith or forms of the church of England, was rejected at this time. Image worship, invocation of the saints, and a few other things of about equal importance, were now abolished. And forty-two articles of religion, which were soon afterwards reduced to thirty-nine, were adopted and established. These thirty-nine articles are the identical ones now used. Not a step has been taken for the reformation of a single item, notwithstanding the great advances made in biblical knowledge by many of the clergy of that church. And in defiance of the most overpowering evidence, that her wisest, best, and most learned men and ministers reject more or less of them, she still persists in maintaining a creed but one remove from Popery, through all the improvements of three hundred years.

Such is the origin of the English, or Episcopal church. And it is plain, that though it grew into being while the reformation was progressing in Germany, it was not the result of any sympathy or co-operation with the reformers. In its original structure and temper it was entirely popish, and we are principally indebted to the genius of the unfortunate Cranmer, for the few improvements by which it is now distinguished from the church of Rome. And the reader who will be at the trouble to compare the doctrines, government, and forms of the one with the other, will perceive that the Episcopal is not only a daughter, but the eldest born of the papal church.

NEW SINGING BOOK.

Br. Thomas Whittemore announces that his new Singing Book, for Universalist choirs and societies, will be published next Summer. Right glad am I to notice this announcement. Br. Whittemore is familiar with psalmody, and will undoubtedly furnish a choice selection of favorite pieces. We wish him abundant success in the enterprise.—Unit. Union.

FAITH AND HOPE.

BY REV. C. SPAR.

Much is said in the religious world about faith and hope; and from the manner in which the terms are employed, one would think that they were very similar in meaning; but though, in some instances, they may be found to unite, in others, there is a wide difference. We shall define both, showing wherein they unite, and wherein they differ.

"Faith has respect to evil as well as to good; and in this it differs from hope. Hope wishes for good only; no man hopes for afflictions or evils. Hope desires rewards only; faith expects punishments as well as rewards. Faith deters from bad conduct, through fear, no less than through desire of advantage; hope allures through promises of blessings. Faith is the full assurance or personal conviction of the reality of things not seen; it looks backward to past ages, as well as forward to futurity. Hope looks only forward."

In those who believe in the ultimate happiness of the whole human race, faith and hope are found united; and this is the only doctrine in which they ever can agree. In every other, they are at everlasting variance. Universalists believe that, in the winding up of the great drama of human existence, every being will be prepared for endless enjoyment. That which they believe, they hope for. Though there may be unnumbered systems of faith, universal happiness is the only one that man can hope will be true in all its parts.

Men may believe in annihilation; but no one can say that it is desirable that it may prove true. A large portion of community believe in endless misery; but no man, unless in a passion, can say that he hopes it will turn out to be a fact. The joys of those who believe in either of the above, are in proportion to the weakness of their faith. The joys of Universalists are in proportion to the strength of their belief. Once convince the advocates of annihilation, or endless suffering, of the truth of their respective views, and more miserable beings could not exist. Not so with Universalists; the more thoroughly we are convinced of our doctrine, the more happiness we experience. Universalism is now more generally believed than professed; Partialism is more generally professed than believed.

A few illustrations will place in a clearer light than arguments, the wide difference between faith and hope:—A merchant richly freights his vessel for a foreign port. After being a few days on her voyage, she may be wrecked, and all the men and property lost. He learns the fact, and believes it; but he cannot say he hopes it is true. The dwelling in which I reside may take fire in the night, and I awake only to hear the crackling flames and witness the destruction of my property; but I could not say, in my affliction, that I hoped it would be so. A person may be wearied and fatigued, and believe that he is about to be attacked with severe sickness; but he could not say he hoped it would turn out according to his belief. A kind and affectionate father may leave his family and go into a foreign country for business, pleasure or health. He may there sicken and die. A letter may be despatched, and the very ship that was expected to bring home the parent to his family, brings the intelligence of his death. The letter is quickly opened. The wife is in the most extreme agony of grief, and while the tears course rapidly down her cheeks, her children learn the mournful truth. All say they believe the account; but where is the wife, or where are the children that could say they hoped it was true?

Various other instances might be named, showing that faith and hope are sometimes widely apart; but the above must suffice. Human life presents to the observation and experience of every one, a great variety of such cases.

Universalists have the best hope of any sect in the whole Christian world. They enjoy the pleasure of anticipating the same blessings for others, that they expect for themselves. The heaven to which they believe they are rapidly hastening, is for the whole world. Their hope is of a purifying nature. "Every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure." All the hope there is in the doctrine of endless misery, is so much of the faith of Universalism—the rest is full of fear—and that fear is not only full of torment, but is paralyzing and most debasing in its effects on the powers and affections of its believers.

Let believers in the salvation of the world rejoice; for they have a hope that is "as an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast." It enables them to ride out the storms and tempests of life, in perfect safety; "looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of their faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

GRATITUDE.

BY MRS. WHISTON.

There is no feeling of the heart productive of so much real happiness to its possessor, as gratitude; it is a sentiment that calls into action all the better feelings of our natures; we not only feel respect and love for those who contribute to our happiness, in proportion to the benefits conferred, but are anxious to make our feelings manifest by doing something in return.

If, then, gratitude to a fellow-mortal is calculated to confer happiness, how much greater must be our felicity when brought to a realizing sense of the goodness of the Benefactor of mankind—He from whom every blessing we enjoy, emanates—whose watchful eye is ever open to protect us—whose out stretched arm is always ready to shield us from danger, and who has promised that he will finally receive us, together with the ransomed family of man, into his glorious presence, where there will be no temptations to do wrong, and where we shall be permitted, through the countless ages of eternity, to bask in the sunshine of immortal love and blessedness! And shall we not endeavor to do something to evince to our heavenly Father our sense of his untiring and never-ending goodness? But what can we, poor and dependent worms, do to enhance his glory, or add to his happiness, who is the dispenser of all happiness and the Creator of the universe? Nothing!—But we can do something to show our love for him by alleviating, as far as we are able, the condition of such of his children as are deprived of the comforts that we enjoy—by obeying his will and imitating, as far as in our power, the example set us by his Son, Jesus Christ, who was made subject, for a time, to the mortifications, sufferings, and death of this world, like unto us, that he might teach us, by his patience and resignation to the will of his Father, and love for all who bore the Creator's image, our duty in a like situation.

MINISTERIAL CONDUCT.

BY REV. G. ROGERS.

What can I do, as a Universalist minister, to be most useful?

Most useful to mankind at large, I mean, and not to a religious party merely. I have lain on my bed for many a sleepless hour, revolving this question. If I were governed by my sectarian feelings, alone—for I am something of a sectarian, I confess—I would be content with preaching my principles, forming societies, and building churches, without reference to the moral benefits to mankind therefrom resulting. But those matters are, of themselves, of but minor importance; and, indeed, of no importance at all, only as they serve as means to the great end—the moral and social improvement of the human family. Utterly unfit for a Christian minister is that man, with whom the mere diffusion of his religious principles is an end—and not simply a means to an end of much higher consequence.

Now, I aver, that the mere extension of our faith—or even a better faith, allowing such a thing to be conceivable—will not, to any great degree, improve public morals. It will tend to the removal of some prominent evils, I admit—such as priestcraft, religious intolerance, and the like—but its bearing upon morals will be scarcely perceptible, except something more is done. Is this denied? Why, then, do we find so many who entertain a firm faith in our doctrines, and are not perceptibly influenced in their general practice by that faith?

But what is that something more? This it shall be my business to point out, and in doing so, I would be understood as furnishing rules for my own guidance, as well as that of others. I do not pretend to perfection, nor to anything approaching it, I want to be useful. God knows that my object is to be publicly and extensively useful.

I. Let me never preach a doctrinal discourse, without pointing out, and insisting on, its practical applications. It will not suffice that I give a few faint and sickly hints, as to the expediency of rectitude in the walk and conversation of Universalists; nor will it suffice that I vapor about the beauties of our faith, and its adaptation to practical purposes. No; I must make plain the obligations which are due to God and man, and show that on their due discharge depend the peace and happiness of the subject, in life and death.

II. Religion is a matter of experience as well as of practice. Indeed, we cannot well reduce to practice, a religion we have never felt; and hence, my message must be addressed to the hearts of my hearers—but always through their understandings. It is our privilege to taste as well as to "see that the Lord is good;" by which it seems (as a learned divine well remarks) that the goodness of God is a matter of sensation. God is not far from every one of us, "if haply we would feel after him, and find him." As a Christian body, are we not too indifferent to experimental piety? Does not our horror of fanaticism carry us too far into the other extreme? Our love to God; is it not too closely allied to a mere abstract and philosophical admiration?

III. I must, of course, exemplify in my life the tempers, dispositions, and habits which I recommend to others. There is pith as well as quaintness in the remonstrance of the poet:—

"Good, my brother, be not as some Ungracious parsons are, who point
To men the steep and thorny way to Heaven, while they themselves the primrose
Path of dalliance tread."

How supremely contemptible is a morose, or passionate, or haughty, or intolerant minister of Jesus Christ? How even more than supremely contemptible, does the clerical office appear, in the person of an arrogant, conceited, coxcombical fop!! I insist upon it, that we ought to be examples to others in the modesty of our dress and equipage. There is a certain old book, which we profess to reverence, that contains some precepts in relation to dress, and personal bearing. Let those who doubt this, examine, and see for themselves. I confess I never felt at ease in personal equipments which were beyond the prudent reach of my means. A minister, to be sure, is required to be decent in his personal appearance—but decency is not foppery; and I agree with the poet just quoted, in thinking, that even a little rustic coarseness in the dress of a clergyman, is to be preferred before the other extreme.

"The heavenly mind may be indifferent
To its house of clay—and slight the hovel,
As beneath her care; but how a body,
So fantastic, trim, and quaint, can lodge
A heavenly mind, demands a doubt."

Let me not be understood as dictating to others upon this point, or even as approving a strict conformity to some particular pattern in the form of our apparel; my object is simply to guard against ministerial extravagance in dress and bearing, whereby our influence must necessarily be diminished.

IV. And above all, let me not encourage, by my example, an evil disposition toward those who differ from us in opinion. This curse has too long been entailed upon the Christian church, by a false religion; and if the prevalence of our faith will not remove it, then a better faith must be sought for, which will. There are various ways in which a minister may introduce amongst, and foster this evil disposition in, his people. By speaking of other denominations bitterly, or contemptuously. By putting the worst construction upon their sayings and doings. By designating them by epithets which are reproachful—as Autodox, Partialists,* and the like. Or by discouraging co-operation with them, in objects which are laudable, and of common utility. The purpose, or at least, one purpose of Christ's death, was to make of opponent religious bodies "one new man, so making peace." And wo to the minister who acts against this purpose, and by his ministrations the rather effects discord and strife, instead of harmony and reconciliation.

FINALLY. Let it be my aim, wherever I may be; whether in the pulpit, the mixed assembly, or the social circle; to leave an impression behind me favorable to religion; to encourage a devotional spirit—of which there is, confessedly, too great a lack in our order. All serious discourse on religion is not cant; occasional prayer in the family, and the social circles, need not, of necessity, degenerate into mere matter of ceremony; bringing present the dying hour, and reviewing in its light our opinions and actions, may be designated by a better name than that of gloomy fanaticism. All things which are lawful to us are not expedient. Christ commenced his sermon on the mount without a previous audible prayer, and we might lawfully do so, too, but its manifest tendencies would show it to be inexpedient. Paul knew that the death of Christ had annulled the obligation of circumcision, yet from motives of expediency he performed that rite upon Timothy. We also know that the coming of Christ to close the Jewish dispensation, annulled the obligation of the eucharistic rite, yet if I am persuaded of its utility, (and I am decidedly,†) I will, for the utility's sake, encourage its continued observance. "All things are lawful unto me," whereby I can promote the interests of true piety in the world, or mitigate the sorrows incident to man in his pilgrimage to the grave.‡

Oh, brethren! do we not want to be useful?—to be eminently so?—so above all others? What are we doing toward this object? What public measures have we taken to this end? I would be far from recommending an ostentatious course in our endeavors at usefulness, but I do aver that it is high time, that our principles were more palpably visible, in their bearings on the moral interests of society.

* Herein do I differ from Br. Rogers. The epithet Partialist is no more a reproachful one than Universalist. I use it just in the same manner and feeling as I do the terms Presbyterian, Baptist, Moravian, etc.—i. e., to designate those who hold the faith which that name implies. Partialist, with me, signifies nothing more nor less, than a believer in the salvation of a part of mankind—a partial salvation—just as Universalist signifies a believer in a universal salvation. No term now in use, save such as Br. Rogers proscribes as "reproachful," will express all the opposers of, and disbelievers in Universalism.

† Br. Rogers' rule of action, as I understand him, is a good one. Acting on it, and believing the observance of the eucharist of very doubtful utility, I cannot observe it.

‡ The sentence is an unguarded one, and may be misunderstood by some who do not know the honesty of heart and purity of purpose of the writer. Br. R., I presume—yes, am sure—believes that no one having the love of God shed abroad in the heart and influencing the actions, can "do evil that good may come." This is impossible—for how shall we, who are dead to sin, continue any longer therein? We cannot. He who loves God will keep his commandments, and God expressly forbids the commission of evil on any account. Br. R., therefore, must mean, merely, that all means, which are not forbidden of God, are lawful to him, to be employed in doing good—not, that it is lawful to do good, even by evil means. Believing that the eucharist, baptism, and the like, are not forbidden of God—that, though not now enjoined, they may do good—he feels at liberty to use them. This is clearly his meaning, though he has not carefully expressed it, so that it could not be perverted to our injury by the uncharitable or ignorant of our opposers, or misunderstood by the young convert among ourselves. NOT RIGHT.

It is not right for persons who profess to be Universalists, to absent themselves from the house of worship, Sabbath after Sabbath; because it gives people the impression that they do not much value the "preached word."

It is not right for persons, especially young persons, to attend divine services only on Sunday afternoons; because it leads people to suspect that they are lazy, and great admirers of the song, "A little more sleep, a little more slumber." W. R.

UTICA, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1836.

INAUGURAL.

TO THE PUBLIC.—Though arrived at a period to which we have been looking forward, and for which we have been preparing, for several busy months, yet the mingling sensations it excites in us, are, after all, as unusual and indescribable as if it had fallen down upon us, unexpectedly, from the skies. Will we succeed?—will we fail?—these are the important—to us, the all-important questions that powerfully harass our minds as we push the barque of adventure from the shore. They even disturb sleep, and mingle, in many grotesque and whimsical forms, with our dreams.

Will we succeed? Hope, with her attendant joys and pleasing prospects, answers the question in the affirmative. Will we fail? Fear drives away Hope, and with her tormenting doubts and scenes of future distress, whispers (but more faintly than Hope) her affirmative. Hope allures and beckons us onward—Fear discourages, and would drive us back; but Perseverance infuses a spirit which knows no retreat. Hope lays before us the names already entered as subscribers for the new volume—Fear points to the discontinuances. Hope says, even the discontinuances are comparatively fewer than usual—Fear intimates that they may increase beyond precedent in a few weeks. Hope reads the cheering promises of many active, zealous and warm-hearted friends—Fear points to the vacancy where the encouraging promises of other friends are not. Hope suggests that they intend to act—Fear says it will probably be for another, if they do. Hope summons Vanity, in the shape of some partial friend, to tell us of the superior merits of our sheet—its extensive usefulness in the cause—the past and but partially requited labors of its now principal proprietor—and its superior claims on public patronage and support. But Fear pulls forward shrinking Diffidence to tell us, in hesitating voice and with downcast eye, of what we have left undone—our misdoings and short comings—our want of ability where means are, and our want of means where ability is. Hope turns reflection from ourselves and points confidently to the able co-Editors and correspondents, who have faithfully promised their assistance to fill our Magazine of good news with richest stores, and to make our Advocate able and eloquent indeed, in defence of the Gospel. Fear—but hence!—avaunt thou base, degrading and paralyzing faculty! Thou belongest better to the Partialist's terror-woven creed of hell, than to the Universalist's joy-inspiring faith in God! We will listen to thee no longer. Though we cannot command, we can deserve success, and the result we leave to God and to our brethren. If we should chance to fail, (though we cannot believe we shall,) it will be in a good cause, and we will fail honestly, with consciences void of offence toward God and man. If we succeed, (and what is there to prevent?) the double joy will be ours, to know that it has been by prospering a cause, to the prosperity of which we have now devoted all—and to which we will then owe our support—our reputation—our reward—as we now do, our salvation and our hope.

Thus have we laid before you a sample of the ever-varying feelings that agitate our breasts, on commencing a publishing career so weighty in responsibilities, so arduous in labors, so harassing in cares, and trials, and difficulties, as is the one now before us. We have given you, also, the determination in which these feelings invariably terminate. The feelings none can know, save those who have tried them; and their absence from the experience of our readers, may cause them to regard all we have said as the mere vaporings of affection, and nonsensical flummery. We cannot help it. The feelings are no less real—the resolution no less firm—on that account. The heart was full—custom required a salutatory or inaugural address from the new proprietors to the public, and here it is. Much good may it do the reader, for much relief has it afforded to us to let the pent-up feelings flow.

But, before we close this address, permit a few remarks to those classes of the public to whom we are under obligations—to whom we feel the strongest attachment, and with whom we shall have most to do. These are our subscribers, our correspondents, and last, not least, our agents.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Dear friends and brethren—(for dear to us must be those on whom, next to our heavenly Father, we freely cast all our dependence for support—) the first number of our publication is before you—ushered forth amid much extra business, which might well excuse it for being no better than it is. The past course of this paper must designate to you what its future course will be; and the present sheet be a pledge of our intention to improve each succeeding volume, to the full extent of your liberality in our support. No change has taken place except in the proprietorship. The same Editors—the same manager of the business department—the same correspondents, with the exception of reinforcements—and the same, or, if possible, an increased desire and determination to merit your support and approbation. You may therefore confidently expect and require all you have hitherto received—and all, additional, that has been promised. But, you will also be pleased to remember, that obligations are mutual. If we increase the merits of the paper, we look for increased support to meet the expense. If we double our diligence, we look for redoubled punctuality in those we serve. You know the terms of your subscriptions—and we look to you for their fulfilment, with the same promptness and exactitude that you require in us to fulfil our engagements. Hence we state here—once for all—that we had much rather receive one dollar and fifty cents in advance, on each subscription, than to run the risk of receiving two dollars and fifty cents, on each subscription, at the end of the year. There is not only more pleasure, but more profit, also, in the advance payment; strange as it may seem to the inexperienced. Remember this, then, and as the choice rests wholly with you, and not with us, make such a choice as will be most gratifying to yourselves. For our necessities, as well as a proper business spirit, will compel us to insist strongly, under all ordinary circumstances, on a strict compliance with the terms of subscription.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—With you we trust ever to be on the most friendly and familiar terms, as we hope you and we shall be with all our subscribers. To you do we expect to be deeply indebted. For, by your favors has this paper been aided to attain its present standing—and by your aid we hope to see it yearly more elevated, more interesting, more useful in the great cause of universal salvation. The materials you furnish will be selected from and arranged so as to preserve that harmony which is essential in a pleasing variety. In these selections we shall act with independence. We believe our position enables us best to know the taste of all our readers—the state of our whole denomination—the interests of the whole cause—and the time when an article will do most good, better than they can be known to you. And we shall act accordingly; presuming, that as no offence will be intended, none will be taken. For, after all, should we differ from you as to the merits of, the demand for, or the room to be occupied by, any of your articles, it will be but a difference of opinion; in which, as we both are fallible, either may be right, or either wrong. But while we insist that to you belongs, of right, the choice of subjects and of style—and to us the freedom of selection, rejection or delay—we beg leave to suggest that your subjects be in accordance with the objects of this paper—suitable to the times and seasons, and intended to interest, if not instruct, the reader;—that the style be pure, clear and elevated—familiar in manner, cool in temper, chaste in phraseology, and Christian in spirit. Except in very urgent and necessary cases—better delay a week or two, than write in a hurry; and better not write at all, than write wrong.

TO AGENTS.—What correspondents are to the editorial, agents are to the business department. By the first, the sheet is filled; by the latter, it is distributed and rendered useful. By the aid of correspondents, it gains a character; by that of agents, it yields a profit. On agents we are compelled greatly to rely for the gathering of subscribers and the collection of money. In doing this remember that it is for the best interests of subscribers and publishers to urge advance payments—but as the choice rests wholly with subscribers, if they prefer the other alternative, though it does not yield us as great a profit, yet you will comply. Stick to the terms. Yet, when extraordinary cases clearly require lenity to be shown, report to us for directions—or, if time presses, act as you believe we would act in the case.

As we endeavor to compensate you for your services as agents, we trust you will be exact in the performance of the duties. Keep a list of subscriber's names, and postoffices where they receive their papers—when they commenced—when they paid (this is important)—how much at each payment—transfers, removals and discontinuances, when ordered—when you remitted to us, what notes, etc. Be diligent in procuring new subscribers, retaining old ones, and collecting and remitting the dues of each at the earliest day—and notify us of the failure or bad standing of any, together with all similar matters necessary or useful for us to know. In this manner our accounts will always be in good order, and we can settle with either of you, or any subscribers procured by you, at a moment's warning, and without fear of those vexatious mistakes of agents, that sometimes sour the minds of subscribers and occasion us the loss of their support.

Correspondents and agents—particularly where both meet in the same person—can save us much in postage, by using large sheets, which weigh less than an ounce, (sending them singly,) and compressing all their business into one part, (so that it may be torn off by us and filed,) and filling up the rest with good articles, news, etc., for publication.

To BROTHER EDITORS.—With you we have walked in time past in friendship, if not in peace, and hope thus to continue doing. We shall avoid, as far as in us lies, all occasion of offence, and earnestly strive after those things that make for peace in our Zion. Hence minor points of difference and unimportant events will often be suffered to pass by unnoticed—not out of disrespect to those who may deem them more important, but in mercy to the public. But should we ever manifest a more unpeaceful attitude, we are willing to be rebuked for it with a severity proportioned to the trifling nature of the object contended for.

In improving the character and increasing the usefulness of each others' papers, we may do much—we trust you will never refuse us the helping hand, and hope we may be enabled oftentimes to reciprocate all the favors we may need and receive. To those who have noticed our prospective coming before the public—especially those who noticed it aright, or have had the magnanimity to correct their errors, when called on, without pouting—and more especially to those who copied our proposals, and noticed our offers for prize essays, tales and poems—we tender our cordial thanks, with the hope that they will soon give us an opportunity of proving our gratitude.

FINALLY—To each and all we cordially tender the hand of good fellowship—to all we wish many happy returns of this joyous season—and for all we ardently desire that we may long, and profitably, and pleasantly sojourn here below—and when death comes, that we may unrepiningly depart hence, and be received by the great Gospel Advocate, Christ Jesus, into that Evangelical Magazine above, where fulness of joys and immortality of bliss shall be ours in the presence of our Father and our God.

A. B. GROSH,
O. HUTCHINSON.

QUESTION ANSWERED.—G. C., of New-Haven, inquires—"Does God punish any part of mankind with endless or limited punishment; or, are all, without distinction, received into heaven?" Partialist. With endless punishment. Universalist. With limited punishment. Some Universalists confine this limited punishment to this life.

REASONS.....NO. I.

FOR REJECTING THE DOCTRINE OF ENDLESS MISERY.

"Produce your cause, saith the Lord, bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob." Isaiah xli: 21.

Man is every where addressed and appealed to, both in the volumes of nature and revelation, as a reasonable being. As such he is called upon to look about him, to observe the position and rank which he holds in the scale of being, reflect on the duties he owes to himself, his fellow-beings, and the Author of his existence, and to exercise and constantly seek to improve his intellectual and moral powers; whereby he will be enabled to draw correct conclusions respecting both truth and duty.

Man is also a religious being. Wherever the race is found—in whatever external condition placed—whether in civilized or savage life; whether we contemplate him in the sage and the philosopher, learned in all the literary lore of ancient and modern science, or in the untutored child of nature, as he roams through the unbroken depths of the forest; whether on the icy mountains of Lapland, or amid the bland regions of a temperate clime, or on the burning sands of Arabia amidst the aridity of the torrid zone—man is, and has been from the first of his race, and will be till the last shall cease to breathe, a religious being. His reason teaches him that he had a beginning and must have an end, as to his earthly existence, and that every effect must have had a cause; and hence, that there must be a Being prior and superior to himself, from whom he derived his existence with all its blessings, and who is the Author of the universe with all its glories. His religious faculty, (veneration or reverence, as phrenologists would term it,) prompts him to adore and reverence that Being from whom he derived existence with all its enjoyments and blessings. Hence we say, man is both a rational and a religious being—reason and religion being essential and component parts, powers, or faculties of his nature. These two powers or faculties obviously exist in each individual of the human family possessing the faculties common to our nature. They differ in different individuals, not in nature, but in degree. In some, the intellectual and reasoning faculties (causality, comparison, etc.) are developed in a pre-eminent degree, and the religious faculty (veneration) is weak and defective. In others, the religious faculty (veneration) is very great and uniformly predominates, while the intellectual and reasoning faculties are small and feeble. In instances of the latter kind, the wildest vagaries of the imagination, the strangest and most absurd notions in theology, and the most senseless jargon of superstition, will be joyfully received and scrupulously cherished and obeyed, if they come in the garb of religion, or in any way appeal to the religious faculty or veneration of the individual. In instances of the former kind, the entire system of religion is sometimes uprooted in the soul, and its salutary influence removed from the heart, by the discovery of some absurdity or inconsistency in the system presented to them; when, perhaps, the inconsistency or the absurd dogma that occasioned the rejection of the whole, formed no essential part of the system of religion itself, but was altogether adscititious, and incorporated therewith by some half-maddened enthusiast or fanatic.

In the one case, reason turns religion out of doors that she may hold the undisputed empire of the mind, erroneously supposing that religion is inimical to her lawful claims. In the other, religion turns reason out of doors as her worst enemy, and the decided foe to her lofty aspirations of devotion and reverence. Whereas they were both designed as inmates of the same divine temple—as twin sisters, having a common origin, the Father of light, a common inheritance, the mind and affections of intelligent and dependent beings, and common duties as the handmaids of humanity, to elevate, improve and happyify our race. But truly to be pitied is the man in whose mind reason and religion are divorced. But happy indeed is that individual in whom these two faculties, reason and religion, are largely and equably developed, and properly blended, cherished, directed and improved. Happy is he who admits no religion but what is reasonable, and yields to no reason but what is consistent with religion. They are both the gift of God to man, and he requires us to venerate and obey the united voice of both. "Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord," by his inspired prophet Isaiah i: 18. And the language quoted at the head of this article, "Produce your cause, saith the Lord: bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob," is evidence that he would have us use the reason he has given us, and that he would require us to receive and believe in nothing but what is reasonable; but that we should in the language of the apostle, be able to "give to every man" that asketh us "a reason for the hope that is within us."

Mr. Locke has well remarked that "reason is to revelation what the natural eye is to the telescope." And as the telescope would be of no use to a blind man, or one without eyes, so revelation can be of no use to him who is destitute of, or who dares not use his, reason in understanding the same.

In accordance with the dictates of reason, the obligations of religion, and the injunction contained in our motto, we propose, in this and a few more numbers which will follow, to produce our cause and bring forth and present to our readers some of our "strong reasons,"

First, for rejecting the doctrine of endless misery, and Secondly, for believing and maintaining the doctrine of final universal holiness and happiness.

Time and opportunity would fail us to present all the reasons and arguments that weigh in our minds in favor of the one and against the other of these two opposite doctrines. We can only present a few of the most weighty and obvious of these reasons. They are, however, such as we believe will satisfy every intelligent and candid person who will examine them, that we have at least some reason on our side, and are not wholly destitute of religious principle.

First, then, we proceed to give our reasons for rejecting the doctrine of endless misery. We reject it,

I. Because it is useless. That a state of endless suffering for any portion of the human family is utterly useless, and can do no possible good to any being in the universe, will be manifest by considering every being and every class of beings who can by any possibility be supposed to be affected, either favorably or unfavorably, by such misery.

1. The Deity. A moment's reflection must satisfy every candid and intelligent person, that it is impossible for God to be benefited by the infliction of endless torture upon any of his creatures. He is independent and infinitely above the possibility of being benefited by this or any other event. To suppose him capable of receiving any benefit, to himself personally, by any event, would be to suppose it possible that he may hereafter come into the possession and enjoyment of something which he has never yet possessed or enjoyed, and therefore that he will receive an accession of happiness, which is now universally allowed to be infinite and perfect, and therefore incapable of increase! But if we could for a moment suppose it possible that any event whatever could really benefit, or yield an addition to the happiness of, the Deity, this event, the endless misery of his own offspring in the regions of immortal woe, ceaseless despair and eternal exclusion from his presence and from the family of the blessed, would be the very last event which could, by the remotest possibility, be supposed to produce that effect. What! God be benefited, and rendered more than infinitely happy, by the undying death, and inconceivably dreadful and endless tortures of his own children in hell! The thought itself is blasphemous! Away, then, with so dreadful an idea, so shocking an absurdity, so great a monstrosity! No being but the most malignant of imaginary and fabled infernals, could possibly derive the least pleasure for a moment, from such a spectacle—and with such, if such there were, it could be only momentary and hellish, and to be followed by the keenest of anguish. Indeed, if any being could possibly deserve such a state, it could be only such as were capable of deriving satisfaction from seeing others endure it.

PRIZE ESSAYS, TALES AND POEMS.

To secure a number of articles which would aid us in elevating the literary and Christian character of this volume, we offered, vol. vi, page 326, premiums amounting to seventy-five dollars. In due time a number of articles were received and laid before competent and impartial committees—whose names are at the service of those requiring them—who decided as follows:—

To Rev. W. E. Manley, of Clinton, (now in New-York,) twenty dollars for the best Essay on Universalism as a system of morality.

To Rev. O. Roberts, of Verona, ten dollars for the second best Essay on the same subject.

To [name yet unknown] of Oakville, M. T., two free subscriptions to this paper, for the third best Essay on the same subject.

To Mrs. J. H. Scott, of Towanda, Pa., twenty dollars for the best article, a tale, illustrating Universalism as a system of religion.

To Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers, Mass., ten dollars for the second best article, a narrative, illustrating the same subject.

To Samuel Brown, of Utica, two free subscriptions, for the third best article, an Essay on the same subject.

To Julius Manning, of Chateaugay, N. Y., five dollars, for the best poem, "The Beauties of Universalism."

To Mrs. Z. Porter, of Henderson, Jefferson county, N. Y., two free subscriptions, for the second best poem, "The Gospel Jubilee."

To Daniel Winter, Madison, Geauga county, Ohio, one free subscription, for the third best poem, "Consolation for Universalists."

Beside the above, there are a number of tales, essays, and poems, excellent in character, and but little inferior to the prize articles. Indeed, the great merit of the articles, rendered it a difficult matter for the committees to decide to their full satisfaction. Their decisions were governed by the conditions laid down in the offer. On the whole—there is every encouragement held out for the successful candidates to persevere—and for the unsuccessful ones to "try again." We hope, also, to hear frequently from the several writers, in the way of articles of a more brief, but not less excellent cast.

We are pledged, should our patronage warrant it, to offer a similar amount in premiums, for other articles, to be inserted in the latter part of the present volume. In a few months we shall be enabled to know whether we can offer this second set of premiums—perhaps in a few weeks—and shall give as early notice as possible.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

GENERAL AGENTS.

To accommodate many local agents and subscribers, who have payments to make in sums not easy to remit by mail, we have selected the following generally well known brethren, who, in addition to the duties of local agents, will please also act as the receivers of such unremittable sums. They will not supersede, but act as the aids of local agents in their vicinities—though they will also procure subscribers, collect dues, etc., wherever they may labor or travel—or, for all who (on account of familiar acquaintance, cheapness and convenience) prefer to transmit to us through their hands.

MICHIGAN.—Revs. A. H. Curtis, Adrian; and N. Stacy, Ann Arbor.

ILLINOIS.—Rev. Almon R. Gardner, Henderson, Knox county.

INDIANA.—Revs. E. B. Mann, Leavenworth; and J. Kidwell, General Agent for the Philomath Institute.

KENTUCKY.—Rev. N. Wadsworth, Greenup C. H. [He will also act for the Ohio vicinity.]

OHIO.—Rev. D. R. Biddlecom, Perrysburg; and Br. E. Singer, Cincinnati.

SOUTHERN STATES, generally.—Revs. A. Fuller, Double Branches, Pickens District, S. C.; and L. F. W. Andrews, Publisher of the Southern Evangelist, Charleston, S. C.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Rev. Jacob Myers, Petersburg; and Jacob Grosh, Marietta, both of Lancaster county; or, Eys. A. C. Thomas, 132 Chestnut-street, Philadelphia; and S. W. Fuller, same city.

CONNECTICUT.—Rev. R. O. Williams, Religious Inquirer office, Hartford.

EASTERN STATES, generally.—Marsh, Capen and Lyon, 133 Washington-street, Boston; Revs. Charles Spear, Springfield; and J. Gregory, Woburn, Mass.

ITINERATING.—Revs. L. L. Sadler, now in Ohio; and George Rogers, now in Western Pennsylvania.

NEW-YORK.—Br. P. Price, Publisher of the Union, No. 2, Chatham Square, city of New-York.—Revs. I. D. Williamson, Albany.—T. J. Whitcomb, Schenectady.—E. E. Guild, Walton, Delaware county.—W. Bullard, New-Berlin; and N. Doolittle, Oxford, Chenango county.—L. C. Browne, Bridgewater; and W. E. Manley, Clinton, (Agents for the Liberal Institute,) Oneida county.—P. Morse, Watertown, Jefferson county.—C. B. Brown, Mexico; and T. C. Eaton, Fulton, Oswego county.—K. Townsend, Victor; and E. Smith, West Bloomfield, Ontario county.—C. Hammond, Royalton Centre, Niagara county.—J. S. Flagler, Darien Centre; and A. Peck, Le Roy, Genesee county.—J. Gage, 2d, York, Livingston county.—H. Roberts, Rochester, Monroe county, (now itinerating in Canada).—R. Tomlinson, Buffalo; and Jason Lewis, Boston, Erie county.—J. E. Holmes, Westfield, Chautauque county.

These, with our local agents, Universalist clergymen and publishers in good standing, and responsible Postmasters who are willing to aid us, will certainly render it easy for nearly every subscriber to remit as his payments fall due—especially as notes of any kind at par (or nearly so) in New-York city, will be received in payment.

A CURIOUS LETTER.

On Saturday, the 19th ult., we received by mail, a letter enclosing a five dollar bank note. The following is a verbatim copy of the letter:—

"December the 15 1835

"Brs Skinner and Grosh—Sir I have now time to write T the mait is now A waighting for me To in close the mony Onely that I want you to stop my paper yours."

The superscription and postmark were as follows: "Utica State of new york County Oneida Brs Skinner December 15 Paid 10 Due 10."

We suppose the last item, "Due 10," was added at the Utica postoffice, as that was in red and the rest in black ink. But from what person and from what place the letter and money came, is beyond our limited powers to comprehend. Why the writer did not sign his name to the letter, or why the Postmaster, where it was mailed, did not put the name of his postoffice to it, is more than we can divine. If we ever find out from whom and whence it came, the person shall have credit, and the order be obeyed. D. S.

THIS NUMBER

Is sent, as a specimen, to subscribers who ordered a discontinuance at the close of last volume—to ministering brethren, (who, for a certain reason, will receive the next number, also,) to personal friends, and a few well known active Universalists, who are not subscribers—in hopes that they may be induced to subscribe—or, at least to circulate it, and procure us one or more subscribers. No more numbers (with the exception of the ministers, above named) will be forwarded, unless subscribed for, or ordered for special purposes.

DELINQUENTS, also, from whom the former Proprietor has received neither enclosures nor money for several years, will receive no more papers, after this number, until heard from.

REMEMBER!

In sending subscribers' names, give, always, the name of the post-office, the county, and the State (or Territory), where the paper is to be sent.

REMEMBER, ALSO—in sending money, ALWAYS name, in addition to the above, the volume, (or year,) on which each subscriber's payment is to be applied.

These may appear to be small matters to many; but rely upon it, that, to both the former and the present proprietors, they are very important—even the least item above named.

NORTHERN TOUR.

Br. Jacob Whitney is now on a tour to the North. He will visit some parts of Jefferson and of St. Lawrence counties, and possibly touch upon Franklin, to preach the word of life to the destitute; and will act as agent for this paper, in collecting arrearages due for past volumes, and receiving subscriptions for the present. We commend him to the friendship and confidence of our patrons and the public generally.

S., G. and H.

TO OUR CITY FRIENDS.

We shall tender this number to some of you, who are not subscribers, as a token of our best wishes that you may enjoy a "happy New Year." And, if you please, you may understand by it, that we should be happy to see your names on our subscription list. Should you be pleased to gratify us, you will inform our carrier, who will call with the second number.

G. and H.

TO AGENTS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Please circulate the specimens—collect new subscribers—regulate your lists, and report as soon as possible. We cannot regulate our edition until you report.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

PRIZE POEM,

Written for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

THE BEAUTIES OF UNIVERSALISM.

By JULIUS MANNING, of Chateaugay, N. Y.

When the last smile of day's departing beam
Sinks o'er the vale and trembles on the stream,
And spire, and cloud, and mountain height around
Are with a wreath of living glory crowned,
How seems the breath of holy worship given,
In reverential silence, up to Heaven!
Pure as that light of earth's most heavenly hour,
Steals on the soul with inspiration's power,
Devotion yields, in adoration's prayer,
The tender tints which glow and mingle there;
And, as that light hath influence still to wean
The heart from all the witchery of the scene,
And lure the spirit to the vision'd clime
To blossom thus, but undecay'd by time;
So, though religion's beauties triumph here,
Where all her grace and loveliness appear,
Her melting smiles of universal love
Lure from this scene, and lead the soul above.

Oh, deeply dark, and blasphemous, who dare
Link with her joys the tortures of despair;
Who, falsely wise and arrogantly vain,
Hail with delight interminable pain;
Who, still unmoved as the infernal shade
Which they have fancied, and, perchance, obey'd—
Chilled in the curse of unaffected pride,
Of every tenderer sympathy denied—
Where grief should strike the awed beholder dumb,
Laugh o'er the thought of agonies to come:—
And, as the cave-encompassed in their night,
Gaze out upon the blooming fields of light,
Though still they pause, in rapture, to survey
Where science beams in one unclouded day,
The midnight reign of intellectual gloom
Enshrouds their souls, as in a living tomb!

But, if one charm of heavenly light appears,
To soothe the widow's sigh and orphan's tears—
Whose power prevails to soften, and to bind
In one indissoluble union, all mankind;
Moved by whose dewy all hearts together run,
Like meeting waters mingling into one,
And every joy which Heaven on man bestows,
Beneath her culture more divinely glows;
Whose genial influence lifts the soul on high,
Calms the last pang, and makes it bliss to die,
When parting veils of sublunary gloom
Are raised, to gaze on heaven's unfading bloom,
And the full effluence of unbounded love Streams on the spirit, beckoning above—
'Tis the rich faith, whose wide embrace contains The bliss of ALL, where God almighty reigns.

What! shall the bigot's phrenzy still prevail,
And truth be crushed by error's idle tale?
Shall nations quake at the fanatic's word,
As if damnation's endless groans were heard?
And man, in worship, bow himself alone,
As at a tyrant's execrable throne?

Oh, righteous God! was man ordained to bear
Eternal wrath, and torture, and despair?
When thine omniscient hand in being wrought
This noble form of sovereignty and thought;
When he inhaled the spirit of thy breath,
Was that high soul predestined unto death?
Are these the oracles forever heard
From the pure tones of nature and thy word?
No! as the words o'er Bethlehem's hallowed ground
Waked in the strains of Heaven's symphonious sound;
When angels left the choral halls above
To chant the hymn of everlasting love;
Still are thy smiles perpetual and unchanged,
Unmarred by time—forever unestranged.

Say, can vindictive chastisement have power
To win the spirit in its erring hour?
When fear, remorse, and hopelessness conspire
To pierce the soul as with eternal fire;
When guilt hath crushed the heart, and dark despair
Reigns in triumphant horror solely there,
As the wild wretch in terror looks on high,
Shall he not curse himself and God, and die?

Deep were the woes which vengeance long had given
The dungeon-wretch, who had no hope in Heaven;
And darker yet the future seemed to weave
Her robe of misery, till he ceased to grieve,
And, strengthened still in callousness of soul,
Spurred its stern power and cursed its vain control;
Till, lured by memory's picture of the time
Unstained by guilt, and undebased by crime;
Where all the charms maternal love can yield,
Rose into pure and living light revealed;

And bright'ning faith one moment seemed to show
That guardian angel watched him here below;—
Each fond remembrance in existence leapt,
"My MOTHER!" the poor culprit cried, and wept!"

Unchanging Love! thy charms have power to win
The erring spirit from the paths of sin;
To soothe its pangs with thine assuasive balm,
And breathe upon its turbulence a calm.
Light of life's wandering! in the darkest hour,
Desponding virtue hails thy sovereign power.
When persecution's deepest terrors urge,
Ignite the torch, and lift the vengeful scourge;
Thy holy smiles, in consolation given,
Come as the rapturous harbingers of Heaven.
When nature, sunk to ruin and decay,
Shall in one wreck of chaos pass away;
When time is o'er, and undecaying bliss,
In other climes, succeeds the fall of this;
Thy gentle power, alone, his chastening rod
Shall rule, and raise the universe to God.

HISTORY.

CONSIDERED AS A STUDY FOR YOUTH.

In nothing is more time lost than in the details of history, as taught to the young; it is worse than lost; the pursuit is rendered positively injurious to social improvement. The annals of man—for by far the greater portion of the recorded duration of his race, with exceptions calculated only to give more force to the rule,—are susceptible of a very summary description, and that is, A CHRONICLE OF THE ANIMAL PROPENSITIES. Gleams of morality have occasionally shone out, like meteors in the vast obscurity; and, in very recent modern times, the light of the higher sentiments has begun to burn more steadily; but it yet serves to do little more than render visible the chaos of selfishness which still ingulfs mankind. The ancient world was enslaved by the propensities, paramount almost without mitigation. If the Greeks and Romans were justly so characterized, it cannot be said that the Egyptians and the different empires and kingdoms of Asia were any better: pride, rapacity, and cruelty internally degraded and oppressed these tribes of men; while, externally, their relations to each other, exhibit centuries of vain-glory, jealousy, injustice, fraud, violence, cruelty, slaughter, and robbery—all manifestations of animalism in its most unrestrained form of criminal energy. War waged with atrocity, ended, if not in the extermination, in the bondage of the defeated: the successive empires, as they are called, only indicate to us which tribe were for the time the strongest animals, from the epoch when the Egyptian "king of kings" subjected nameless hordes of barbarians in regions without bounds, through ages of Assyrian domination over all Asia, Babylonian ascendancy over prostrate Assyria, Persian vengeance on gorged and gilded Babylon, Macedonian on Persia,—till, later still, the Greeks found a stronger animal power yet in the talons of the Roman eagle, and the accumulated flood of human selfishness and cruelty, which had swelled as it swept along from Sesostris to Trajan, found an ocean in the breadth and depth of Roman self-aggrandizement. But, by the Creator's fiat, Justice and Mercy alone "endure for ever." Human power, founded on any lower feelings, is an audacious defiance of His laws, of which even the temporal punishment, however postponed, is sure. The instrument may be as worthless as the criminal. Babylonish brutality was as profound as Assyrian, Persian as Egyptian: enlightened morality rejects the office of weighing out a little more pride to the Ninevite, a little more cunning to the Egyptian, a little more sensuality to the Babylonian, a little less falsehood to the Persian,—they were all below the level where discrimination avails; none of them could complain of the same injustice and violence which each, when strong enough, had inflicted: propensities tugged with propensities, and the families of antiquity tore each other to pieces.

What, it may be asked, is gained, or rather how much time and morality are positively lost, in the education of youth, by minute details of such atrocities? It is quite sufficient that the student shall know that such things were, without reading volumes of circumstantial proofs of the fact. If he is to dwell upon military glory, would it not be better to present him with the devoted acts of the patriot, than the ferocities of the aggressive warrior? The heroes whom Homer has arrayed with all the splendors of his poetry, he has only exhibited as magnificent animals; and Richard of England borrowed his distinction from the king of beasts. The act of the noble Swiss who opened a path for his countrymen into the phalanx of the Austrian men-at-arms, by grasping in his embrace a number of their levelled lances, and fixing their points fast in his own bosom, is far more worthy to be remembered by the young student of history, than a hundred daring deeds of the aggressive robbers admired as the heroes of history. As hitherto written and taught, history has done much to occasion that prominence of the passion for arms in human affairs, that delight in war, with its two-fold prize of glory and plunder, which has descended even to our own times; the animal propensities still impelling nineteen-twentieths of the social concerns: hence war is popular, and martial feats yet receive the loudest acclaim, and lead to the highest honors and the richest rewards.—Simpson on Popular Education.

MARRIAGES.

In Lockport, on the 11th November, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. ELIAS RICHARDSON, to Miss LUCINDA DOUD.

In Middleport, on the 22d November, by the same, Mr. SOLOMON BIDDLEMAN, to Miss BETSEY TAYLOR.

Also, in Royalton, on the 20th December, by the same, Mr. HENRY GILBERT, to Miss MARY KAYNER.

In York Mills village, on Christmas Eve, by A. B. Grosh, Mr. STEADMAN, of Peterborough, to Miss JANE LAMPHIER, of the former place.

DEATHS.

On the 10th ult., at Collinsville, Lewis county, Miss LOUISA R. HOYT, aged 23 years. Some weeks previous to her death, Miss H. gave up all hopes of recovery, and informed the family and her friends that she should soon be called to leave them and go to the embrace of her Saviour. She therefore desired them to be prepared for the same, (for she was,) that they might in submission bow, when the mandate should come, and in sincerity say, "Thy will, O God, be done." "Death," said she, "has no terrors for me. My Saviour has assured me that he is the resurrection and the life, and this divine assurance has broke the tyrant's bands." During the remainder of her days this was her theme. "Yes" she would say, "Christ is the resurrection and the life, and as it is a truth that he was lifted up from the earth, so it is a truth that he will draw all men unto him." "Louisa," (said an amiable female friend, whose faith is yet limited by her creed,) "you will not be so willing and resigned when the summons of death shall come." But the grim messenger comes and all are invited to her chamber, where the family receive the affectionate kiss and the parting hand; while with a smile she says, "do not weep, father; do not weep for me, sisters; but be composed, for we shall all meet again."

Miss H. was beloved and respected by all who knew her. As a testimony of this, the Baptist clergyman kindly offered his house for their accommodation, which was filled with a crowded audience, who, while they mingled their tears with the mourners for the loss of a beloved child, an affectionate sister, and a virtuous friend, gave a silent and devout attention to the words of consolation as delivered from John xi: 25, 26.

* * Will the "Union" please copy?

In Royalton, on November 4, Widow RICHARDSON, aged 81 years. For many years, this aged woman enjoyed the faith of Abraham, and that confidence in the Christian religion, which mitigates the afflictions incident to all flesh. She also lived to see a large family of children, and her children's children, embrace the doctrine of a world's salvation. May God bless those that mourn, with grace and wisdom to imitate her virtues, revere her counsels, and share in that joy which supported her soul in the evening of her days, on earth.

C. H.

In Clarendon, on November 6, Mr. DODGE, aged 38 years. Mr. Dodge was a man of industrious habits, and greatly beloved as a neighbor, a citizen, and a friend. He had followed to the grave his companion, about six months previous to his death, so that only two small boys and an aged mother were present at the funeral, as relative mourners, to participate with the congregation in the consolations of Christianity.

The Blind Widow and her Family.

By Mrs. JULIA H. SCOTT, of Towanda, Pa.

"Is it not much that I may worship Him
With nought my spirit's breathings to control?"

* * * * * Shall I not rejoice
That I have learned at last to know his voice
From man's? I will rejoice; my soaring soul
Now hath redeemed her birthright of the day,
And won through clouds to him her own unfettered way."

Mrs. Hemans' Forest Sanctuary.

[Concluded from our last.]

It was while Robert was in prison, that Mrs. Hamilton received a letter from a distant relative, in the city of New-York, offering to procure a lucrative situation for her son, near him, and requesting his immediate presence. This chance was not to be neglected, and Robert accordingly set out the next morning after his release, regretting deeply, however, the necessity of leaving his mother and her family in so unprotected a situation, as also his inability to testify his deep gratitude to the People's Lawyer. It was not until after her son's departure, that Mrs. Hamilton and her daughter began to reflect upon their almost hopeless pecuniary circumstances. Robert's travelling expenses had taken nearly the last penny that remained of the money received for the harp, and they knew not where to look for more. Their quarterly rent had become due—their stock of provisions was running low—the little ones were almost destitute of clothes—it would be sometime before they could expect remittances from Robert, and, to add to their embarrassment and distress, the youngest child, a fine boy of six years, was taken ill of the disease which terminated his father's existence. The heart of the poor widow was sorely tried in these accumulating difficulties. But she forgot not to look to the true source, for comfort and assistance. Nor did she look in vain. A newspaper accidentally came into Marian's hands, containing an advertisement by a Mrs. Brownson, for some neat, original scenery paintings to grace her centre table. Marian had been acknowledged, while at school, to possess splendid talents for drawing. She therefore set immediately about the task, and her anxiety to earn something for the support of her suffering family, seemed to give her a species of inspiration. For in a short time, notwithstanding the increasing illness of little James, she had succeeded in finishing two rich and delicate pieces.

Taking advantage one evening of her sick brother's hour of sleep, she and Rose set out with beating hearts for the residence of Mrs. Brownson, into which they were admitted as soon as their errand became known.

"Send them in here," exclaimed a shrill, treble voice to the servant who announced them, "I would not go into that cold room to see West, himself."

They were accordingly ushered into a splendid drawing-room, where several young ladies and gentlemen were congregated, for the apparent purpose of abusing father Time with unmeaning prattle. The beautiful cheek of Marian became suffused with the deepest crimson, as she beheld the eye-glass of one of the young ladies, ranging itself in the direction of a faded breadth of her almost threadbare pelisse. But she conquered the feeling of shame and indignation, and walking with a calm, but respectful dignity to the table where Mrs. Brownson remained sitting, she submitted her paintings for inspection. They were soon handed from one to another, accompanied by comments, many of which seemed made without the least regard for the feelings of the humble artist.

"Well, Kitty, what do you think of them?" inquired Mrs. Brownson of her daughter, the second time.

"Why, ma," drawled out the silly girl, in a tone of affected contempt, "I think they look very much like my own first attempts."

"Then your first attempts must have been very beautiful, Miss Brownson," exclaimed a rich, manly voice, "and your mother had best, by all means, collect them immediately."

Marian could not see the speaker, for he sat in the shade; but she felt that there was balm in his words.

"Well, child," said Mrs. Brownson, in a somewhat softened tone, "what do you ask for your paintings? I suppose from your looks, that you need all they are worth, and perhaps charity should add a little more."

The color again visited Marian's pale cheek, and a tear stood in her dark, intelligent eye, but remembering that forbearance is one of the greatest of Christian virtues, she replied modestly and calmly, "I have not priced them, madam, but you may give me what you think they are worth. I wish nothing more."

"If you had only come in the day time," continued the unfeeling woman, "I could have judged better of their merits. Why in the world didn't you get here before dark? Perhaps, though, you thought some defects in your pictures might be more easily detected by thus doing."

The recollection of her poor mother, and her little brother's distressed situation—of the high hopes which had animated her on her setting out from home—and, above all, the imputation of low trickery in coming at the time she did, sent an arrow to the heart of poor Marian, and she could only falter out, "I could not leave my sick brother," ere her feelings burst forth in a torrent of irrepressible tears.

"You need not feel so bad, my dear," said Mrs. Brownson, with an awkward attempt to soothe, "but give me your name and place of residence, and I will send you the pay for these scraps in the morning."

The information was given, and Marian was glad to find herself and sister once more in the street.

"Where are you going, my pretty misses, in such a hurry?" asked a vulgar looking creature, staggering up to them. "I am just in time to be a beau for you"—and he caught hold of Marian's veil.

A loud shriek was the reply, and in the next instant a powerful arm prostrated the reeling figure upon the pavement; and a voice, which Marian thought she had heard before, begged her not to be frightened, but permit him to protect her home; an offer which she was glad to accept. The stranger bade her good night, at the threshold, and the agitated girl hastened to inform her mother of her indifferent success.

It was at an early hour, the next morning, that a gentle rap was heard at the Widow's door, and a young man of very prepossessing appearance, habited in the plain garb of a mechanic, entered, and gave Miss Hamilton a card, containing Mrs. Brownson's compliments, accompanied by a bank note of some considerable amount.

"There must be some mistake here," said Marian, "I did not expect half so much."

"But she has examined them by daylight," replied the stranger.

Marian colored to the very temples—not so much at the remembrance of the ill treatment of the preceding evening, to which the stranger's words recalled her, as at the sound of a voice which it seemed to her she had twice heard before, and which, she all at once recollected to have gone so far as to dream about. The young man perceiving her confusion, and not suspecting, probably, its cause, soon took his departure; not, however, until he had obtained permission of Mrs. Hamilton to return with an eminent physician, a friend of his, to see the sick boy, who was evidently getting worse. He soon came back with the worthy Doctor, who pronounced the child in very precarious circumstances. From this time the young stranger, whom the Doctor called Mr. Clayton, became a constant visitor at Widow Hamilton's, somewhat to the good lady's surprise. It might, be sure, be from a feeling of sympathy at their unprotected situation; or, from a humane desire to assist in taking care of the sick boy. But Marian's ever-varying cheek told that she suspected a far different story. Besides, his visits continued after little James' recovery. Ay—and long after the restoration of Mrs. Hamilton's eyes to the blessed light of heaven, by the removal of those painful cataracts, through the skill of Mr. Clayton's "eminent physician." What then could it be?

"We had almost given up looking for you this evening," said Mrs. Hamilton, as Horace Clayton seated himself between her and Marian; "and we were getting melancholy. For you have been with us so long—have ministered so kindly to us in sickness—have mingled so cheerfully in our devotions—that a day seems lost without you. Indeed you seem to fill the place of our dear Robert."

"Would to heaven! my dear madam," he replied, "that you would consider me as another 'dear Robert'—and he glanced significantly at the blushing Marian. "Must I speak plainer?" he continued, after a moment's silence—"must I tell you how very—very necessary to my happiness is the possession of this inestimable girl?" taking in his own, Marian's trembling hand.

Mrs. Hamilton looked confused. "I had not thought of this," she answered, after a long pause. "Besides, you know not what you ask. I am alone, as it were—Robert is a great way off—and how do you suppose I can think of parting with Marian, Mr. Clayton—WITH MARIAN?"

"Pardon me, my dear madam," he replied, "I was not so cruel as to think of Marian's leaving you. Indeed, I could hardly love her, if she were willing to do so, and exereixing circumstances. My desire is, that we shall all live together. My provident father made me, in early life, master of two trades, and I have no doubt but we can render ourselves a very comfortable and happy family."

The face of the Widow brightened up, but she would not consent to tax him with such a burthen, until, from repeated assurances to the contrary, and an appealing look from Marian, she concluded it to be the best way.

"But, I forget," said she, as her eye caught the heartfelt smile that played upon Marian's lip, "there may yet be an impediment to your union. I trust, Mr. Clayton, that you are perfectly acquainted with the liberality of my child's religious sentiments. Her faith, I trust, is firm, though in a proscribed religion, and you may not covet the honor of having for a wife a decided Universalist."

"This shall be no objection," replied he, gravely; "for had my prejudices against this sect been ever so great, the piety of my dear Marian would long since have done them away. No, believe me, this shall never cause difficulty."

The final arrangements were then made. The wedding was to take place in a few weeks, and Marian wrote to Robert, requesting his attendance; but he returned for answer, that he could not, possibly, leave. The ceremony was therefore performed only in the presence of the family at home, Dr. — and an invalid lady, to whom Marian had rendered many services. The morning was a beautiful one, and as Mrs. Hamilton had not been out since the recovery of her sight, Mr. Clayton proposed her accompanying him and Marian in a short drive to their "cottage home," as he romantically termed his place of residence, that they might judge of its comforts and convenience, he said, before moving.

"And may not I go to-morrow?" asked Rose.

"And I?" said Lewellyn.

"And I, too?" said little James.

"Yes, dears, you may all go to-morrow," replied Mr. Clayton, kissing them severally; and jumping into the hack, they were soon out of sight.

"You may stop here, driver," said Mr. Clayton, as they reached an almost princely residence, a short distance from town.

"And why here, Horace?" inquired Marian, looking surprised.

"Oh," said he, smiling, "your mother is fatigued by this time, and as I am on very intimate terms with the gentleman who resides here, I thought we would just take a peep into his bachelor's hall while the horses are resting." The ladies accordingly alighted.

"What a splendid situation!" exclaimed Mrs. Hamilton, gazing admiringly upon the spacious marble mansion and its highly-finished out-houses.

"Your friend must be very wealthy, Mr. Clayton."

"He is worth many thousands, madam," was the reply.

"And oh, what beautiful, beautiful scenery!" ejaculated Marian, as she looked from the porch upon the far-stretched hills and meadows, through which ran streams of silver beauty. "Mother, we are in a perfect paradise."

They soon entered an elegantly furnished parlor, where Marian found many rich paintings to admire, one of which particularly rivetted her fancy.

"Here, mother," said she, "is a beautiful likeness of our own beloved John Murray. It cannot be possible, Horace, that your friend is a Universalist?"

"He is," was the answer, "and his enemies say a very bigoted one; and if zeal is one of the symptoms of bigotry, they may say true, for he displays the most zeal in what the 'good people' term a 'bad cause' of any one I ever saw."

"Oh, how I should like to see him," said Marian.

"You shall have the privilege before long," replied Mr. Clayton, smiling at her eager enthusiasm. "But now, while your mother is giving him reverence, let us look into the next room."

It was a large library; and Marian was delighted at the array of richly bound books, which met her eye in every direction. But what was her pleasure and astonishment, to behold, in a shaded corner of the room, what proved to be a harp—ay, upon examination, the very harp she had some months before, sold, to see her brother's lawyer!

"What does this mean?" exclaimed she, almost gasping for breath—"Is this my very own, own harp? What can it mean?"

"It means, dearest," whispered Clayton, affectionately kissing her cheek, "that my sweet Marian is henceforth mistress of the place she has so flatteringly called a paradise, and that her husband, knowing he could not do too much for one so deeply loved, has purchased back her harp, that she may often be reminded of the dear father who gave it, and who is now an angel among the blest."

"Oh, this is too, too much," sobbed out the grateful girl upon his bosom. "If Robert were only here now."

"Robert is here," exclaimed a well-known voice, and in the next moment, the son and brother was in their arms. It was a bewildered looking group. Robert gazed a moment upon Mr. Clayton, then, turning to his mother and sister, begged to know what accident had brought them to the house of the "People's Lawyer?"

"The People's Lawyer!" exclaimed they in a breath.

It would be useless to attempt describing the scene which followed this announcement. It will suffice to say, that Mr. Clayton made an explanation, which showed that he was, unequivocally, "the People's Lawyer," who, having accidentally overheard the conversation between Merchant Ward and Robert, and being thereby thoroughly convinced of the honesty of the latter, determined to save him, although a stranger. He saw and admired Marian at the house of Mrs. Brownson, and determining that she should love him for himself, alone, he disguised himself, as he had often done before, in the dress of a common working man, (to which he seemed entitled, as his father had, through caprice, given him two trades,) and had succeeded in winning the heart of one, whose virtues were the effects of a doctrine dearer to him than his own life. He had written a statement of his situation, under injunctions of secrecy, to Robert's employer, and through him requested Robert's presence at his house at a given hour, on special business, "which business," said he, taking him affectionately by the hand, "is, that you should leave New-York, and make us all happy, by taking up your abode with us, where you shall have abundant opportunity of glorifying, with us, your heavenly Father, by doing good to your fellow-creatures."

"Oh, our God hath dealt very, very bountifully by us, my dear children," exclaimed Mrs. Hamilton, raising her streaming eyes to heaven, "let us not neglect to acknowledge our heartfelt gratitude at the footstool of his great mercy."

And those happy children knelt around their beloved mother, and listened to a prayer as humble, as fervent, as eloquent, as ever fell from human lips. And the pure devotion and piety, inspired by the belief of, and trust in, God's impartial, universal grace—thus tested by adversity, suffering, and temptation—continued brightly to glow, and give light to all around in the hour of prosperity, enjoyment, and triumph.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REPENTANCE.

BY REV. W. BULLARD.

Repentance, or reformation, signifies a change of views, motives, and actions—a relinquishing of what we had purposed to do, to the doing of something else—a returning from former pursuits, to the pursuing a different course. It does not necessarily denote a turning from sin to holiness, although, in general, it is so understood; because there is a repentance which needs to be repented of—called "the sorrow of the world," which "worketh death." This certainly must be a change for the worse, if not from bad to worse. And it is not unfrequently that persons are said to have repented—are supposed to have undergone a change for the better, when obviously it is but for the worse. Again, a person may purpose to do good, and turn from it to the doing of evil—and this is repentance—but of that kind which needs to be repented of.

But evangelical repentance, otherwise that which is wrought by "godly sorrow," is unto life—it is not, therefore, to be repented of. It consists simply, though emphatically, in ceasing to do evil, and in learning to do well. In order to do this, we must be made acquainted with the evil of sin, and the good resulting from a life of holiness. We must be brought to behold vice in all its naked deformity, and virtue in all its beauty and loveliness. Then we shall be led naturally and unavoidably to abhor the one, and love the other, and thus be enabled to break off from sin by righteousness, and turn unto God, and do works meet for repentance.

But I design, in this article, to speak, not so much on those points wherein we agree, as wherein we disagree with other denominations—not to speak of the nature of repentance, (about which there is little or no difference of opinion,) but of the motives to, and the object of repentance; wherein a difference of opinion seems chiefly to consist. It is the common opinion that the object of repentance is to escape deserved punishment; but we have shown in an article, published in the last volume of this paper, that punishment is absolute and unavoidable—that it can not be escaped by repentance or any other means.

I am well aware that some plausible exceptions to this position will be urged from the Scriptures; but I am equally aware that those cases, to say the least, have respect to special or national judgments—are local in their nature, and can have no bearing on the general position. Nay—it is a matter of question with me, whether the cases of national judgments ought to be considered as strictly exceptional to the doctrine of the certainty of punishment. For instance, Nineveh repented, and escaped the threatened judgment; but it required yet forty days to fill up the measure of her iniquity. Her national sin was not finished, she took timely warning, and evaded the calamity, by coming short in the desert. Again, Jesus said unto the Jews, whom he calls a "generation of vipers," "How can ye escape the damnation of hell?" As much as to say, it is impossible. And again—he said unto them, "ye shall die in your sins." He foresaw that they would not repent—that they would persist in filling up the measure of their fathers' iniquity; and that the judgment must come upon them to the uttermost. To this people, therefore, as a nation, the judgment was totally unavoidable.

But not so to individuals, who had a space left them to repent before the great cup of iniquity should be filled up; after which there should be no deliverance. Jesus says, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Some repented, and escaped; while others—the main body of the Jews—persisted in the bloody work of filling up the measure of their fathers' iniquity, and perished. Those who came out from among them—who saved themselves from that untoward generation—were not properly considered as partakers with them, in their iniquity. They escaped by avoiding the desert. They repented before the cup of iniquity was full. Thus far theirs was the sin of ignorance, which is not unto death. Had they persisted, after having been duly warned, the case would have been widely different—their sin would have been unto death; when it would have been impossible for them to have escaped. Jesus says—"if I had not come and spoken unto you, ye would not have sinned; (that is unto death;) but now you have no cloak for your sin."

"Well, then," says the reader, "if repentance will not warrant an escape from deserved punishment, what object can there be in repenting? Why are men called on to repent, and what motive is there to lead them to comply with the many exhortations to repentance, held out in the Scriptures?"

Answer.—By repentance men escape future punishment, or, rather, the continuation of punishment. By breaking off from sin, they save themselves from that punishment which they would have deserved and suffered had they continued therein. This is, however, but the negative object of repentance. As the great primary object or motive to repentance, the apostle informs us that it is the goodness, (not the wrath) of God that leads—(not drives) men to repentance. "Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." It is the joy of the heavenly kingdom (not the fear of hell) that furnishes the proper motive to repentance.

Note here, that such is the nature of that kind of repentance which God requires of sinners, that they must be led, but never can be driven unto it. And though punishment may be held up as an object to deter men from sin, and as an additional inducement to repentance, yet, to ensure this happy effect, it must be represented as reasonable and just, and be accompanied with the visible manifestations of the love and goodness of God. It must be seen to have, for its object, the good of the punished. God not only requires sinners to repent, but to repent sincerely—to feel a godly sorrow for sin. He not only requires men to obey, but to be willing and obedient—to obey cheerfully. But to drive men to repent and obey in this manner, would be impossible in the nature of things. To attempt to force the will, or make men do willingly what they, at the same time, are unwilling to do, would be a paradox.

Reader, does it require a great stretch of discernment to see that our views, in leading men to repentance and to the practice of virtue and morality, have a decided advantage over their opposite? For this, it must not be forgotten, is the chief object of these essays.

Sinner, we would have you repent, and turn to God; not because he is angry with you, for this would only drive you farther from him. Not because there is an awful endless hell awaiting you, for this would only harden you in sin, or, at best, make you a hypocrite, by leading you to profess what, in such a state of things, it would be impossible you should feel. But we would have you repent, because we know that the goodness of God, having for its object your highest happiness, imperiously demands it. We would not threaten and abuse you, but we would say as Jesus said to the adulteress, "Neither do I condemn you; go, and sin no more." We would entreat you, by every thing sacred in the love of heaven, and by a sincere desire for your own happiness, to repent of every idle word, of every vicious thought, and of every sinful deed, and turn to the practice of those virtues which lead to righteousness, peace, and joy. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity." Listen attentively to the voice—the mild and persuasive voice—of the righteous Son of God. "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest; take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and you shall find rest to your souls; for my yoke is easy and my burden is light." "And the spirit and the bride say, come. And let him that heareth, come. And let him that is athirst, come. And whosoever will, let him take the waters of life freely."

TOTAL DEPRAVITY.

Of all the absurd notions which characterize the deeds of our Partialist brethren, the doctrine of total depravity, is among the most inconsistent with reason and revelation. What! man totally depraved, and yet created in the image of God? Man a moral and accountable being, and still so totally corrupt as to be incapable of doing a good act, or thinking a good thought!! Brethren, who thus degrade the character of the noblest work of God, will you not pause and examine anew the grounds upon which you rest such assertions? If they are the immutable truth of God, a re-examination will only tend to bring them out more clearly to view; but, if they are not, you may thus be enabled to see their fallacy, and rid your minds of so ignoble an idea of our race.

The Scriptures inform us, that "God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." Now this image of the Deity—which all, I think, allow to be a moral image—is all that raises man above the brute creation, and renders him a moral and accountable being. If, therefore, this image be totally extinct, man is no longer a moral being; but a mere brute. Again, if man's nature has been totally changed, there must have been some particular time when this change took place; and it would seem that the Bible would inform us of such change. All Christians, I think, agree that the change which brought the curse upon our race, occurred when our first parents partook of the forbidden fruit; but the Scriptures say nothing about their then becoming totally depraved. All the change that is mentioned is, that, when they had eaten, "the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked." Nor can we reasonably infer any other change than that from ignorance to a knowledge of good and evil, except the guilt incurred by wrongly exercising the faculties they possessed while in a state of innocence; which could in no way change the nature of those faculties, unless we might suppose that, by going wrong once, they would be more likely to err again.

The sacred Scriptures, throughout, speak of man as a moral and accountable being, and just as we should suppose they would if he still bore the image of the Deity, but had involved himself in sin and consequent misery. They call on him for moral and holy action; to love God with all his heart, mind, and strength; to love and perform acts of justice, mercy, and righteousness. How, I ask, can beings be effectually, or even sensibly, called upon for moral action—to love God and righteousness—who are totally corrupt? As soon might we suppose that brutes would be called upon to change their nature; to take upon themselves the character of moral and accountable beings, and to love righteousness and God! For if man is incapable of doing a good act, or thinking a good thought, where is he going to begin to do or think aright? or what idea can he have of virtue or holiness? All, I trust, will admit that Adam, while in a state of innocence and purity, knew nothing of good and evil—certainly nothing of evil. Now, if he, being perfectly holy, could have no knowledge of evil, how can we suppose, that a being totally depraved can possibly have any sense of moral goodness? He is also called upon to shun and hate evil and unrighteousness; but can he hate his own nature? As well might "the Ethiopian change his skin." From these, with many other considerations, I conclude, that, instead of being totally depraved, man still bears the moral image of God, which, however much it may be obscured by sin, will eventually be washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb.

THE PEOPLE.

It is perfectly natural for people to complain, when vexed or grieved; and especially so, when there are reasons for considering the blame wholly attachable to others. And this accounts for the complaints which we make against our minister. We seldom publish any thing on such subjects, though preachers are almost always, either in the pulpit, or through the medium of the press, complaining of us. And now, for once, we are disposed to have a hearing, and to state our views of our side of the question before the public. We would only premise, that we have taken as much pains to have a first rate preacher, as any other society with our means; and that we will always have such a one, if he can be obtained; as we wish our meeting to be as respectable as any of those in our vicinity.

1. One of the first causes of complaint, is, that when we engage a minister to preach to us, he will persist in considering us under obligation to go to meeting, at all times when it is not inconvenient. And this is sometimes exceedingly vexatious, because we are not always disposed to go on these conditions. And it puts us to a great many expedients to frame apologies for our seeming neglect; and to no small chagrin and indignation, that neither our minister, nor our church-going neighbors, will ever believe that it is more difficult for us to attend meeting, than for others. Besides, we have found it in vain to urge to our parson, that we pay him well for his services—well as he likes money, he will insist upon it, that he had much rather have us come to meeting, than our money, if we stay at home. And then, if we attempt to gratify him, we must go in all weathers, and in all kinds of travelling—so that we think it is cause of complaint.

2. Another cause of complaint, is, that we are not only expected to go to church, but also to pay the preacher. And we do not exactly see why it is not as right for him to pay us, as for us to pay him. It is true that he is quite an exemplary man; that he devotes his whole time to his profession—at least we never knew him do any thing else; that his discourses have a tendency to improve the habits of the youth, and on many occasions we do not well know how to dispense with his services. But then it costs us so much to support him. And after all, he hardly makes out to live and keep along from year to year. Besides, many of us are poor, and have but little to give, while those who are rich cannot be supposed to do every thing. So that, in order to keep along and live like others, we are sometimes obliged to give more than we know how to spare.

But this is not our only tax for religious purposes. Our minister finds a number of ways, by which he contrives to get something more from us. Not, perhaps, for his own use, but for the hundred purposes that are connected with keeping up a meeting. We must purchase stoves, lamps and chandeliers; we must fit up an orchestra with instruments, some of them very costly, and furnish music books and hymn books by the hundred; and then comes the lesser matters for ringing the bell, cleaning the house, and wood for long Winters and light for evening meetings during half the year.—And last, though not least, the interminable calls for contributions to help the poor, or the Heathen, or to aid some foreign or domestic society—so that in the course of the year, we must pay a much greater sum than we supposed. For there is no way of excusing ourselves; the minister calls for it, and our families wish it; while we feel ashamed not to be as liberal as others. These things we feel to be matters of reasonable complaint.

3. We feel that we have great reason to complain of the mode of preaching pursued by our minister. He knows that we understand the doctrines of our church as well as he does, at least those of us who have any desire to understand them, and yet, contrary to our repeated request, he will persist in sometimes preaching a doctrinal discourse. We are out of all patience with this procedure; for if the members of some other sect happen in, we feel mortified on their account, as we wish them to think that there is no important difference between us. But it seems as if our parson would always hit upon such a subject at such a time, and this makes us uneasy lest he should give offence.

And then again, when we have practical preaching, our minister makes his sermons too pointed and searching. He appears to know what we think, and to have done nothing since he came among us, but to acquaint himself with our conduct. For there is not a single circumstance with which he does not appear familiar. And he never spares either age or youth, from the tavern-haunter, down to the harmless whist-party, he is sure to give every one a portion. Now it is disagreeable to sit and hear our little offences, that no one ought to notice, belabored as if they were matters of saving consequence. It requires considerable fineness to have half the eyes in the church turned upon you, to see if you are guilty, and to keep up your head. We think that we have a right to complain of this audacious mode of procedure. What would he think, if we were to make his faults, and he has faults, the subject of public remark, instead of passing them over entirely, or only naming them to him in the most private manner? We think that such a procedure would be very likely to ruin him, and that it does not us, is evidence that our characters are better established than his.

4. But one of the most painful things of which we complain, is, not so much the way in which we are treated, as the manner in which he generally speaks of the doctrines of other sects. Whenever he names any of these, and there are quite a number in our neighborhood, he is morally certain to make their views appear ridiculous and absurd. He seems, on such occasions, to labor with a view to make us laugh at the follies, or loathe and detest the opinions of all other Christians. We presume he may be very conscientious in his opposition; but really it appears to be very unkind, uncharitable, and not very Christianlike, to fall upon the belief of so many persons with so little mercy. For ourselves, we do not see such mighty differences as he supposes—or at all events, though there is considerable, we do not feel them as he does. And we cannot help believing, that if ministers were to say less about the opinions of their neighbors, and were to preach their own with more candor and charity, instead of building up walls of partition, it would promote good feelings and kindness among men.

5. Another thing our minister is much in the practice of doing, that we think entirely wrong. It is the way in which he speaks of unbelievers. Frequently, when he talks with them, he treats them harshly, or else merely gives them an exhortation. And when he touches upon skepticism or infidelity in his sermons, though he sometimes uses the most powerful and convincing arguments, he is yet very apt to call hard names. Now there are several of these persons among us, and we presume that we know them better than he does; and we think that they would be glad to be Christians, if they knew how. This harsh treatment only drives them further from the truth. It was some extravagance uttered in preaching, or the fanaticism of some mistaken and over-zealous Christian, that made them unbelievers in the first place. And we are persuaded, that if our minister would converse kindly with them, and use such conclusive arguments as we have sometimes heard him use in the pulpit, they would be converted. Even if this should not take place, it would make them his friends; and if they did not go to church themselves, they would be willing to have their families attend, and would otherwise assist in sustaining meetings.

6. We also think that our minister errs materially respecting some of our duties. For if we grant that it is our duty to go to meeting, it cannot certainly be our duty to attend meeting every evening in the week. We dislike the practice of holding so many evening meetings. One on the Sabbath evening, and perhaps another in the course of the week during Fall and Winter, may be very proper: but when they are multiplied beyond these, they lead to pernicious consequences. The youth, instead of acquiring habits of sobriety and industry, learn to dissipate time, neglect the best opportunities for improving their minds by reading, and acquire an improper fondness for company as well as a disrelish of the quiet of home. At the same time, these numerous lectures interfere with our other duties, and greatly embarrass and perplex the business of every family.

Our minister, indeed, says, they are the very best meetings that we have. This may be so, but it is sometimes worse getting to them, than to any others. For he insists upon having them, whether it is dark or light, stormy or not; and we must go, or he will be left alone. In truth, we sometimes think, that when there are so many meetings, the object is to proselyte, rather than promote morality and good order. And with these views, we cannot well help complaining.

7. In conclusion we must say—that it is very difficult to sustain society, and preserve the institutions of Christianity in that purity which renders it so useful and comforting, without a ministry. And yet in erecting churches, paying preachers, and providing for the ordinances of worship, as well as doing many other things which grow out of the relations thus produced, we find many things both burdensome and inconvenient. And under these, we think that on the whole, we have preserved much forbearance and charity. We seldom complain, except of the incapacity of our preachers. The wise and the good among them, we respect and esteem, and rejoice in the hope that they will become more and more useful in enlightening and moralizing

TO REV. JOSIAH KEYES.

Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"Rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee." Proverbs ix: 8.

REV. SIR—You ought to be, and therefore I suppose you are, aware, that any person who writes for the press, exposes himself to criticism and review. And indeed, so it ought to be; for were it otherwise, many would be exceedingly careless as to the manner in which they write. You have thus exposed yourself. And allow me at this time to say, that I think you sometimes write very carelessly, as I trust I shall show you before leaving you. Again—when a person takes his pen to prepare a piece for the press, on some subject in which men in common are concerned, giving his views of that subject—no matter what his standing, profession, or title is, he is to be considered no more than a man giving his opinion and perhaps his evidences of his opinion, which all are entitled to reject or receive—criticise or approve—treat with silence or publicly review, as their minds and dispositions shall incline them to do.

So, it is not your office nor your profession—your title nor your power, that will save your writings from such reviews as others are disposed to subject them to.

There is a very slavish reverence paid the clergy of your denomination by the humble members of your religious societies. It is astonishing to see to what an extent those members are enslaved by the chains of "articles of faith" and of "discipline." You are in no danger of being criticised or reviewed by any of your subordinate brethren, for, notwithstanding their being in all things "free to act," the wretched beings dare not vary in word from what you, in the plenitude of your wisdom, shall see fit to advance in morals or religion; for they know the "discipline" (most holy code!) makes it the duty of an elder (yourself) "to see that every part of our discipline is enforced in his circuit." Any one at all acquainted with the extent of Arminian bondage in this republican country, well knows what would be the consequence to an humble member of your society, if he, in the honesty of his heart, should in any degree depart from the words of your mouth and pen, by way of public criticism. Trial—excommunication—charges of immorality—even in the observance of the strictest moral rectitude, would succeed the bold presumption. So if error in your church be ever exposed, it is to be done by some one out of your church, or one who is willing to be turned out. And even you—clothed with all the grace, honor, power and clerical dignity of an elder, dare not review, by way of exposing error, the writings of your superiors in power, or the generally received opinions of even your equals. A sad case, this, elder. But error must be rebuked. But do you ask who dares to approach an elder with the familiarity of an equal, and presume to charge him with being in error? That is immaterial, my friend. Let what I write speak for itself. If it is a faithful exposition, the end is answered—if not, a knowledge of its source cannot make it one. If the writer is not an Arminian, still, "believest thou" some good can "come out of Nazareth?"

In the "Western Banner" of the 19th November, 1835, you have, by the article from your pen, intended to prove the dogma of "eternal death" afforded me a very happy subject for dissection and review, as my leisure hours will confer the pleasure. I say happy subject, because it adds greatly to my pleasure of this life, to show the fallacy, in my humble manner, existing in all efforts to prove as a truth, so horrible a dogma as the one sought to be substantiated by you. What little time I have here below for conversation and interchange of opinions with my fellow-creatures, whether elders, laymen, or world's people, I wish to chat away with as much friendship as may be. So, when you have converse with me, through reading my well-intended epistles, I wish you to take off your white hat, and consider yourself as sitting beside me, your well-wisher, and both seeking to advance in a knowledge of the truth. I conceive you are in error, great error. This is evident from the fact of my writing, as I do by way of reminding you of these things. There is but little liberty in a small place. When a man is confined in his mind to the contracted limits of a man-made creed, and in his outward acts restrained to the confines of a speculative and oppressive discipline, with an officer over him, whose duty it is "to see that every part of that discipline is enforced;" he is, in my opinion, in a wretched condition—more to be pitied than envied. He can enjoy but little of the liberty of the Gospel, which "maketh free indeed."

As you consider yourself free to act, or in other words, "a free agent," (but at the same time you ought to thank God that you are not one,) I hope you will exercise that agency, so as to look freely into what I may say, and feel that I am friendly to you, and desire that you may yet see clear of the "traditions of the elders" and of the day. So, fare-yewell, seek for the truth. I will soon write you again in all amity, in review of your article in the "Banner."

AMICUS.

[During the last Fall, Br. Sadler started to visit the Southern part of Ohio—sowing the seed of divine truth as he journeyed. The first letter from him is published in the last volume, page 364, and is here referred to for the information of new subscribers, because named by himself. TOUR IN OHIO.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

I remained in Mount Vernon, the place from whence my former letter was dated, two days; and preached each evening to large and attentive audiences—many members of other denominations attended. We have in this place some warm and devoted friends, particularly Dr. Burr and lady, whose kindness and attention during my stay will ever be cherished with grateful remembrance. Dr. Burr is the individual noticed by Br. Rogers, as designing to settle a colony in Texas, where he could have all social matters arranged to his liking, and establish a miniature paradise. Whether such a state of things can exist or not, the contemplation is truly enchanting—and methinks, if his hopes are ever realized, and I survive the ravages of death, I will make one of the happy social fraternity of the blissful valley. Should the enterprise be finally abandoned, I think we may safely calculate on the permanent establishment of our cause in Mt. Vernon. The friends are efficient and energetic and the only reason why they are not now more devoted to the advancement of the doctrine we profess is, because of their prospective emigration. It is truly desirable that something should be done for the permanent establishment of the Gospel of a world's salvation, in this region. Mount Vernon is a beautiful village, the county seat of Knox county, handsomely situated in the heart of a rich and fertile portion of the State, possessing considerable water privileges, and many of the advantages of commercial trade. It has now about two thousand inhabitants, and the population is increasing. Hitherto, like many other places in Ohio, it has experienced embarrassments on account of the vast quantities of non-resident lands that lay in the vicinity, untenanted and uncultivated. But the evil being now principally overcome, the village is making rapid advances, and promises to become a place of considerable importance.

From Mt. Vernon, I pursued my journey to Sunbury, about twenty-eight miles distant, through a fine but uncultivated country, where I delivered my message in the evening to a respectable audience, who gave devout attention to the preached word; and who were not wholly strangers to an impartial Gospel. The next day, (Sunday,) I met in Berkshire, with Br. Strong, whom I had previously seen at the Convention. We held meeting together, and had a glorious and happy season. Br. Strong has made many sacrifices in behalf of our precious faith, and done much towards its advancement in the Western States. Universally beloved and esteemed, and no one having any evil thing to say of him, his influence is very widely felt. His labors have been particularly blessed in Berkshire. From apparent nothingness he has gathered a large and influential society, to whom the Lord is continually adding such as shall be saved.

The next place I visited was Delaware, the county seat of Delaware county, formerly a potent rival for the seat of Government, where I delivered two evening lectures to quite good audiences. There are but few here who avow a belief in the Abrahamic faith. This is quite a pretty village, containing a population of about fifteen hundred souls; but it is no way distinguished, except for a medicinal spring, (similar to the Avon Springs, N. Y.,) which is becoming somewhat celebrated for its healing properties. A very large building for the accommodation of visitors is being erected, and many improvements are to be made that will render this a delightful Summer retreat. Present prospects seem to indicate that this will eventually become one of the great watering places of the West.

Bending my way southerly, I called at Worthington, one of the most delightful country towns in the State, and delivered a lecture. Father C. Rogers is a resident of this place, who, for upwards of twenty years, has raised his voice in advocacy of the restitution of all things. Laboring industriously with "his own hands," he has accumulated a good share of this world's goods; and not wishing to appear burdensome to the brethren, he has uniformly preached the Gospel wherever a door was opened unto him of the Lord, irrespective of reward. The Lord mete to him his due.

My next stop was at Columbus, the capitol of the State. Here I delivered five lectures to good and respectable audiences—the last being so large that many could not obtain seats in the large court-room we occupied. Mrs. Messinger, Whitney and Davis, had been lecturing here this Fall; and the cause seems to have received a new impulse. Present prospects are truly flattering, and with a common fortune, Universalism will obtain a permanent footing in this city. We have some of the right kind of materials here, and existing circumstances promises success. This is the most important post in the State, for many considerations; and above all others, our efforts should be directed for its possession. No place could be more beautifully situated than the city of Columbus—the whole scenery is enchanting. It stands on an elevated bank of the Sciota, near the confluence of the Whetstone—both of which gently wind their way through the most rich and fertile vallies that are to be found in Ohio, and which cannot be bounded by the human vision. Spread out in a vast extended plain before the eye of the admiring spectator, and covered with vegetation in richest luxuriance, the mind is instinctively led to consider the Sciota valley, a symbol of eternity, and of the riches of heaven. Many of the buildings in Columbus are of superb structure, displaying considerable taste and architectural neatness and beauty. The national bridge which is now in a state of forwardness, will do honor to this growing and highly flourishing republic. In point of mechanism, I venture to affirm, it is not surpassed by any thing of the kind in the Union. It will long be regarded as a subject of curiosity. And then, the penitentiary which is being erected in this place, exceeds any thing of the prison kind within the circle of my acquaintance. It looks at a distance like a palace or a well fortified castle—and were we to judge from "external appearances," we might be led to suppose that happiness had taken up her abode in this apparently splendid mansion. In like manner we are sometimes led to imagine, from outward appearances, that the wicked are happy and enjoy much satisfaction and pleasure in sin. In the hour of temptation we may envy their bliss. But O! could we look into their hearts, and take cognizance of the pangs with which their bosoms are agitated, we should say with shuddering horror, "no external condition, whatever, can make the guilty mind happy."

Leaving Columbus, I journeyed to Lancaster, the chief town of Fairfield county—a handsome village, containing a population of about two thousand, who are very highly tinctured with German manners and characteristics. The doctrine of universal grace had not been preached in this place for eighteen years. Having a desire to perfect that which was lacking in their faith, I adopted means for the delivery of two lectures, which were attended by a good audience of the male sex. Females are timorous, and subjected to the slavish domination of popular opinion. And they must wait until they ascertain whether they are to be harmed or not, before they can give countenance to a supposedly newly-fangled theory. Female prejudices, too, are strong, and difficult to overcome. And were it not that the doctrine of endless misery is so abhorrent to all their better feelings and most devout aspirations, it would be an almost hopeless task to attempt their conversion from the tradition of the fathers. And were they principally to become believers in the holy doctrine we profess, (so changed would be the circumstances,) it would require a miracle to convert them, when possessing common culture, to the doctrine of endless woe. Yes, their hearts would recoil at the thought; and so repulsive to their feelings would be such sentiments, we might attempt in vain to secure their acceptance.

My next movement was for Zanesville, where I had an appointment for the Sabbath. Hitherto I had journeyed through one of the most delightful countries that can be well imagined; but now, a change comes over the scene; I have to pursue my way over one the most rugged and forbidding. Draw a line from the point where the Ohio river enters the State, to Chillicothe, and all the area lying between that and the river is uneven, full of gulfs and hills, rocks and glens; and though most of it is subject to cultivation, it affords a light soil of but little value, compared with the alluvial lands in other parts of the State. Some parts are valuable for the stone coal with which many of the hills abound. Extensive salt works lie on the banks of the Muskingum. The salt water is obtained by boring. As yet, the country is thinly inhabited, and by a comparatively poor population. Succeeding generations, by proper cultivation, may render some few towns in this tract of country, valuable for agricultural pursuits; but they can never compare with the residue of the State. I have travelled much since I entered the Gospel ministry, and have preached in many different places; but I never undertook to get up a meeting in a place where the people were so universally devoted to the goddess of popularity; and where there was so little independence exercised, as at Zanesville. On the Sabbath, though in a town containing about five thousand inhabitants, we could scarcely obtain an audience of sufficient size to warrant an attention to public exercises; but in the evening, seats could not be obtained in the large room occupied, for all who attended, such was the crowd that collected under the cover of the night. I would have delivered a course of evening lectures for their accommodation, could a house have been had; in hope that like Nicodemus, they would become more bold and interested hereafter. As no house could be obtained, I departed hence, thinking, not many mighty works could be done here, on account of unbelief.

On my way down the Muskingum, I called at McConnellsville, and preached two discourses to a goodly number of attentive hearers. We have a few choice spirits in the vicinity, and proper culture might soon gain to our cause a respectable standing in this part of the State.

From thence I proceeded to Marietta, lying at the confluence of the Muskingum with the Ohio. It is a very delightful town. The houses are thinly scattered over a large area; and surrounded with shrubbery. The village is overlooked on either side with romantic scenery, consisting of high hills, large ledges of rocks, and glens and ravines. Here, too, is one of the ancient mounds, that remains a standing monument of a people who, like the great mastadon, have become extinct; and are known in the history of the past only by these piles which their hands have reared. There are quite a number of these mounds in the State of Ohio. I visited one in Worthington, that remains unmolested in the forest, save the felling of one tree that stood on its summit. Its form is that of an ordinary coalpit, except that the top is level. It is about thirty feet high, and about forty in diameter at its summit. The trees that are standing upon it are as large as those in the surrounding forest. It is difficult to describe the sensations and emotions experienced when gazing upon this production of antiquity, and calling up conjectures concerning its origin. The mind rushes into by-gone days—fancies it beholds the people who once tenanted the soil; but are now no more—forms ideas respecting their personal appearance, their habits and modes of living. Again, it travels through succeeding generations—essays to hold converse with the dead, and marks the changes, the revolutions, and the ravages of time. It plunges into futurity, and speculates on the probable history of coming years. It holds creation in its grasp, and contemplates life, death, and eternity.

Marietta is a pleasant place for retirement. Here are to be found all the luxuries of a town, with none of its confusion and bustle. The people are mostly descendants of the New-Englanders, who emigrated to the place at an early day, and partake largely of their characteristics. We have a few friends in the place, who have a social existence; and not being favored with a Gospel ministry, their share of the ministerial fund, existing in the place, is devoted to the interest of a library, which has already swollen to seven or eight hundred volumes. If the brethren, with zeal and devotion according to their ability, would unite together for the maintenance of the cause; and persevere in their efforts, a good society might be gathered, and a stated ministry be supported. I delivered three lectures in the place, to respectable, though not large audiences; and then repaired to Belpre, a river-town, situated a few miles below. Here we have warm, devoted friends, who are instant in season and out of season, and are never wearied in well-doing. Even affliction worketh patience, and patience, hope, and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in their hearts.

They have, for many years, held weekly meetings, sung psalms, offered prayers, and read sermons—and the result has been, the gathering of quite a large church of believers—the erection of a meeting-house, and the conversion of many souls.

They have enjoyed pastoral labors to some extent hitherto, but are now destitute. May the Lord send them one who shall feed them with knowledge and with understanding. Here I met with Mrs. Jolly and Davis, who were on an itinerating tour through the country, and two more devoted and efficient brethren cannot be found in the Western world. The present prosperity of the cause in Ohio, is to be attributed, in a great measure, to the untiring exertions of these highly distinguished and popular preachers. A few more such would change the aspect of affairs in this region, in a short time. We held a meeting together in Belpre, and also at Roxbury—(an adjoining town) enjoying a pleasant interview. We also visited Parkersburgh, in Virginia, where we preached two discourses. The character of the people on the Virginia side of the river, varies considerably from that on the Ohio side. And it is not so easy getting access to their feelings, as to the eastern and northern people—owing to different habits of thinking, and a different state of society. We can, indeed, have but little hope of success in the States of Virginia and Kentucky, at present. A new order of things must first take place, before an impartial Gospel will be generally received in the love of it.

UTICA, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1836.

AWFUL TRAGEDY.....MURDER AND SUICIDE.

One of the most shocking and revolting instances of murder and suicide, that the annals of this county can furnish, occurred in Paris, near the line of Bridgewater, on Sunday morning, 27th ult. The following account of it is mostly taken from the Utica Observer, of the 29th ult., with such corrections and additions as more recent information has furnished.

Amasa S. Newberry, Esq., one of the Coroners of this county, was called on the 27th December, ult., to view the bodies of Augustus A. Babcock, Edward Varndell (or Vandal) and Sally Varndell, wife of the latter, who were found dead, on the morning of that day, in the house owned by Mr. Babcock, and occupied by Varndell, in the south-east part of the town of Paris. After a full and accurate investigation of the facts connected with this tragical catastrophe, the juries empaneled, returned verdicts in substance, that Mrs. Varndell and Mr. Babcock were wilfully murdered by Edward Varndell, who subsequently committed suicide, by cutting his own throat with a razor.

When found, Mr. Babcock was dead in his bed, the right side of his head having been beaten in, by several blows from the head of an axe, and his brains scattered about the bed and room. Mrs. Varndell was found lying on the floor, in another room, her head and face shockingly mangled by the same weapon. She was still alive, but soon after expired. The body of Varndell was in the same room with that of his wife. The razor with which he had destroyed himself, was found hanging across his hat, near his body. From the evidence, it is probable the act was committed about six o'clock in the morning, the bodies being still warm when the murder was discovered, at an hour after that time. What is singular, a young woman, about seventeen years old, slept in the same room with Varndell and his wife, and was not awakened or disturbed by the transaction. She awoke and saw Varndell and his wife lying on the floor; after going to Mr. Babcock's room for assistance, and finding that he also was dead, she gave the alarm to the neighbors.

From the evidence adduced on the inquest, there can remain little doubt that the cause of this horrid act, on the part of Varndell, was a causeless jealousy entertained by him against his wife. Several conversations were testified to, by the witnesses, in which his unjust suspicions were distinctly announced; but from all the testimony, no impropriety could be discovered either in the conduct of Mrs. Varndell or Mr. Babcock. Persons who were at the house the preceding evening, did not discover any thing singular in Varndell's conduct, but it appeared that, previously, he had several trifling disputes with Mr. Babcock, and that on one occasion he had declared his belief that an illicit intercourse existed between his wife and Mr. Babcock, as well as other persons in the neighborhood.

Varndell was an Englishman, aged about thirty years: his wife about twenty-five, and Mr. Babcock about twenty-two years.

Mr. Babcock was a young man of most amiable character and exemplary life, universally beloved in the circle of his acquaintance. Of his once numerous family, neither father, mother, sister, and but one brother, survive, to mourn his tragic end. This brother resides at Oswego, and is attached to the law profession.

The funeral of Mr. Babcock was attended on Wednesday, 30th ultimo, at the public house on Babcock Hill, formerly kept by his father, at which a vast concourse of people assembled, and a prayer was offered up, on the mournful occasion, and the corpse buried in the family burying-ground, about half a mile distant; after which, the procession moved to the Baptist church at Cassville, two and a half miles West, where a discourse adapted to the occasion, preceded by a prayer from Elder Eaton, was delivered to a crowded and solemn assembly, by D. Skinner, of this city, from 1 Cor. iv: 5.

The funeral of Mrs. Varndell was attended in the eastern part of the town, the same afternoon. Sermon by Elder Goodger. The body of the assassin had been, by general consent, given over to the surgeons for anatomical purposes. D. S.

UNIVERSALISTS UNSOCIAL.

There are some very excellent persons among other denominations, who have much affection for all mankind—whose feelings are Universalist in despite of a Partialist faith—and who are wounded at observing the least appearance of partial, contracted and bigoted conduct, in religious people especially. These kind souls observe that Universalists stand aloof from the religious assemblies, the prayer meetings, and monthly concerts of other sects—they never see them unite in the religious associations, the missionary, Bible, tract, Sunday school and other societies of various Christian denominations, and they feel really wounded at it—and wonder how people professing universal charity, can be so unsocial—how persons holding to universal brotherhood, can be so exclusive, or rather separate, from other denominations.

We really love these kind hearted Partialist friends, and are anxious to retain their good opinion; and therefore, as well as because self-defence is a sacred duty when character is concerned, we will endeavor fully to answer them.

1. We are, as a people, neither unsocial nor unkind in our feelings towards brethren and sisters of other denominations. Nearly all of us have many dear and valued relatives and friends among them. To the great lights of the world, who were pillars in the respective Partialist denominations, as Campbell, Whitby, Macknight, Horne, Calmet, Lowth, and numerous others, do we owe much of the information by which we have been enabled to trust in God, confidently, as "the Saviour of all men," and in Jesus, as the propitiation "for the sins of the whole world." And besides all these ties of affection and obligation, our very doctrine, as these friendly objectors truly remark, teaches us that mankind are all one family before God, and that all we are brethren and sisters.

2. We have no objection to mingle in the social circles and even religious meetings of our opposers, on our own accounts; but on theirs. We cannot freely express our views and feelings among them, as they express theirs, without giving them great offence, and inflicting deep wounds on their religious feelings. It is true—expressions of doubt and distrust of God's goodness, deprecations of his infinite wrath, and groans and fears respecting endless wo, are calculated most painfully to affect our feelings of affection and reverence for our heavenly Father—but viewing them as the sincere results of a limited and ill-instructed faith, we do not fear they will subvert our confidence and our hope. As an aged brother once remarked to me, when speaking of a similar case, we who have the light of the sun have nothing to fear from the illumination of a rush light or a candle. The lesser will not obscure the greater, nor do away the necessity of the greater. Hence, as we before remarked, if our Partialist friends can admit us, on equal and friendly terms, to their social and religious meetings, we will not refuse to attend. We can put up with their limited faith in God's goodness, if they can bear our universal faith in the same. We can so pity as to bear with their terrible and agonizing fears for man's destiny, if they can so pity as to bear with our cheering and exhilarating hopes of his final purity and bliss. As Dr. Ely justly remarked to Br. Thomas, Universalists have the advantage in courtesy (which springs from hope and charity) over their Partialist brethren. We have an end to all their torturing doubts and fears, and cheer them with rejoicing—they can only see the annihilation of our glorious hopes and consolations, and mourn over us as those who have no hope.

3. We refuse to unite, it is true, with them in their Bible, tract, missionary and similar associations—even those of us who are not opposed to such special combinations—for the same reason that our Partialist brethren refuse to unite in them with each other. That is, because they all, except the Bible society, are devoted to the interests of one or two particular denominations. Take the tract society, for instance, which professes to have most sects united in its favor. There are Presbyterians among its managers, yet the Calvinistic—the genuine Presbyterians—have a separate establishment, from whence they issue tracts materially differing, in doctrinal views, from the others. Why this establishment, if they are satisfied with the others? It has Baptists among its managers—yet the Baptists complain that their views of baptism, etc., are cunningly opposed, and have therefore established a tract press of their own. It has an Episcopalian or two among its managers—yet the body of that denomination complain of underhanded mutilations of tracts, in which allusions are made to their church, and have an establishment of their own. The Methodists have totally separated from the Arminio-Calvinistic association; and many others have always refused to unite with them. Among other charges, we do assert that their publications against us, have been the meanest, most unfair attacks ever made on our people or our faith. Surely our kind hearted friends will not ask us to assist these cowardly perverters of truth to oppose ourselves by such unfair means. Add to this, that many of their publications, put forth as truth, are tissues of falsehood, and we think it requires no anti-social feelings to keep us from uniting with them.

These objections all apply, with the same force, to the Sunday school Union; and in most cases, to the missionary and other associations. If they will remove these and other objections, and allow us our full share of influence in disposing their funds and in directing their operations, there are some of us who would unite with them—but till then, never.

The Bible society remains to be considered. We have the same objections to it as to the other combinations—that, like them, it is calculated to squander the money begged from the people, on agents and officers—to build flouring-mills, and support its friends in opulence—to break down booksellers and printers who have to furnish their own capital—and finally, that it circulates Bibles with notes and comments, in defiance of its most solemn pledge to the contrary. The headings of the chapters, which are of human addition, and contrary, in some cases, to the contents, are retained in some of the Bibles circulated by this society. An institution thus guilty of defrauding the people, and of a violation of its solemn pledge, is unworthy the support of honest, consistent religionists.

4. That there is a restraint and formality in our manner, very frequently, when thrown into the company of Partialists—and which may seem to many like exclusiveness—we freely admit, but plead the cause in justification. For years we have been strangers to kindness from our religious opposers. Even manly opposition we are strangers to. Opprobrium and sneers—reproaches and revilings have been the language of our opponents when they have deigned to speak to, with, or of us—and even, in most cases, disdainful and contemptuous silence and sour looks have been our greetings. Is it any wonder, when, by experience and analogy, we are led every moment to expect a similar course of treatment, that we should manifest coldness, formality and restraint? Could they feel otherwise, if placed in our situation?

In short, Universalists are not anti-social, except in regard to the feelings of others—or when (as phenomenologists

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CHILD TO ITS MOTHER.

I would not linger in this earthly home,
Since all that's earthly fades so soon away,
And when old age, with frosty years, has come,
Drop like a Winter flower in cold decay.

I would, while youth in all its energy
Is active, free the prisoned soul from care—
While youthful thoughts, in all their revelry,
Like op'ning rose buds, fill the genial air.

Ere young affection's first-born vows are slighted,
In peacefulness let me to dust return;
Ere love's warm hopes are prematurely blighted,
Let me depart, nor leave me here to mourn.

Softly a voiceless something whispers me,
It minds me of my dreamy thoughts of heaven,
Points to a home beyond mortality—
Beyond the bounds which God to man has given.

THE RELIGIOUS SENTIMENT.

The religious sentiment appears to be innate in man. It forms a part of his nature as truly as benevolence, or attachment; and like all our sentiments, it is stronger in some individuals than in others. Though all other living beings are strangers to it, man has in all ages exhibited it. No race of human beings have been known who had not a religion and some form of religious worship. The proof of this assertion is furnished by historians of the past, and by modern travellers. "No nation is to be found," says Seneca, "so utterly destitute of law and morals as not to believe in gods of some kind or other." The savage tribes, the barbarian hordes, nations that are but slightly advanced in social life, and those who languish in the decrepitude of civilization, all exhibit the power of this indestructible sentiment.

This religious sentiment is not only innate, but it is one of the most powerful, if not actually the most so of our nature. It triumphs over all interests, and sways and rules mankind in all ages. This is also evident from history. It has impelled men and women, the aged and the young, the savage and the civilized, to sacrifice themselves, their friends, offspring and dearest kindred, and driven nations into the most cruel and destructive wars the world has ever witnessed. It has caused people to forsake their families, their homes and country, and to exile themselves in the wilderness, or among the most savage tribes. In all ages this sentiment has led men to sacrifice their property, and to devote their time and abilities exclusively to its requirements.

This universal sentiment continually impels men to the adoration of invisible and superior powers, and to discover methods of communicating with them; to appease their anger; to seek their forgiveness, and to obtain their aid and blessing.

Hence has arisen religious worship; and the diversity of its forms, which the religious history of our race exhibits to us, and hence the innumerable objects of adoration.—Brigham's Influence of Religion upon Health.

FANATICISM A CAUSE OF INSANITY.

No other disease, probably, is increasing faster in our country than insanity, and from investigations recently made in several of the Northern States, there is reason to fear that it already prevails here to a greater extent than in any other country. This, however, is not strange, for insanity is a disease that always prevails most in countries where the people enjoy civil and religious freedom, and where all are induced, or at liberty to engage in the strife for wealth, and for the highest honors and distinctions of society. We need therefore to be exceedingly careful not to add other causes to those already existing, of this most deplorable disease. And in nothing should we be more careful, in order to avoid inducing insanity, than in powerfully exciting the minds of the young, and particularly of females, and especially on religion. In all ages, this has been one of the most fruitful sources of this disease. Dr. Burrows, on this subject, says: "Were I to allege one cause, which I thought was operating with more force than another, to increase the victims of insanity, I should pronounce, that it was the overweening zeal with which it is attempted to impress on youth the subtle distinctions of theology and an unrelenting devotion to a dubious doctrine. I have seen so many melancholy cases of young and excellently disposed persons, of respectable families, deranged, from either ill-suited or ill-timed religious communication, that I cannot avoid impugning such conduct as an infatuation, which, as long as persevered in, will be a fruitful source of moral evil. The old Romans knew human nature better; they had a law which forbade any person entering upon the sacerdotal office before the age of fifty. This was to prevent theological discussions before an age was attained when a bad effect was not to be apprehended." Other writers on this disease confirm the above statement. M. Georget says,— "Excess of religious ideas produce different shapes of madness, according to the individual's character. Superstition united with ambition, and the desire of empire, give birth to intolerant and persecuting fanaticism, to the desire of ruling in God's name, and of making converts. With the subdued spirit, outrée religion produces phobia, fear of divine chastisement, and demonomania. Finally, its singular union with amorous passions, excites extatic love of God, the Virgin, or some saint."

"Strong emotions," says Dr. Pritchard, "excited by vehement preaching, produce continually, in females and very sensitive persons, fits of hysteria, and in those who are predisposed to mania there can be no doubt that similar causes give rise to attacks of madness. Cases, indeed, are of continued occurrence which establish the fact."—[Cyclopaedia of Practical Medicine.]

Epilepsy and Convulsions.—These diseases of the nervous system are also quite prevalent, and are evidently increasing. Dr. Baillie, of London, speaking of epilepsy, says—"It has become much more frequent within the last twenty years than formerly."

They are also produced by mental agitation, as is evident from the testimony of innumerable authors who have written upon this subject. Of all the passions of the mind which produce these, probably no one is so powerful as terror. A celebrated German physician, (Locker,) says, that in six out of ten cases of epilepsy under his care, at the Hospital of St. Mark, at Vienna, the disease was occasioned by terror.

Convulsions from terror, alarm and grief, are quite common. Such cases are so numerous in medical works, that I scarcely need refer particularly to them. They will be found in most writers on nervous diseases, and numerous cases are recorded in the periodical works.—Brigham's Influence of Religion upon Health.

In Smithville, on the 30th ult., by Miles Wilcox, Esq., Mr. JOHN CANTON, of German, to Mrs. MARY EGLESTON, of the former place.

At Tully, on the 24th ult., by H. Chapin, Esq., Mr. ELIAH ROBERTS, of Pompey, to Miss ROXCY CARR, of Fabius.

DEATHS.

At Choconut, Susquehanna county, Pa., Mr. ALFRED HEALD, in the 41st year of his age. The circumstances attending his sudden death were these. He left home on Monday, December 14, in company with his wife, to transact some business—spent a comfortable day—eat an usual hearty supper, and left to return home. Feeling much oppression and cough from the high wind and cold, he called at the house of a friend, asked help into the house, and in ten minutes summed up the period of his earthly existence. The intensity of the cold caused sudden effusion into the air-cells of the lungs, and totally excluded the admission of air, by which suffocation was produced.

Mr. Heald was, and has for years been, a firm and undoubting believer in the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation. He was a kind husband, affectionate father, and a worthy member of society. C. L.

At Clinton, on the 23d ult., Mrs. MARIA S. BRYANT, aged 22 years, wife of Mr. W. Bryant, of Buffalo, and daughter of Joseph and Lucy Stebbins, of Clinton. Mrs. B. was ever distinguished for the excellence of her disposition, the benevolence of her heart, and an unassuming deportment—she enjoyed wealth without pride, and was good without ostentation. Few are remembered with more respect, or are mourned more generally and sincerely. She lived, and suffered, as becomes a Christian.

An affectionate husband, tender parents, a large circle of relatives and friends—and above all, a tender infant are called to feel the full weight of sorrow in this bereavement. But it is gratifying to know, that those most sensible of their loss, are sustained under the severe trial by the hopes of the Gospel; and dispassionately submit to the wisdom, equity and goodness of divine Providence.—Com.

In Ridgeway, on the 13th ult., Mrs. MERCY, wife of Capt. Philo Elmore, aged 44 years. Mrs. Elmore had been a Universalist about eight years, experimentally and practically. There are few Christians whose kindness and charity have been more abundantly manifest, and whose death will be more deeply regretted, than Mrs. Elmore's. She had been afflicted, for several years, with a wasting disease, which she knew would bring her down to the grave; but her confidence in the restitution of all things wasted not. Her hope remained unshaken to the last, and she died as she had lived, having a conscience void of offence, both toward God and man, and the strong assurance of a blessed immortality for all mankind. A large concourse of friends and mourners assembled on the 15th, at her funeral, to whom the writer extended the consolations of unconditional grace and salvation. C. H.

On the 8th of November, TIMOTHY POPE, Esq., of Oswegatchie, in the 64th year of his age. He was a man universally respected and eminently distinguished for industry, perseverance and enterprise in business, as well as for his moral worth and uncommon benevolence of disposition. Possessing these traits of character, he was highly useful in life—and deeply lamented at his death by all who knew him. He was also a prominent and unwavering believer in the Abrahamic faith. The circumstances of his death were peculiar. Esq. Pope was in his grist mill in Morristown, on Friday, November 6th, when a millstone burst by means of its velocity; a ponderous fragment of which struck him on the head, fracturing the skull. He lingered in an insensible state till Sunday afternoon, when he expired. He has left a wife and a numerous family of children, and a large circle of friends and acquaintances to deplore their irreparable loss. The funeral was attended on Tuesday, November 10th, where a discourse on the life, character and principles of the deceased, was delivered, by the writer, in the presence of a very numerous assembly, from Heb. xi: 4, "He being dead, yet speaketh." F. L.

At Ames, Montgomery county, on the 18th ult., after an illness of nine days, Mrs. CAROLINE, consort of Mr. John Perrigo, aged 24 years. She has left an infant son, besides numerous relatives and friends who deeply lament their loss. Although not a member of any society, yet she was a firm and unwavering believer in the restitution of all things; and was often heard to exclaim, "Lord, not my will, but thine be done!" "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."—Communicated.

NEW UNIVERSALIST HYMN BOOK.

The friends of "the restitution of all things" are hereby informed, that arrangements are now making to issue a new Universalist Hymn Book, to be published by W. QUEAL and G. W. MONTGOMERY. It will be ready for distribution by the 1st of April next, in the pocket hymn book form, and will contain about 440 pages, including articles of faith, the mode of forming a church, a few select prayers, with many original hymns. The selected hymns will be the best that we can take from a large number, characterized by piety, religious truth, moral influence, and flowing numbers. The book will be furnished with a copious index, which, in addition to the first line of each hymn, will designate the metres, so that any particular metre can be found without any difficulty. The subjects will be classified, while the book will be so arranged as to be used in connection with Streeter's Hymn Book, by those societies who have them.

The object of this publication is, to furnish the denomination with a hymn book, which shall keep pace with its literary character and improvement; and also to be furnished at a price with which no fault can be found. It will be printed on good paper, will be well bound, and will be furnished at 40 cents the single copy. A liberal discount will be made to those who purchase by the quantity.

An edition of 6000 copies will be printed; and as we become personally responsible for the payment, in order to furnish a good hymn book at a reduced price, we confidently hope and expect that our friends generally will sustain us in this useful undertaking. Our friends may soon expect directions concerning orders for the work.

WILLIAM QUEAL,
GEORGE W. MONTGOMERY.

AN ADDRESS TO THE CITIZENS OF ROYALTON, N. Y., AT THE ERECTION OF A MARBLE SLAB TO THE MEMORY OF REV. ISAAC WHITNALL, DECEASED.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

FELLOW-CITIZENS:—We have assembled here, on this occasion, under the merciful providence of our common Father, to erect this marble stone in memory of our deceased brother, whose voice is hushed in the solemn stillness of death, and whose ashes rest beneath this turf, thrown over his grave. We have come together for a purpose big with the interests of other days, and fresh with a thousand incidents of former years. The places which he has once known, he will revisit no more. The family, once joyful in his presence, happy in his society, and instructed by his counsel, is left to mourn the loss of a friend, whose memory is embalmed in the soul's undying affections. His companion, his children, his relatives and friends, will often come to this place, with a slow and trembling step, and drop the tear of sorrow over the grave of the departed. Here a thousand recollections will arise in their minds of former days, when the sunshine of domestic peace and social enjoyment shone proudly down upon the family circle, and the angel of hope held forth years of prosperous pleasure.

O how uncertain is all we value most, "in this inconstant world"! Time relieves the burden of our anxiety; and sweeps into oblivion all our earthly expectations. Before our design is matured, or our work accomplished, we lie down on the bed of death. No mortal arm can prevail against the destroyer, nor human wisdom discharge the claims of dissolving nature. Submission to its sovereign decree, resignation to its resistless power, and reconciliation to its fatal grasp, is all that remains for a vigorous mind, when lingering upon the confines of eternity.

These tombs tell us the work of death. Yea, more; they tell us of mourning friends, who have wept over the dying, and who have followed their companions, parents, children, brothers and sisters to this receptacle of mortality. They tell us, that "all flesh is as grass," that "this world is not our continuing city," and that neither riches nor poverty can save us from the inexorable doom that awaits all the living. They tell us of prostrated hopes, of buried joys, and of calculations disappointed. They remind us of our dependence on God—of that religion that illumines the darkness of the grave, and of that immortal home, where tears never flow, sorrow never rises, and death never comes.

How often has our deceased brother, to whose memory we rear these everlasting stones, visited the land of graves, and participated in the afflictions of the mourning circle! How often has he stood by the couch of the sick and the distressed, to administer the cup of consolation to afflicted humanity! How often has he exhibited to the desponding soul, "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" the exhaustless treasures of a "better country," and the fadeless beauties of a happier world! For twenty years he labored in the service of the Lord Jesus, and bore testimony to the impartial grace of our Father in heaven. For twenty years he "contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints," and braved the storm of opposition like a good soldier of Jesus Christ. To this cause he sacrificed his temporal interests, fireside enjoyment, and the favoritism of a religious world. Embarking in the promulgation of a doctrine, condemned as the vilest heresy, and whose advocates were reproached as the emissaries of satan, with only here and there a solitary friend, to encourage his heart and render him pecuniary assistance, he labored under those discouraging circumstances, which were well calculated to try his faith in "the restitution of all things." Nothing short of an unwavering confidence in God, and faith in the victorious reign of Immanuel, could have armed his soul with such fortitude and perseverance in that dark hour, when bigotry erected her cruel throne, and superstition her infernal altars, on the ruins of religious liberty and the rights of man. Nothing short of the purest devotion, and the most sincere attachment to the cause of his Master, could have sustained his soul, amid the storm of persecution and the whirlwind of wrath, that rose in merciless fury against the defenders of the cross of Christ and the unmerited grace of God. Treated as the offscourings of the earth, reproached as the abettors of the most abandoned libertinism, and charged with opening the floodgates of iniquity, by the promulgation of a doctrine that would germinate the deepest corruption in the mind, and cast its withering curse over the moral world, the early preachers of Universalism stood like an immortal phalanx, while the arrows of malignity fell harmless at their feet. No name was too contemptible, no report too false, and no policy too wicked for the depraved zeal of those times to encourage, to arrest the progress of liberal Christianity in our land. But neither the reproach of enemies, nor the intolerance of persecution, lifting her iron hand to crush the freedom of private judgment, moved the undaunted spirits of "those days that tried men's souls." To them belonged not the labor of reviling for reviling, nor of returning evil for evil. To them belonged not the work of falsehood, misrepresentation and vengeance, but peace, kindness and charity. It was theirs to return good for evil, truth for error, and mercy for wrath. It was theirs to reform the wayward, to enlighten the ignorant, to raise up the bowed down, and to comfort those that mourned. It was theirs to "preach the Gospel to every creature," to release the prisoners from the prisonhouse of deep despair, and deliver the mind from the dominion of darkness—from the curse of that enemy, bigotry, which reigned in terrible triumph over the religious world. They saw what error had done—how many minds had become hostile to the Gospel of Jesus, and relinquished all hope of a blessed hereafter—all faith in the Christian religion—how many groaned under the burden of sin and doubt, and sank down under the awful apprehension, that the Saviour would ultimately realize disappointment, and millions be doomed to a region of fire, where hope never comes, deliverance never smiles, and misery never ceases.

Such was the prospect which the moral world exhibited, when that servant of Christ, whose body rests in this land of graves, embarked on an undertaking which cost sacrifices few can estimate, for the reformation and happiness of the world. Regardless of personal ease or wealth, he entered the field full of courage and strength. With a zeal that overcame every hardship—a fortitude that triumphed over all opposition, and a devotion that scorned hypocrisy, he was enabled to finish his course with joy, and witness the dawn of a moral resurrection among mankind. Converts were multiplied; societies organized; churches erected; and laborers rewarded. He lived to see the effect of the pure Gospel on the character of thousands. He saw unkindness giving way to love; tyranny to liberty; intolerance to charity; error to truth; darkness to light; doubt to faith; vice to virtue; and sorrow to joy. He saw sadness and gloom depart from the unbeliever, and cheerfulness brood over the countenance of despair, on the assurance of those happy tidings that fell from the lips of the Anointed, and bade the world rejoice. He saw the dying lifted in heavenly transports to the throne of the Eternal, by the power of faith in the Gospel preached to Abraham, and comforted with the prospective glories of a ransomed universe. Even in the last struggle of expiring nature, he had often beheld a composure of mind, a peace of soul, and a reconciliation to God, which ought but the truth can impart to mortals in this trying moment. He had seen the weeping family circle gather around the bedside, suffused in tears, and lamenting the ravages of death. He had often been called to the house of mourning, and as often poured forth his eloquence in describing the love of God, commendation to a sinful world in the Lord Jesus, to mitigate their affliction, strengthen their faith, and heal their lacerated bosoms. How often has he followed, in the silent train, the bier of some beloved friend to the mouldering urn! There he has seen the coffin lowered into the earth's cold bosom, and heard the hollow sound of the falling clay, which has shut from human vision, features once blooming with health and beauty—features dear in the recollection of surviving friends. And, amid all the afflictions of sickness and death, it was his labor to comfort the sorrowful, by exhibiting the wisdom and mercy of Heaven, and the immortal blessedness of a future existence. Being strong in the faith of the Gospel, he could strengthen others. And we know, that what he had found to administer consolation to others on the bed of death, he also found to be a theme of rejoicing in the last moment of his earthly career. Breaking out in the ecstasy of the joyful prospect, it appeared as though his soul was on the confines of eternity. But he has gone—gone to that "bourn whence no traveller returns"—gone to that better country brought to light in the Gospel, where the sweet music of immortal lyres, the rich melody of angel voices, and the harmony of celestial strains, fill the soul with unutterable delight. There no dark cloud of adversity obscures the light of perfect peace; nor angry billows rise to disturb the quiet of eternity's vast ocean. But, though the portals of heaven have been opened to receive his departed spirit—though the grave holds possession of his earthly tabernacle, yet the living hold in grateful remembrance the services, the virtues and sufferings of a man, whose days have been devoted to the amelioration of society, and the moral improvement of mankind in knowledge and practical godliness.

To the memory of a friend and brother, who has crossed the Atlantic to enjoy the freedom of American independence; who has stemmed the tide of persecution, holding in one hand the olive branch of peace, and, in the other, the white banner of eternal love, when green-eyed malice hurled her shafts at defenceless innocence; and who has died in the cause of universal grace; we raise this monumental stone. We raise it in remembrance of his worth, his usefulness and philanthropy. Let friendship's last offering, virtue's last claim, and merit's last reward, tell the world—tell posterity—that the remains of ISAAC WHITNALL, a minister of universal reconciliation, rest in solemn stillness here. Here, let generations to come, repair, and drop the tear of gratitude on this silent grave; and here, let all be taught the end of all flesh. Let these voiceless tombs speak of death—speak of heaven, and the happiness of the resurrection world; that our affections may be weaned from earthly things, and set on things above; and above all, that we may possess and enjoy that happiness, which a firm reliance on God and the hope of immortality, only, can inspire in our hearts.

THE MINISTER.

Of all the men in this busy world, the minister is least known, and his duties and endurances are the least understood and appreciated. We may perhaps except those of the Papal hierarchy, and the English and Scotch establishments. But when the people decide who shall preach to them, as well as what compensation they will render, nothing can be more capricious than the situation of the man of their choice—nothing more arduous than the labors which he is destined to perform. And these remarks will suit the policy of nearly every sect, and the circumstances of most preachers, in the United States.

In the commencement of his ministerial labors, in addition to the natural difficulties and embarrassments of his situation, there are usually a multitude of factitious perplexities and obstructions, unaccountably placed in his way. These must be surmounted, as they constitute a kind of gauntlet which he must run to the post of usefulness. He may be learned, he may be talented, and he may also be known to be candid, modest and good; but he may still say as did Haman—all this avail me nothing. He is a young preacher, however mature in knowledge and virtue, and that circumstance is enough to undignify every thing he says or does. Societies may be destitute around him, and anxiously desirous to obtain preaching, but his services are not wanted. They want an older and more experienced preacher—when they know that such an one is not to be obtained—or if there is, that they are not in a situation to employ him. They have no possible objection against the young man—he is admitted to be wise, learned, and upright, but he wants experience. Experience! why, he is every day taking lessons on that subject, that are peculiar to himself and his profession—for it is believed to be the only one, where youth is not cherished, honored and encouraged.

At length he is permitted, as a matter of indulgence, to make an appointment. It is well attended, and his discourses are indeed very good—but he used notes. Some are doubtful whether he composed the sermons, others were out of all patience because they were read, and some few did themselves and the preacher credit, by thinking and saying, that all things considered, it was very well.

Months—perhaps years, roll away under these embarrassments—frequently under the aggravations and humiliations of debts and poverty. He could have gone into business and been rich, but he felt himself bound to answer the dictates of his conscience, and to devote his life and his labors to the inculcation of what he deems the truth. At times, he scarcely knows whence his "daily bread" can be derived; but some generous friend who knows, appreciates his wants, and he is almost miraculously sustained.

And during this age of endurance—this reign of trial, anxiety and disappointment, he hears and sees a thousand things calculated to arouse the utmost in ligation of every man but a minister; and such things, as none but a minister will ever be called upon to endure. He hears the most offensive praises heaped upon others in his presence, for the most common-place services—and sees and knows that there are those who yield him a pitance of support, who would prefer the labors of any other man to himself. Thus to the abundant perplexities of his situation, are frequently and most unfeelingly added the most oppressive and humiliating mortifications.

But the preacher is at length located, and sits down to trim again his study-lamp, and to enlarge the plan as well as improve the character of his pulpit labors. And then a series of new and unthought-of cares and vexations throng around him. He finds little time to spare from the labor of preparing his sermons, examining the more recent theological works, and reviewing his long neglected Latin and Greek, and, consequently, seldom visits his parishioners. But this is set down to his pride, or his indolence. How much in either case, is he misunderstood. He is of all men one of the most industrious—and has of all others, as little reason to be proud. But his apologies are useless. Very few will believe, that he wants much time to prepare his sermons, or that a minister can be a very industrious man. It is presumed that he prefers smoking and sleeping, to visiting his supporters, or the head-ache of intense application.

And then again, his Sunday labors, while they greatly exhaust and fatigue him, gradually undermine his constitution. The term Mondayish, conveys to no other living man, the idea which is so well, and so peculiarly understood by the minister. But under the depression induced by the joint influence of bodily and mental exertion, he must suffer alone. For none can sympathize with him. It is rather a matter of merriment than solicitude, that he should complain of fatigue and suffering, from having merely spoken some two or three hours in a single day; while his auditor is in perfect comfort, though laboring on the farm, in the shop, or at the counter, for a whole week. And persons so employed, can form no idea of the labor of public speaking. If they ever read aloud an hour at once, it was in some snug room of their quiet domicile, where silence forever reigns. They have never measured the strength of their lungs in a thronged room, heated to suffocation, nor in one of some sixty or ninety feet, whose arch mimicked the vault of heaven—where the motion of every door, or foot—every cough or turn to gaze upon a new-comer, neutralizes the power, and destroys the distinctness of the strongest voice.

In the meantime, a more serious consequence attaches to the belief of the minister's pride or indolence—they have the effect to lessen his usefulness, and to diminish his congregation. His motives will not be understood, nor his services appreciated. The well-directed zeal of a few individuals, will only keep the affairs of the church in progress, while new-comers will feel doubtful of the propriety of seating themselves where immediate prosperity is uncertain. Many societies languish from these causes alone, while the ostensible one attaches exclusively to the minister, who may be entirely unconscious of all that is thus passing around him.

Another, and a most perplexing difficulty for a preacher to manage, is, that he has the misfortune to inherit all the common wants of other men. If they devote their time, their labor, and their lives to the ministry, their employers must provide for them, or they must abandon their profession. No minister in our country ever anticipates more than a decent competency from his congregation—but this, he does, and is encouraged to expect. And if with this, he is enabled by economy to save a small sum from year to year—and consequently, appears to be getting along in the world, it commonly produces dislike. His hearers are willing to aid him as a matter of charity, and as they would assist any other helpless and poor man—but they have no notion of making him rich. Such people never reason in this way, when they pay an attorney a round sum for defending a suit about sixpence—and which frequently amounts to more than they would give a preacher in an age.

Notwithstanding all this, their preacher must be well dressed, or they will not hear him—his house must be comfortably furnished, or they are ashamed of him; and if he does not get along, keep out of debt, and live in some sort of independence, they wonder what becomes of what he receives. Now, under these circumstances—what can he do? If he does not save something, he is blamed for extravagance—and if he does, for his economy! Whatever he does, subjects him to reproach—and is supposed to be done, merely because he is a minister.

Finally—Another vexatious situation, in which every minister is placed who lives to become what is significantly called—an experienced preacher, is, that he either does, or does not become popular. And this reminds one of what is called—the horns of a dilemma—one, or the other, he must positively take; and whichever it be, it is certain to be a troublesome position. If he does not rise in public estimation, his hearers think that he does not make the requisite exertions—that he is inattentive to some particulars which would improve his sermons, or his manner of delivering them; and however well pleased with his subject matter, they think his ministrations but a dull affair.

If, on the other hand, he becomes generally distinguished for his flowing and easy style, his happy illustrations, his depth of thought, or commanding power, and consequently, popular; if he is not spoiled by vanity, he is overwhelmed with frequent mortification. His auditors now expect too much from him. And whenever and wherever he preaches, he is watched with a scrutiny which loses sight of the nature of his theme, and which only looks to the fabrication and delivery of the discourse. Under these circumstances, though an ordinary sermon may sometimes pass without censure, at others, his failure to meet public expectation will sink him below mediocrity. Hence, popular men, if they are wise, are humble men.

Such are a few of the discomforts and misfortunes of a preacher. Happy is he, who can with patience and equanimity bear up under them; and who feeling them under their various modifications, perseveres in the path of duty, the servant of men, and of righteousness and peace.

INFERENCE.

BY REV. E. TOWNSEND.

I have found, by observation, that men generally graduate their expectations to the character of the company with whom they are called to associate. If a man goes into the company of gentlemen, he expects gentlemanly treatment; and so onward.

Now, when our self-styled orthodox brethren attend their own meetings, they receive all kinds of abuse, reproaches and insult without a murmur—plain, obvious contradictions excite no attention, whatever! But do they attend Universalist meetings? the scene is changed. They find fault with the most trifling breach of the rules of propriety, and notice the most trivial seeming contradictions. I therefore conclude, that they think Universalist preachers a perfect contrast to their own—that Universalist preachers are correct in their doctrine, and gentlemanly in their deportment—or else they would form no such expectations.

We are obliged to them for the compliment, and it is not the less valuable because an undesigned one.

TEMPERANCE.....NO. VII.

BY DR. A. W. BENTON.

Societies are necessary to give respectability and popularity to the practice of abstinence. Few individuals have sufficient firmness of resolution to oppose, alone, the current of popular practice; especially when by so doing, they are sure to incur the censure of being illiberal and stingy.

Individuals, in all former ages, who have opposed popular errors or fashionable vices, have been constrained to combine their energies, and act in concert, in order to give force and efficacy to their efforts. Even the Christian religion, which had to contend with the popular errors of Judaism and idolatry, though upheld, protected and promulgated by means and men ordained by God, himself, called to its aid the influence of organized combinations. The blessed Redeemer of the world, who gave himself a ransom for all, organized an association of twelve disciples, whom he commissioned to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. These faithful followers of our Lord Jesus, in obedience to the divine mandate, went forth, filled with the Holy Spirit, and directed by the love of eternal truth, and organized churches in various countries; unto which were added, daily, such as should be saved.

In modern times, when the corruptions of Christianity had become prevalent, the friends of God's free grace have been compelled to unite, and organize, to give strength and respectability to their cause. So it has been, so it is, and so it will continue to be, so long as human nature remains the same.

I shall conclude this number, by noticing a few objections which are brought against temperance societies. But, before entering upon this part of my subject, I would say to "a Friend to Temperance," who appeared in number 52, volume vi, of this paper, without name, date or residence, that this part of my article is not written in reply to him; though I may notice all his objections, worthy of notice. His article has added no stimulus to my pen. Indeed it would be jolly, if not presumption, for a "wiseacre," or a "puppet," to attempt a formal reply to such a modern JUNIUS.

The first objection I shall notice, is, "that religious societies cover the whole ground, and do away the necessity of any other." I readily admit that the Christian religion covers the whole ground—for it teaches that no man should put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall in his brother's way—that we ought not to use that which makes our brother to offend. St. Paul says, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." 1 Cor. viii: 13. "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth."

Now this doctrine covers the whole ground. But do the members of religious societies, generally, occupy this ground?—this most prolific ground in the whole Gospel field, self-denial. Is it not a fact, that many church members continue the practice of moderate drinking, which practice makes drunkards of thousands? Have not hundreds and thousands stumbled over this practice into lasting infamy and disgrace? If so, what is the Christian's duty? What is the duty of that church member who makes an habitual use of strong drink? Let him look at the effects of drinking, as exhibited in the boundless map of moral desolation which this practice has spread over the nations, and then open his Bible and read, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend," and his conscience will give him the answer. The error of this objection lies in considering that religious societies have occupied all the ground which Christianity has marked out, which was not the case, till they were brought to the task by temperance societies; nor do all occupy this ground now.

Another very common objection is, "that temperance societies are sectarian." And in proof, we are pointed to temperance publications and addresses, in which the drunkard is told that he is in danger of endless misery, unless he reforms. Now let us suppose that these men who write and publish, are sincere; (and that charity which can pass judgment upon another man's heart, I think cannot be that charity an apostle directs us to add to brotherly kindness.) Now, I say, supposing that these men sincerely believe that intemperance exposes thousands to eternal perdition, would you think them faithful in duty to their fellow-men, to their own consciences, or to their God, if, to avoid your censure, they should refuse to "blow the trumpet, and warn the people"? Have you the authority to fix bounds to their words, and say, thus far mayest thou speak, and no farther? Must these men abandon the dictates of their own consciences, and measure every word by the standard of yours? And if they will not do this, are you so very righteous that you will not assist in doing good, unless you can do it all?

Let us look at the inference of this objection.—All who write upon the subject of temperance, believe in endless misery; therefore, it is natural to infer, that all who do not believe in this doctrine, are not engaged on this subject. But would any one naturally infer that, because Limitarians are engaged in writing and preaching against intemperance, they were hypocrites, and evil designing men? I know not what others may think, but to me, it looks either very foolish, or very uncharitable, or both.

* If 1 Cor. viii: 13 is applicable to all cases which cause a brother to offend, it is surely applicable in those cases, also, which cause a brother to offend by opposing temperance societies! A. B. G.

Force, coercion, extermination and proscription of individuals, cries another. And in proof, he tells us that temperance men are withdrawing their patronage from the maker and vender of ardent spirit. Demetrius-like, they have discovered that the craft is in danger, and with one voice have raised the same cry. Have cold water men ever mobbed any one, or forcibly destroyed their property? No; but the craft of those who make, not shrines, but worshippers, not of Diana, but of Bacchus, is in danger. "Moreover, we see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, these cold water fanatics have persuaded and turned away much people from the grog-shop and the tavern." "And we, who get rich by making drunkards, and paupers, and criminals, will soon have to abandon our business. Horrid proscription! Unhallowed war against individuals!" Is it the duty of a Christian to patronize a man who is engaged in a traffic which is injuring his neighbor, and community? "I speak as unto wise men, judge ye what I say."

South Bainbridge, January 6, 1836.

PARTIALISM IN UPPER CANADA.

Not eight weeks since, I heard a close-communication Baptist preacher, make the following remark in the pulpit:—"Universalists teach, that a man may seize a dagger, stab his wife, his children, then plunge it into his own breast, and go right to heaven." He made a pause; his eyes fell on me—I never before was so much impressed, that it was my duty to speak in meeting. The next sentence uttered was by me—"Do Universalists believe and preach such a doctrine?" The good man was somewhat embarrassed, but the same spirit which produced the calumny, soon brought an answer to my interrogation. "I have heard them preach it, and have read it in their publications," was the reply. Comment is needless. Let it be sufficient to say, that one of his church members, after meeting, stated, that it was his belief, that his preacher had "never read such doctrines, or heard them propagated by a Universalist."

At the close of a meeting, a few days previous to the above, an invitation was given for those who wished to come forward and unite with the church, to make it manifest. Among the number, one was found who could not exactly correspond in belief with the doctrine of election, as stated in the articles. The Elder explained away the signification of the language contained in the article, and denied his belief in the doctrine of unconditional election and reprobation, which was satisfactory to the doubter. Others, not satisfied with the Elder's conquest, attempted an elucidation of the subject. After hearing several opinions, I ventured to give my own. I declared my belief in the full sense of the word, in the election both of individuals and of nations. The last quotation I made in proof of my position, was Romans xi: 25, 26. "Do you believe all Israel will be saved?" says the Elder. My answer was, that I read it thus in the Scriptures, and did believe them. All eyes were now turned upon the Universalist. Knowing that, under the then existing circumstances, a contention would be productive of no good, I left the room. It was immediately declared, that I dared not stand and hear the truth brought in contact with my doctrine.

Two days after this, I received word from the Elder, by the mouth of a third person, that he would discuss the subject with me before a select number of persons, chosen to decide on the merits of the arguments used by each. I immediately sent him a line, expressing my wish for a discussion, and in order that each might have an opportunity of doing justice to his cause, proposed that we should write, and have our several epistles read in public, previous to the first of April. After a few days, I had an interview with him. He declined writing, as he had not time to spare. I proposed a public discussion, on any terms. He refused coming before the public, on any considerations.

Thus, a man who has been a professed preacher of the Gospel for fifteen years, after stating that he believed himself able to confound any Universalist, and was not afraid to meet any of them in debate, refuses to have his doctrine compared with that of others, who he believes hold to a doctrine contrary to Scripture and to reason. From the above circumstances, you can form some idea of the manner in which our doctrines are represented and confuted here, from the pulpit; and predict also, the result, should the doctrine be propagated and defended by a proper person.

I will conclude by expressing my wish, that a way may soon be opened for a preacher of the everlasting Gospel to come this way, and doubt not but great good would result from it. J. W. F. Townsend, January 1, 1836.

WELL DONE, BR. CLARK!

The following very acceptable letter has lately come to hand; and we cannot forbear laying it before our readers. The writer has a happy faculty of expressing himself about the manner of doing business—ay, and of doing it too. Are there not many others of our agents and patrons who will "go and do likewise"? D. S.

"Br. SKINNER—I herewith transmit to you three dollars, the balance due from subscribers in this place for the sixth volume.

"But the three dollars would be rather lonely. Let me see. It appears to me I saw something in the Magazine and Advocate, not long since, about sending in a dollar for the 'Institute.' I thought when I read the article it would be a good plan for each subscriber to send in the sum proposed. I thought I would do it myself. But I let the matter rest, and thought nothing more of it until I saw Br. Smith's notice that this request had not been complied with—I was surprised. But when I thought thereon, and recollected that I myself had not made the donation, it occurred to my mind how the wonder was accounted for. I had deferred it. Others have done the same. But I will transmit the dollar. Yes, and I will go and see friend Dickinson, for he has expressed a wish to send a dollar also. And there is friend McGowan. He has said he wanted to send his dollar for the same purpose. I will go and see him, and that will be three dollars; and there are others in this place with whom I have not conversed on this subject. Those, too, who are abundantly able. I am confident they are all anxious to make the donation. If so, there would be a dozen dollars or more. Now this would not be much, but it would be something. Only one dollar each. And yet, if every subscriber (those only who are able) would do the same, the advantage of the Literary Fund would be obtained. The sum required would be made out easily. Yes, five thousand dollars might be sent in, in this way, without a struggle or a groan! Reader, can you spare the dollar? Yes, you can. You will not know the difference a year hence—certainly you will not, an hundred years hence. Come, what say you? Say not, 'let those pay the dollar who are better able.' No. Leave that saying for some other person, and plank the cash, saying, 'it will not hurt me, but do me good every time I think of it,' for it certainly will, if you have a due regard for the cause of literature and learning, truth and righteousness.

"Come brethren—walk up. Be liberal. The good Book tells us 'The liberal man deviseth liberal things.' We believe that the 'Liberal Institute' is one of the 'liberal things.' Let us brethren, ay, and sisters too, if you please—let us all, do something liberal for the Liberal Institute. A. C.

"P. S. The above was written last evening. Since that time I have seen some of our brethren, nearly all of whom have given something for the Institute. I am thus enabled to send five dollars for the Institute, viz:—one dollar from J. McG., one dollar from J. D., one dollar from J. R., fifty cents each from J. M. and H. D., and one dollar from your obedient servant, A. C."

TOUR TO OHIO.
BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

I left Utica, September 30. Lectured at Kirkville on the evening of the same day; but as the weather was very unpleasant, our congregation was small. Arrived in Rochester, October 3; having lectured on my way at Port Byron and Newark. In Rochester, as in several other places, I found my appointments misunderstood, in consequence of a mistake in their publication. Nevertheless, I preached three discourses to respectable and increasing congregations. On the 5th, I pursued my journey to Lockport, where I was kindly received by a number of worthy believers, to whom I administered the word of life on the evening of this day. The Lockport brethren seem zealously affected in a good cause. They are anxious to form a society and procure a preacher. May God, of his abundant mercy, supply their wants.

October 7, I reached Buffalo, which is confessedly the most active town of its size that I have passed during my tour. Embarked on board the steamboat Commodore Perry, for Cleveland, distant two hundred miles. Lake Erie is a splendid sheet of water, and in sailing over its mighty bosom, one is tempted to be proud that he is a native of a country which has such seas within its limits. After a pleasant voyage of thirty hours, I arrived in Cleveland. This place is delightfully situated, and as it has a commanding location, it cannot fail to become an important city. As I had but little time to spare, I proceeded down the Ohio canal, and arrived in Akron, on Saturday, October 10. Here I had an appointment for the Sabbath, and our meetings were well attended, both by the inhabitants of Akron, and Middlebury, two miles East. I cultivated an acquaintance with many worthy friends here, for whose kindness and liberality I must always feel grateful. Arrived in Massillon, October 13, where I had appointed to preach that evening; but as it happened to be their day of election, I concluded to pass along, after agreeing to minister to them on my return. This I am satisfied was the most proper course; for it is a fact, that universal religion and party politics do not go well together.

The next day I passed a small village called Zoar, which is, or has been, owned by a company of Germans, who possess six thousand acres of land in the vicinity. One thing among them is peculiar. They have a building placed on wheels, sufficiently large to accommodate a small family who act as shepherds of their flocks. They have portable fences or pens, which are moved from field to field for the security of the sheep through the night. A large dog is used for the purpose of driving them from one lot to another; and the sheep are in perfect subjection; following the person who walks in front to lead the way. It is quite interesting to see a single dog driving some four hundred sheep, with more facility than it could be done by a number of persons. I am told that this society is very wealthy, and that they avoid intercourse with Americans, except to obtain a knowledge of the arts and sciences. Whenever a person is admitted into their society, his property, if he has any, becomes common stock, and cannot be taken away, though he himself should secede from them.

I reached Coshocton, October 14, and lectured on that and the following evening, to small but respectable congregations. There are a few, and but a few zealous supporters of religious truth in this place. I visited a number of agreeable friends living two miles East of the village, and during this excursion, explored a number of coal mines that lie in the immediate vicinity. Into one we entered a distance of twenty rods, through a passage four feet and a half high, and the same in width. These mines are very extensive, and bid fair to render this section important. In returning from this geological excursion, we examined the spot where the principal part of a tribe of Indians were massacred by General Broadhead, at the time of his expedition from Pennsylvania. We saw the large beach tree on which, as a token of revenge, the survivors of the tribe engraved a man's hand in the act of grasping a war knife.

In Zanesville, I delivered three discourses to rapidly increasing assemblies. A Methodist clergyman, who has long been fighting against the truth, attended and set up an opposition to my discourse. While I was making a rejoinder, a stone from the street, dashed through the window behind the desk in which I was standing, and passed me on the left. No injury was done except to the glass; and as the "argument was neither rational nor convincing," it was treated by all with silent contempt. On the night of the 19th, I shaped my course for Columbus. I went by stage on the National road, which is one of the greatest works I have ever seen. This road is really an honor to our nation. I reached Columbus the next day, and was cordially received by our friends. I preached four discourses in this place, and assisted in forming a society, which in point of respectability is not surpassed. Our friends in this city cherish and manifest a commendable spirit. They seem to love their doctrine for its beauty and excellence, and believing it the only system of faith that promotes practical goodness; they are resolved to support it at all hazards. A house of worship, equal, if not superior to any in the place, will be erected here. I cannot but express my gratitude for the favors that I have received from these worthy friends, for my hands were strengthened by them while I was ministering in spiritual things.

From Columbus, I travelled by stage to Springfield, where I lectured to a large and devout congregation on the evening of the 27th. There are a number of warm hearted Universalists in Springfield, who are exerting themselves to advance the good cause. The next day was devoted to a religious controversy between Rev. Mr. Lucas, of the Methodist order, and myself. Three moderators were chosen, and the discussion was held in the Methodist house, commencing at 9, A. M., and closing at 5, P. M.

The next day I pursued my journey to Dayton. Here our cause is considerably prosperous considering its disorganized state. A singing school is in contemplation, and a disposition to advance the truth, is quite prevalent. Dayton is sixty-five miles from Cincinnati, and is a large and flourishing village, containing a population of five thousand souls. On the 30th, I passed down the canal to Cincinnati, where I arrived about midnight, having travelled nearly nine hundred miles. Cincinnati is a place of great business, and the country about it is fine for agricultural purposes.

PUBLIC DISCUSSION IN MICHIGAN.

A Mr. Tibbets, one of the many Methodist clergymen in this vicinity, possessing rather more moral courage than the others, sometime since consented to meet me in the field of controversy, (a field, by-the-by, in which they are seldom found,) and debate the all-important question, Will all mankind finally be made holy and happy? The humble writer of this article endeavored to support the affirmative of the question, and appealed to the word of God for proof of his affirmation. The debate continued between three and four hours, when Mr. T. manifested symptoms of uneasiness, and seemed impatient to be away. Accordingly, he took from his hat, that little, filthy, brimstone tract, called "The Strange Thing," and fired it at me as his last gun, and then retreated in haste from the field. Mr. T. was very prudent in retreating when he did; for it is folly for a man to think of gaining a victory over his opponent, without ammunition; and as it exhausted the whole magazine of misrepresentation and falsehood to charge the "Strange Thing," and as he had discharged it, the only alternative for safety was by flight. Mr. T.'s total failure to answer so much as one of the arguments used in favor of the salvation of all mankind, has been the means of opening the eyes of a number of the citizens of Cold Water. I have, since my debate with Mr. T., frequently preached in that vicinity, to increasing congregations. The heart-cheering intelligence, of the complete emancipation of all mankind from the thralldom of sin and misery, is spreading far and wide; and the happy prospect is, that the glorious time is not far distant, when Universalism, like a flood of love, will overflow the beautiful State of Michigan.

Affectionately yours, G. R. BROWN.

NEW SOCIETY AND MEETING-HOUSES.

A society of Universalists was organized, according to law, in the village of Youngstown, town of Porter, Niagara county, on the 12th December. Br. Kennicott, I understand, labors with this society one-half of the time, to good acceptance.

The Universalists in Lewiston, Niagara county, have resolved to erect a house of public worship the ensuing year, having obtained the necessary subscription to warrant the undertaking. A gentleman from this place informed me that they should build beyond a doubt. A house will also be erected, next Summer, in Kenpville, some of the materials for which are already purchased, and the subscription answerable to the contemplated expenses of building. The house in Clarendon will be ready for dedication, early next Spring. A church was recognized, after the customary manner, in Ridgeway, on the fourth Sunday in September last. C. HAMMOND.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

Br. J. Gage, 2d, writes us respecting the celebration at Pavilion:—

"This joyous eve was celebrated by our friends in Pavilion, (town of Covington,) Genesee county, and an appropriate discourse was delivered by the writer. The house for public worship was tastefully decorated with evergreens, and brilliantly illuminated; presenting a pleasing scene within, and without, a sight grand and noble indeed. Contrary to the fears of some, and perhaps, wishes of others, the house was completely filled at an early hour, and a large and spirited choir of singers, led by Br. Belding, entertained the congregation until the commencement of services, which were as follows:— 1. Voluntary by the choir. 2. Reading select portions of Scripture. 3. Hymn. 4. Prayer. 5. Hymn. 6. Sermon, John xviii: 37. 7. Voluntary by the choir. 8. Concluding prayer and benediction.

"Allusion being made in the sermon, to the time when the star, 'the bright harbinger of better times, arose, with day's bright effulgence, over the darkness of time,' the choir, as if by spontaneous impulse, 'burst into a song' of well chosen words, which I need not say gave a double interest to the remaining part of the discourse, which immediately followed. It was indeed a pleasant season to us all; and the only regret felt by any, at its close, was what arose from the limited duration of such delightful interviews in 'the house of the Lord.'"
"J. GAGE, 2d."

Br. Whitney writes respecting the celebration of this event at Newport:—

"I had the gratification of spending Christmas eve with our friends in Newport, Herkimer county, and breaking to them the bread of life in a discourse appropriate to the occasion. The house was beautifully decorated and illuminated, and the occasion one of much gratification to me—as I trust much good will result from it."
J. WHITNEY."

Br. Tomlinson hails us from Buffalo with pleasing news—public and private. The conclusion of his letter I think may do good, if published—it may prevent a repetition of complaints that had, perhaps, (as he says,) better been written with a dry pen.

"We attended to the usual services on Christmas eve, in this city—had our house tastefully decorated and illuminated, and (what is better than all) filled with attentive hearers; many of whom were those not of our own faith. This is as it should be. If they feel not disposed to come by day, let them come at night.

"Br. Grosh, notwithstanding the cold water that has been thrown upon us, by our visiting brethren, and their attempts at witticism and sarcasm, our cause is, in truth, onward; though we confess it moves but slowly. But all that has been said by our good brethren, has not added aught to the cause, here or elsewhere; and methinks they would perhaps have done better had they written their censures with a dry pen."

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

We are often much pleased and interested with portions of the various letters that are daily coming in from agents and subscribers; and while reading them, we cannot refrain from wishing, that we could make our readers partakers in our joys. It is this desire that leads us to break the seal of private communication, and select such extracts as we believe will be read with pleasure by our readers, give information of the prosperity of our cause, or tend to show in what light our labors are regarded by those for whom they are intended. The reader may smile; and, if a phrenologist and a Yankee, will be apt to guess at the size of our respective approbatenesses; but really, the expectation of receiving the sincere and well-merited approbation of intelligent and upright patrons, and of hearing that beneficial results have followed our labors, often renders many a rugged, heavy hour of care, perplexity and toil, a sweet dream, as it were—an abstraction of joyous existence in the future.

But to our extracts. The first we give, may well light up a smile on the furrowed brow of moody Care.

"Cheshire, Mass., December 21, 1835.

"I wish you to send me a little more of the Gospel Advocate from your plentiful Magazine; for we all wish to continue subscribers for the next volume; and, in addition, I wish you to send one paper to S—B—, of Cheshire. One year ago, I took the only number of the Magazine and Advocate that was taken in this town; and now, we shall number four certain, and two or three more hopeful, so that you may see that the Cheshire babe has waked up. It has heretofore been but a little trouble for the Partialists to keep him asleep—they jugged the cradle a little, and sung the popular song, and the child slept. But, alas, they felt so secure and overjoyed, that they sung lullaby so loud, as to wake the child; and now they cannot get him to sleep again! They have tried him in the old cradle, but he will not go to sleep. He thinks the cradle is too small. They have tried him in a number of other cradles, and altered the song a little—but he don't go to sleep—he says, 'to be sure, there is a little difference in the form of rocking, and a very little in the ceremony of singing,' but he considers the sizes of the cradles about the same—they are all too small.' Now, if I understand the language of the child, he thinks that he shall not go to sleep again until they put him in a larger cradle—one that is large enough for the whole human family to rest in—and rock him with the foot of love and charity, and sing him 'a new song.' Perhaps the one hundred and forty-fifth psalm would suit him. Yours with respect,

"CALVIN HINMAN."

The following, beside other information, exhibits in lively colors, the lamentable effects of fanaticism on the poor, ignorant slave at the South.

"Louisville, Ky., December 9, 1835.

"I left Williamstown, Oswego county, for this place, the last of September, past. I intended to write to you before leaving Williamstown, but have delayed until now, which makes something of an additional expense to me in obtaining your invaluable paper, without which I find myself lonely, and my wife thinks she can scarcely keep house without it. Please forward it to me at Louisville, without delay. I have not seen one of your papers in this place; there may be some here, notwithstanding; of this, you know best. As I shall remain here through the Winter, and perhaps longer, I will endeavor to gain a few subscribers; what success I may have I cannot guess, as my acquaintance is quite limited yet. There are here about twenty thousand inhabitants, about one-third are probably blacks. There is one Unitarian church in this place, but how well attended I cannot tell; three or four Presbyterian churches, one Baptist, and two Methodist churches, including one for blacks. A more orthodox set of Methodists than the blacks of this place, I have never seen; as Methodist orthodoxy consists of noise and confusion, such as singing, shouting, groaning, shrieking, falling, etc., etc.; and as enlightened men and women cannot be lashed into this distracted phrensy, or none but unthinking and illiterate mortals can be so operated upon, you can safely judge the effects produced upon a large congregation of slaves, who are very little above the brute creation in point of intelligence. Indeed they carry out Methodism to perfection; and I may add, Finneyism, Burchardism, and all those kinds of isms which have so long disgraced humanity, by preying upon the passions of the ignorant and unwary. A man who is not satisfied that ignorance is the cause of the phrensy produced in all such meetings, can, I think, be convinced, by taking a peep into the African church in this place. I called at the door of their house of worship one evening, upon hearing a great noise within, and had I been of the same opinion that I once was, I verily believe I should have stood aghast with fear. There were some two or three hundred blacks, men and women, as hearers; and a flaming Methodist white man as a speaker in the pulpit, belching forth hell in all its horrid pictures. Some were groaning, some shrieking, others screaming 'glory' and 'amen!' (what was said, I could not distinguish precisely; as it was all an unintelligible, frightful scream, tumult, stamping of the feet, slapping the hands upon the benches, and together,) and many were foaming out their shame upon the floor. The same spirit presided that reigns in all revivalist meetings at the North, and the only difference between this, and other meetings which I have seen conducted in the same spirit, is, in this meeting it had very little common sense to contend with. Suffice it to say, that I have never seen revivalism carried so near to perfection; nor have I, in my life time, ever seen a place that so completely corresponded to their own notions of the infernal regions of despair.

"I am very respectfully yours, S. S. G."

The next needs a little explanation. Br. Sabin, in the last volume, sent the pay for his subscription to that and former volumes, which his poverty, before that, had not allowed him to pay. It appears that the writer of the following had forwarded Br. Sabin's name to Br. Skinner. Though scarcely able to continue such papers as Br. Skinner thus cast upon the waters, yet in general, we shall endeavor to follow his example. Hence, the paper requested will be forwarded.

QUERY.—In places where able individuals can get us eight new subscribers, had they not better do it, and order their ninth copy (for their services) sent to some poor but worthy family that wants "more light"?

"Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days"—(with interest as well as principal.)

"Royalton, December 20, 1835.

"Brs. SKINNER and GROSH—Seeing the letter of our Br. Sabin, in number 50, volume vi, of the Magazine and Advocate, reminded me forcibly of the liberty I took of casting your—not my own—bread upon the waters. (For, in fact, I had not as much cash, as I had a longing that truth might prevail.) In the case of Br. Sabin, I rejoice to be able to say, that, through the assistance of God, reason, Scripture, and your welcome weekly visitor, the Magazine and Advocate, a numerous family (among whom are four blooming daughters) have found, to the joy of their souls, that 'God is love,' and that the Gospel is 'good news of great joy.'—Partialism, I now think, may send her barbed arrows at the family of Br. Sabin, as long as it pleases; and they will all fall on the heads of those that let them fly.

"If you have another crust of bread that you can spare, send it to —, of —, Genesee county, a preacher of the — order, and an honest man. All he needs is, 'more light.'

"The doctrine of God's unlimited love and benevolence is taking such a deep and steady march in this part of his vineyard, as causes Partialism to gnash its teeth in spite. Babylon is falling. The youth begin to read and reason. J. S."

The following extract is as brief, pithy, and probably some who now discontinue, will find it as true, as any proverb of Solomon's.

"Bergen, Genesee county, December 24, 1835.

"Messrs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—I must solicit you to send me the Magazine and Advocate. I discontinued taking the last (or present) volume, thinking myself too poor; but I am convinced that poverty of knowledge is more distressing (to me) than scarcity of cents. D. W. F."

The following active agent has taken a very good view of the case—and has, most certainly, given us six pretty fair proofs that he is our "well wisher," as also the well wisher of the cause.

"Desemond, St. Clair county, M. T., December 12, 1835.

"I have quadrupled your list of subscribers in this place, as you will see by the cash enclosed, and I wish all your former subscribers would do the same—it would not only advance your pecuniary interest, but would be the means of throwing a great deal of light among the deluded advocates of endless misery. I might have sent you some other names, who would promise to pay some time or other, but I concluded not to accept any save those I considered certainly good—for I presume all publishers of periodicals know the difference between those that pay in advance and those that never pay. "This from your well wisher, F. E."

The following is from a Br., a student in Dartmouth College, N. H. We hope he will frequently find time to let us hear from him.

"Our cause is very prosperous in this region, although there are but few professed Universalists in college, (say five or six,) and only four who will be likely to preach. Nearly half of the students are professedly orthodox. Many of the others are quite liberal, and too independent minded, I think, to ever fall in with the popular creeds of the day. That God may continue to bless and prosper you, and crown with success all your labors of love, is the sincere prayer of yours, etc. S. L."

Scipio, N. Y.—Br. H. Boughton, who has lately commenced preaching in Scipio, Cayuga county, and that vicinity, and is now in study with Br. G. W. Montgomery, of Auburn, writes us under date of 1st inst., as follows:

"Our cause in Scipio appears to be onward—our friends seem to be aroused to a sense of their duty—and we fondly trust that truth is now exerting her mighty and heavenly influence, over bigotry, error and superstition. A subscription has lately been started for building a church, next season, and already half enough is subscribed for the work. May our heavenly Father prosper the glorious cause, and may much good be done in the name of the holy child Jesus."

"Br. SKINNER—If you have occasion to say anything more in the Magazine and Advocate, to Br. Hudson, will you have the goodness to use, instead of "C. H.," C. Hudson? as some of your readers have already mistaken Br. Hudson for myself, our initials being the same, when I suppose, as is generally allowed, we are only cousins.

"C. HAMMOND."

We cheerfully give place to the above, in order to correct any erroneous impressions that may have been made by our use of the initials C. H., although we never had suspected that any of our readers could attribute the views and remarks of the C. H. in the Independent Messenger, to Br. Hammond. D. S.

REASONS.....NO. II.

FOR REJECTING THE DOCTRINE OF ENDLESS MISERY.

"Produce your cause, saith the Lord, bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob."
Isaiah xli: 21.

We are now considering the uselessness of endless misery, with reference to the various beings or classes of beings who can be supposed in any way to be affected by it. It was shown in the first number, that it was useless to God, and could not possibly benefit him in the least. We now proceed to show

2. That it is useless to the holy angels in heaven.—

What possible pleasure, satisfaction, advantage or profit, in any imaginable manner or shape, can those beatific spirits in glory derive from the endless perdition of a part of the human family? Could those pure and blessed spirits that constantly attend before the dazzling throne of God, to behold his glory and partake of his happiness, be benefited by turning their attention to regions of immortal wo, to view the flames of an endless hell, and listen to the undying groans and ceaseless shrieks of immortal and hell-doomed sinners? Could such a sight add to their joy one iota, or higher swell their notes of praise and rapturous hosannas? If so, what must be their nature and disposition? Could the infernal regions themselves, in which the advocates of the doctrine under examination believe, furnish one sample of a worse nature or disposition? No, not as bad. Nay, the holy angels of the heavenly court derive their happiness and pleasure from a very different source from that of the endless wretchedness of immortal spirits. When the whole world lay in wickedness—when darkness covered the earth and gross darkness the people—when man was a stranger to God and the foe of his fellows, and groaning in the fetters of darkness, sin and wo—when the fulness of times had come for the Son of God's eternal love to visit and redeem the world, and the portals of Heaven's exhaustless mercy were opened to a dying world in the advent of the Chosen One, and the daydawn of immortal bliss was about to burst upon sorrowing humanity—those pure and beatific beings that had long desired to look into these things, manifested their joy and happiness in a far different theme from that of endless misery. When the angel, commissioned from the throne of God, announced the advent thus:—"Fear not; for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people: for unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, [not a destroyer,] which is Christ the Lord"—we learn that there was joy, not only among the trembling shepherds of Bethlehem's plain, but even in the courts of Heaven: For "suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." Here was the source of their joy, that a Saviour had come to seek and save that which was lost—to redeem and bring home to glory a sin-polluted world. And the blessed Jesus declares, "there is joy in heaven [not over one poor soul that is forever lost, but] over one sinner that repenteth."

There is one idea connected with this subject which we have sometimes, though seldom, heard advanced as an argument in favor of the utility of endless misery; but the bare mention of it is a sufficient refutation. It is this. That the sight of the endless tortures of the damned in hell, will deter the holy angels from sinning, and exert a salutary influence in over-awing them into entire submission to the laws of God and heaven. Well, reader, this is the only idea that claims any kindred to an argument in favor of the utility, to angels, of the merciless dogma of endless wo! And what think ye of it? What is implied in it? Why, it implies that the holy angels are very desirous of becoming unholy—that they are in love with sin, and would most gladly and greedily pursue it if they dared to—and that nothing but the terrific sight of the endless perdition of sinners can restrain them from indulging in it! And these are the holy angels, are they? The bare supposition, or any words in which it can be couched, refutes so monstrous an idea.

3. It is useless to the saints in glory. The same remarks which were offered above, in reference to its uselessness to angels, are equally applicable here. The sight of the endless tortures of their fellow-beings in hell, could neither confer honor, nor yield pleasure or profit to the spirits of just men made perfect—the holy and blessed throng of the redeemed in heaven. We are aware that some theologians have undertaken to maintain the utility of endless misery to the saints in glory, not only on the ground that it would restrain them from all inclinations to sin, but that it would yield them the highest pleasure imaginable, by exhibiting the mighty difference and contrast which the Deity had made in the respective conditions of the saved and damned! It is indeed a humiliating view of poor human nature to allow that such views have been advanced, ay, and their entertainment even been made the test of the Christian character! O, how shockingly has the Gospel been abused, and poor humanity perverted, to give countenance to so great a monstrosity!

The celebrated Doctor Emmons says, (sermon xvi,) "One part of the business of the blessed is to celebrate the doctrine of reprobation. While the decree of reprobation is eternally executing on the vessels of wrath, the smoke of their torments will be eternally ascending in the view of the vessels of mercy, who, instead of taking the part of those miserable objects, will say, Amen, alleluia, praise the Lord. It concerns, therefore, all the expectants of heaven, to anticipate this trying scene, and ask their hearts whether they are on the Lord's side, and can praise him for reprobating as well as electing love."

Dr. Edwards, another still more celebrated Calvinistic writer, says in his Works, vol. vii: p. 415, "When they (i. e. the saints) shall see how great the misery is from which God hath saved them, and how great a difference he hath made between their state and the state of others who were by nature, and perhaps by practice, no more sinful and ill-deserving than they, it will give them more a sense of the wonderfulness of God's grace to them. Every time they look upon the damned, it will excite in them a lively and admiring sense of the grace of God in making them so to differ. The sight of hell torments will exalt the happiness of the saints forever."

Again he says, (Practical Sermon, xxii:) "The saints in glory will be far more sensible how dreadful the wrath of God is, and will better understand how terrible the sufferings of the damned are, yet this will be no occasion of grief to them, but rejoicing. They will not be sorry for the damned; it will cause no uneasiness or dissatisfaction to them, but on the contrary, when they see this sight, it will occasion rejoicing and excite them to joyful praises."

Thus does this distinguished writer proceed, and devotes pages and pages to the subject of the joys of heaven being enhanced by the miseries of the damned! He maintains that parents and children, husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, will there see each other doomed to the immortal miseries of infinite and ceaseless damnation, and rejoice in the prospect, and shout glory to God in the highest strains for this blessed privilege! But O, what horridness in the thoughts! What more than blasphemy in the ideas and language which he uses! My God! are the saints in heaven to become demons, and worse than demons? Are they to have the heart of flesh they now possess taken away, only that its place may be supplied with one of adamant? Are they to lose every amiable trait of mercy and benevolence they now possess, and be clothed with infinite malignity and spite, and become the opposite of all that Jesus was and taught on earth, and thus turn heaven into hell? Jesus commands, and the Gospel requires us, to love our neighbor as ourselves—yea, to love our enemies as well as friends. Suppose the saints in heaven to possess this disposition and comply with this command—could they any more rejoice to see their fellow-beings in hell than to be there themselves? Surely not. How absurd and shocking then the idea that the saints in glory will derive happiness from viewing the endless misery of the damned, by reflecting on what they themselves have escaped, and on the contrast in their respective conditions. Suppose, reader, a tender mother sees her child torn from her fond embrace and consigned to liquid flames; and as she sees it writhing in anguish, gasping for breath in the lurid sheets of fire, its skin consumed, its veins bursting with intense heat, its blood flowing, and hears its dying moans and fruitless cries for aid, she is asked whether she does not feel the liveliest transports of joy at the sight—whether the contrast between her own condition of ease and safety, and the hapless lot of her child does not cause her to burst forth in transports of joy and songs of thanksgiving! What, think ye, would be her answer? We need not say what it would be, or what indignant feelings of insulted and wounded affection would rise in every mother's, every parent's heart. With one voice they would tell you that every pang of their darling child, was like a dagger to their soul—that they would most gladly endure the pains themselves, rather than behold them inflicted on their child.

Talk not, then, reader, of the joys of heaven being enhanced by the miseries of the damned, or of any benefit, in any shape, arising to the saints in glory from the endless misery of a portion of their fellow-beings; but blush that a man, much more that a religious teacher and professedly a Christian divine, should dare to advance so blasphemous an idea against the pure and glorified saints in bliss. To suppose the view of endless hell torments would keep the saints in obedience and prevent them from indulging in any sinful propensity, would be to suppose the saints in heaven were sinners at heart and in love with iniquity. Hence, the bare statement of the idea is its refutation. D. S.

CHURCH ORGANS.

A good church organ, well played, is certainly a very great addition to the pleasure of public worship, especially to those who have an ear for music, and whose hearts respond to the deep and solemn tones of the organ, as its sounds meet and mingle with those of human voices, in the praise of their maker, God. Instrumental music was a favorite with the devout David, the sweet singer of Israel: and why should any object to it, if it kindles in the heart a more ardent devotion, and a more lively and grateful pleasure in the worship of God?

Mr. William Wright, of this city, (corner of Genesee and Devereux-streets,) has just completed an organ for the Universalist society in this city, which has been used two or three Sabbaths with great satisfaction to the congregation. It is not large nor expensive, (our society not feeling able to procure a costly instrument of any kind,) but it is a sweet and beautiful toned instrument. Indeed, for one of its size and cost, we know not when we have heard an organ that surpassed or equalled it in tone or power. We think Mr. Wright entitled to much credit for the manner of executing this instrument; and that as an organ-builder, he is deserving of the patronage of the public generally. D. S.

DISAPPOINTMENT OF CONGREGATIONS.

One of our agents in Ohio has just written us respecting the state of our cause in his vicinity; and thinks it would be quite prosperous if a certain talented preacher, whom they had engaged to supply them with the stated ministry of the word, was not so much in the habit of disappointing the people, by neglecting to fulfil his engagements. He says, "we had engaged him for every fourth Sunday, and he has now disappointed us four times, and at each time there was a large collection of people, some from ten miles distance. This disheartens our friends, and as we live in a perfect hot-bed of Calvinism, our opponents do not fail to take advantage of it, and that greatly to the detriment of our cause."

We do not introduce the above single case for its own sake alone; neither for the purpose of opening the way to a long disquisition on the subject; but for the purpose of making and giving force to a single remark, viz:—That few if any causes, can operate more surely or effectually to the downfall of Universalism, or the prostration of societies professing it, than the repeated disappointments they thus experience from their ministers. A minister of popular speaking talents, gives notice that he will preach at such a place, on a certain Sabbath—a large concourse of people assemble, and after waiting some time, are obliged to return home unsupplied with the bread of life, and without seeing or hearing the preacher. He sends a second appointment—the people again assemble, though in less numbers than before, because several of them having lost their journey before, will not go again, lest they should be disappointed a second time. But those who do assemble are again disappointed, and compelled to go home without hearing the preached word. Let the preacher disappoint the people thus, three or four times, and but a small part of the congregation can be got together at a subsequent appointment, even though the preacher may attend—he has already, by his repeated neglect of fulfilling his engagements, effectually scattered the society and dispersed the congregation; and it will be a difficult matter to reassure and reassemble the congregation for a great length of time after it.

No cause but the existence of an absolute impossibility, or of great danger or distress, should ever prevent a minister of the Gospel, especially a Universalist minister, from promptly meeting every appointment for public preaching. Those preachers who maintain that God will fulfil all of his promises, ought surely to be consistent with their teaching, and be careful to fulfil their own.

HONORS TO THE DEAD.

A number of years since, "the General Convention of Universalists, for the New-England States and others," erected a tombstone at the grave of their deceased fellow-member, ELHANAN WINCHESTER, in the city of Hartford, Conn. The Massachusetts Association of Restorationists, have lately written to the surviving relatives of the deceased, and also to the city authorities of Hartford, and obtained their consent to place a monument over his grave. Br. Whittemore, of the Trumpet, asks what shall be done with the stone already erected. It is to be hoped that, in doing honor to the dead, our brethren of either party will not scandalize the living.

Proposals have been made to the Universalists of New-Hampshire, that they unite their efforts and erect a monument over the grave of ZEPHANIAH LATHE, one of the earliest and most zealous advocates of universal salvation; in the propagation of which he spent nearly all of a large property.

Under this head I think I may with propriety notice the proposal of Br. Drew, of the Gospel Banner, to republish the letters and poems of Miss LUCY BARNES, deceased, provided one thousand copies will be subscribed for, at about twenty-five to thirty-eight cents per copy. It will, with the biography of her father, THOMAS BARNES, (one of our early and zealous preachers in that State,) make a 24mo. book, of about 200 pages. Miss Barnes' "Important Questions with Scripture answers," alone, renders her worthy of such a monument to her memory—and if the other contents of the book will be anywise equal to that production in taste, sound judgment and ingenuity, a large edition will sell off very readily. It should be beautifully got up, and neatly and strongly bound in something better than fading muslin.

CHANGE OF HEART.

The miraculous operation in this change, is no longer generally contended for. Divines of the revivalist school, even, do not appear to be very tenacious on this subject. It is true, they will not attempt particularly to enlighten a weak brother or sister, who really deems it a great, supernatural and miraculous operation; but in speaking with others, who are not so ignorant and superstitious, they are willing, generally, to lay mystery aside, and speak of it as a change of the affections. But they are loth to give all up at once. The clergy, generally, are great hands at doing things gradual—teaching people by degrees—that is, in allowing the people to pull them forward only by degrees—and it is probably best, on the whole, that there are "wheel horses" to hold back the car of improvement!—) so that they still teach the total depravity of the affections, (instead of that pound of flesh called the heart,) and their total change in nature. But this, too, will have its day—rather its dawning—and then will come the light of divine and philosophical truth. In changing the sinner from sin to holiness, God does not change the nature of one single affection he has given him. Every affection man has as a sinner, he has as a saint—every faculty, every sentiment, every power remains unchanged in its nature. A great change has truly taken place—a wonderful change—so much so, that it is no wonder that poor, ignorant, deluded, superstitious men, women and babies are easily made to believe it a supernatural change—one effected by immediate, direct and especial divine agency.

But it is not so. The joy of conversion and the influence of early impressions, deceive them. They love God with the same love that they always had for any thing that excited highly their admiration, reverence and gratitude—they love virtue with the same love they had for vice—and they love their children, parents, partners, friends, with the same love they had for them before the change—only their love is increased by higher conceptions of goodness—and purified by better motives—and enlarged by perceiving their more extended relationship to God and man. The love is the same, but it has changed in its objects, and improved in its operations, and all for the better. This is the true change of heart. A. B. G.

SLANDERER CAUGHT.

Recently, a man named Cowan committed murder in Cincinnati. Shortly after, the Editor of the "Cincinnati Journal and Western Luminary" published that Cowan, "only one week before he committed the dreadful deed, carried a Bible to the shop, by which to convince his fellow-workmen that there was no hell...that all men would be saved," and further asserted of Cowan, that "he was a staunch advocate of Universalism." Some of our friends immediately waited on the murderer, and he gave them a certificate, declaring that he was not a Universalist, and further, that he was a regular and standing member of the Methodist Episcopal church. The Editor of the Chronicle was called on, who gave the name of his informant, but positively refused to publish the counter-statement!—"Dwelleth the love of God in such a man?" Why keepeth he not, then, the commandments of God? Why beareth he false witness against his neighbor? A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

Br. Price, the publisher of this excellent periodical, offers, for every four subscribers to the first volume of the Union entire, one copy of the first volume of the Christian Messenger in sheets. For every nine subscribers to the same, one copy of the first, and one of the fourth volume of the Messenger. And for every fifteen subscribers to the same, one (each) of the first, third and fourth volumes of the Messenger. A. B. G.

Will Br. Price preserve me a full and perfect file of the Messenger from the beginning? and charge it to G.

LOCAL AGENTS.

The former local agents for this paper will generally continue to act. We therefore deem it unnecessary to publish their names, unless a change occurs. We shall in such cases notice them. The following persons will in future act as agents in their respective places and vicinities.

Alva Wicks, Antwerp; Gardner T. Barker, Esq., Moriah; Isaac Mendall, Bellville; L. M. Winslow, Smithville; Spencer B. Ward, Cazenovia; Chauncey Lovelace, Attica; William Martin, Guilford Centre, Vt.; Truman Wheeler, Mount Pleasant, Pa.; P. T. Ingram, Waddington.

GENERAL AGENTS.

The following brethren are to be added to the list in our first number.

Rev. J. Potter, Cooperstown.

Rev. Daniel Tenny, Carlisle, Ohio.

Br. J. P. Aspinwall is authorized to act as agent for this paper, wherever he may labor and travel.

SNOW STORM.

From Friday evening till Sunday afternoon last, one of the heaviest snows ever known in this country at one fall, was experienced in this city and vicinity. The snow fell to the depth of from three to four feet upon a level, and in many places drifted to the depth of six or eight feet. Roads and streets were completely impassable for several days. The roofs of several buildings were crushed in by the immense weight of snow upon them, among which was the Third Presbyterian church, on Fayette-street. The Tuesday's Whig says, but three of the churches in the city were open for public worship on Sunday, viz., Episcopal, Baptist and Methodist. In this, however, our neighbor of the Whig is mistaken. The Universalist church was opened, and a discourse preached to a small but very attentive congregation. We do not profess to be over-much religious, but then we do not like to lose the credit of what little piety we have, any more than those who profess so much piety that they cannot be deprived of the privilege of telling in public how many secret prayers they offer up in the course of the week. S.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. A. KINNE at South Otselec—Br. M. B. NEWELL at Richfield Springs.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. SKINNER at Fort Plain and Br. GROSH in this city—Br. M. B. NEWELL at Salisbury—Br. KINNE at Nelson Flats, and at Erieville in the evening—Br. L. C. BROWNE at Middleville, and at Newport in the evening—Br. ASPINWALL at Leyden—Br. W. SIAS at Copenhagen, and at South Champion in the evening—Br. T. J. SMITH at Richfield Springs—Br. WAGGONER at Solomon Diefendorf's at 10 A. M., at Newville at 2 P. M., and near Mr. Reed's in the evening—Br. W. DELONG at Gilbertsville—Br. C. B. BROWN at Mexico, and at Union Square in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday instant, by Br. C. S. BROWN at Norwich village—Br. W. BULLARD at Knox's Corners, Augusta—Br. C. B. BROWN at the Red schoolhouse, Hastings, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and at Parish, at 2 o'clock, P. M.—Br. S. R. SMITH at Madison—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. J. BODEN at West Hartwick.

A Universalist Conference will be held at the Union church, (West part of) Fort Ann, Washington county, on Wednesday and Thursday, 20th and 21st inst. Ministering brethren generally are invited to attend.

Br. M. B. NEWELL will preach in the evenings of the 18th inst. at Vanhorneville—19th, Paine's Hollow—21st, Mohawk village—22d, Middleville.

DEDICATION.—The Union meeting-house at Newville, Herkimer county, will be dedicated to the worship of God, on Thursday next, 21st inst. Sermon at 10 o'clock, A. M., by Rev. Mr. WICKING (Lutheran). Sermon at 1 o'clock, P. M., by Br. D. SKINNER or S. R. SMITH (Universalist).

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE ADVENT.

The earth was full of gloom and death,
The breeze sent pain on ev'ry breath,
Dark clouds of woe thick filled the skies,
Deep grief was heard, and heart-felt sighs.
At ev'ry pore the mountain bled,
The streamlet rested in its bed,
Old ocean thundered from his deep
As lions do when waked from sleep—
Amid his wrath, amid his foam,
The trav'ler found a hapless home,
The desert sought the flow'ry land,
And beauty wilted 'neath its sand;
The feather'd choir had ceased their song
Nor floated through the vale along.
Alas, for man! ah, where was he?
He swam in woe, a frowning sea—
Death had inscribed on ev'ry brow
The stern decree, his fatal vow.

But, hark! Compassion speaks from heaven—
"A child is born—a Son is given."
He comes—he comes—in light—in flame—
The darkened vault now shines again!
Lo! all receives new life—new breath—
Now rolls along the shore of death,
In songs of sure—yes, sure salvation:
To every soul—to every nation!
Does ocean yet its groans repeat?
Christ speaks—his calm beneath his feet:
He strews the vale of life with bliss,
The hills they shout for happiness.
Lo! Sharon wakes in fadeless bloom,
The lily buds, the desert's gloom
Revives to light, th' echoing song
From voiceless tribes, now rolls along
The vales again—and man's deep grief
At death's decree, now finds relief;
For, ENDLESS LIFE, on every page,
All read from youth to wintry age.
The sick—the dead—Christ's blessings share—
The hungry to his feast repair—
The erring make his paths their choice—
The murmuring learn to heed his voice—
Sinners are saved—the lost are found,
And heav'n and earth these strains resound—
"Glory to God on high, be giv'n,
And peace on earth, to man, from heaven!"

JUVENUS.

FASTING.

HOW ENJOINED BY CHRISTIANITY.

Such are a few facts connected with the history of fasting. We have seen that it has prevailed in all ages, and in all religions, and that it has been carried to a great extent by the followers of Christ. Believing, as I do, that whatever was established and enjoined by our Saviour, is beneficial to mankind, and not injurious to health, it becomes important to ascertain what were his injunctions respecting fasting. It must, I think, strike every one with surprise, who has paid any attention to the fasts of the Christian church, to find that, as Calmet observes, "it does not appear by his own practice, or by his commands, that our Lord instituted any particular fast;" and the learned Mosheim observes—"no law was enacted by Christ and his apostles concerning fasts; but the custom obtained, that most Christians, occasionally and privately, joined abstinence from food with their prayers; and especially when engaged in undertakings of great importance. How much time a man should spend in this exercise, was left to the private judgment of each individual; nor did a person expose his character at all, if he thought it sufficient for him to observe only the rules of strict temperance. Of any solemn public fasts, except only on the anniversary day of the crucifixion of Christ, there is no mention in the most ancient times. Gradually, however, days of fasting were introduced; first by custom, and afterwards by legal sanction. Whether any thing of this nature occurred in the first century, and what days were devoted to fasting, we have not the means of deciding."

It is true that Christ himself fasted forty days and nights, but this is more than human nature can sustain. He gave no command for any one else should attempt it, though it is true that in all ages, many have attempted to imitate Christ in this respect.* The disciples of John interrogated Jesus, respecting the non-observance of fasts by his own disciples. "Then came to him the disciples of John, saying, Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not? And Jesus said unto them, Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, [fast] as long as the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." Matt. ix: 14, 15. His reply cannot be construed in favor of the custom. He alludes to a coming time of sorrow, when nature would withdraw the appetite, and then fasting would occur as the natural result of sorrow. This kind of fasting, the New Testament may commend, but it does not authorize any other.

* Dositheus, a Samaritan, fasted so rigorously as to occasion his death. He ought, however, to be ranked among the insane.

"Defraud not ye one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that satan tempt you not for your incontinency." 1 Cor. vii: 5. This is alluded to, as supporting and authorizing fasting. It can hardly be so considered if we receive the above quotation from the common translation. But late investigations show that the word fasting is an interpolation.* Indeed, there is much in the New Testament to show that all ordinances were done away. St. Paul says, (Col. ii:) that Christ has effaced the obligation we were under as respects ordinances; and that we shall not be judged in "meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day." Tertullian, who flourished in the second century, observes—"the Christian's God has not prescribed any fast, nor forbid him any aliment: that which he has forbidden him are actions that are bad; that which he has commanded, are actions that are good." (De Jejeune adv. Psych.) St. Basil also observes—"the true Christian fast consists in abstaining from vice—to fast from disputes, malignity and injustice."

This kind of fast is of perpetual obligation upon the Christian; but I see no ground, in any of the teachings or practices of Christ, for abstaining from food, unless the appetite is impaired. When Christ had fasted forty days, it is said that he became an hungered, and did eat; plainly implying that during the period of fasting, he had not been an hungered. Indeed fasting, as a Christian duty, is hardly reconcilable with the care which Christ had for the bodies of men, as evidenced by his numerous miracles wrought for its welfare, and even a miracle to feed the multitude.

But though Christ did not authorize fasting from food, yet his religion is one of strict temperance. While it imposes no observances that may not be kept, alike in every place, and by all mankind, it gives liberty to enjoy the gifts of God; at the same time discountenancing austerities and penances, and too great sensual indulgence.—Brigham's Influence of Religion upon the Health.

INTERESTING ANECDOTE.

It is not long since a gentleman was travelling in one of the counties of Virginia, and about the close of the day stopped at a public-house to obtain refreshments and spend the night. He had been there but a short time, before an old man alighted from his gig, with the apparent intention of becoming his fellow-guest at the same house. As the old man drove up, he observed that both the shafts of his gig were broken, and that they were held together by withes formed of the bark of a hickory sapling. Our traveller observed further, that he was plainly clad, that his knee buckles were loosened, and that something like negligence pervaded his dress. Conceiving him to be one of the honest yeomanry of our land, the courtesies of strangers passed between them, and they entered the tavern. It was about the same time that an addition of three or four young gentlemen was made to their number, most, if not all of them, of the legal profession. As soon as they became conveniently accommodated, the conversation was turned by one of the latter, upon an eloquent harangue, that had that day been displayed at the bar. It was replied by the other, that he had witnessed the same day, a degree of eloquence, no doubt equal, but that it was from the pulpit. Something like a sarcastic rejoinder was made to the eloquence of the pulpit, and an able and warm altercation ensued, in which the merits of the Christian religion became the subject of discussion. From six o'clock until eleven, the young champions wielded the sword of argument, adducing with great ingenuity and ability, every thing that could be said, pro and con. During this protracted period, the old gentleman listened with all the meekness and modesty of a child, as if he was adding new information to the stores of his own mind; or perhaps he was observing with philosophic eye, the faculties of the youthful mind, and how new energies are revolved by repeated action; or, perhaps, with patriotic emotion, he was reflecting upon the future destinies of his country, and on the rising generation, upon whom those destinies must devolve; or, most probably, with a sentiment of moral and religious feeling, he was collecting an argument, which (characteristic of himself) no art would be "able to elude, and no force to resist." At last, one of the young men remarking that it was impossible to combat with long and established prejudices, whirled around, and with some familiarity, exclaimed, "well, my old gentleman, what think you of these things?" "If," said the traveller, "a streak of vivid lightning had at that moment crossed the room, their amazement could not have been greater than it was with what followed."

The most eloquent and unanswerable appeal was made for nearly an hour, by the old gentleman, that he ever heard or read. So perfect was his recollection, that every argument urged against the Christian religion, was met in the order in which it was advanced. Hume's sophistry on the subject of miracles, was, if possible, more perfectly answered, than it had already been done by Campbell. And in the whole lecture there was so much simplicity and energy, pathos and sublimity, that not another word was uttered.

An attempt to describe it, said the traveller, would be an attempt to paint the sunbeams. It was now a matter of curiosity and inquiry who the old gentleman was. The traveller concluded that it was the preacher; from whom the pulpit eloquence was heard—but no—it was the Chief Justice of the United States.—Winchester Repub.

Yes, reader, and John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States, was a Universalist—what some very self-righteous people, who can scarcely tell why they are Christians, or when Christianity originated, call an infidel!

AS A SYSTEM OF RELIGION, ADAPTED, AND EVEN NECESSARY, TO PRODUCE A PERFECTLY PURE DEVOTION AND PIETY; AND, THROUGH THEM, A CORRESPONDING BENEVOLENCE AND RECTITUDE OF LIFE.

By SAMUEL BROWN, of Utica.

That man is naturally a religious being, has been affirmed by some, but denied most strenuously by others, who, themselves, are accounted religious, and pretend to that character.

Long has it been publicly taught by the press, as well as by the pulpit, that religion is not a natural production of the mind of man; but a principle planted there, in after life, by some gloomy idea—some adverse fortune—some harangue of a religious teacher—the fear of death, or the forebodings of futurity. But they surely do not consider that "nothing can be established, unless it be founded in nature; even if, afterward, it should become contrary to nature."

That religion is a native principle in the mind of man, is proved by the fact, that savage hordes and barbarous tribes, as well as those who bask in civilization, all experience the power of this indestructible principle. Those few nations insulated from any abodes of civilization, who have no immediate sensible object of adoration; whose scanty intellect has not yet embodied the object of worship in any hieroglyphical form, or any tangible figure; nevertheless prove, by their sacrifices to the souls of the dead; by the hopes and fears which inspire them of again meeting them; by their belief in magic and sorcery, and by the gross means they employ to evade or increase its influence; that they evidently possess a religion of some kind. If they did not, missionaries would toil in vain, and their annual reports, consequently, be impudent falsehoods.

It is not an innate idea, but a native tendency of the human mind; and, as such, is universal and indestructible, however the forms it may assume, or the systems it may establish, may differ and vary at subsequent periods, or in distant places.

This essence of religion consists in the tendency of the soul of man to the infinite. It makes us know its existence, by creating in us an insatiable desire to possess something we have not yet acquired, but for which we look forward to futurity, as to an indefinite period of time, when we shall find perfect fruition and gratification of those desires which are every day rising up within us, asking for something more. In the midst of successes and triumphs, neither the universe man has subjugated, nor the order he has established, nor his various enjoyments, satisfy his soul. He has learned every thing; he has calculated every thing; and is weary of learning; he finds these things all mechanism, more or less perfect, and a voice cries from the depth of his being, that these cannot be the bounds of his existence—the termination of his insatiable desires.

This native tendency of the human soul to infinity, in the wild savage, leads to the pleasing contemplation of again enjoying his hunting grounds and his friends, accompanied by his favorite dog, after death. In those who have made some farther strides towards civilization, the same rich rewards and pleasing expectations are thought to be ensured by the observance of some rites, however bloody; by the endurance of some voluntary pains, or by the performance of some severe penance, considered necessary to render propitious some great spirit, whose benevolent or malignant attributes, guide them in the choice of their rites and observances.

In those who are advanced yet farther towards the confines of civilization, the march of mind, actuated by that native tendency to a happy futurity, seeks for it in the observance of certain acts and deeds, which they call duties; as heroism in war, implacable enmity to enemies, invincible fortitude to endure pain and sufferings, and a fixed scorn of the fear of death.

These are but so many forms which this native tendency of the untutored mind assumes, all tending to futurity, and more or less perfect as the march of intellect progresses. But although the mind feels a fixed attachment to every form, while it exists; when any thing better offers, the public sentiment loosens its hold on the old system, and as eagerly seizes on a new system that seems to offer something better. Each period considers what is thought its superior light as the impassable limits of what is true and good. But as the march of intellect proceeds, a new period comes, in turn, to remove these limits and set up new boundaries, which succeeding generations are destined to displace, in order to extend them still farther.

These are the outlines of the philosophy of religion; the laws of that germ which the infinite Being has placed in our bosoms, in order to prepare us for the truths which we are to learn. But this germ soon becomes stationary—soon arrives at its acme—at its ne plus ultra—if unaided by a communication from the great Father of spirits. It has never progressed farther than to establish the system of a Confucius, or the religion of the Brahmins of Hindostan, or written its lore in Egyptian hieroglyphics, or embodied its theory in the classical sculpture of ancient Greece.

It is one of the best arguments, a priori, in favor of a supernatural revelation from the Deity to his creatures—that this religious sentiment, (which all are caused to possess, and which has a maturity it cannot pass,) should have assistance afforded to its short vision, to enable the mind of man, ultimately to comprehend some of the attributes, and see some of the perfections of Him who is infinite; and thus be enabled to hold converse with him, and to exalt frail human nature, by a contemplation of Divinity.

That a father, who constantly resides amongst a numerous family of children, never intimates to them what he would have them perform to gratify him; or communicates to them some knowledge of his will; is an event which has never yet occurred; and we may assert positively, therefore, that the great Father of all does not act on such a plan.—But his communications are made in conformity to the mental state of his family, as dictated and executed by infinite wisdom; and the forms of pure religion, although established by revelation, have changed, because good only for a time, and requiring something better to be substituted. Thus the patriarchal religion gave way to the Jewish; and the Jewish religion vanished before the superior display of light and truth, ushered in by Christianity. The Jewish law was a divine law, and was accepted by the religious sentiment of the nation; but it was good only for a time—it was abrogated by its Author—the religious sentiment detached itself from it, and a new form was substituted.

Christianity is that religion which was revealed to Jesus Christ, by the Deity himself, and by him promulgated to the world, for their improvement in the knowledge of the final destiny of the species, and for their advancement in mental happiness, by the constant practice of virtue; which happiness is capable of being increased into bliss. This is the last revelation which the Deity has made to his creatures, and is so congenial to our present state—to that epoch to which we have now arrived—that we are led to think its limits will not be enlarged by any future, extra revelations.

Christianity is a religion of reason; it appeals to all our best faculties—to all our most pure and enlarged ideas—to our present state of being, and to our future longings and natural presages, in favor of its truth.

Contrary to all other systems, except the Jewish, it laid the UNITY OF THE DEITY as the chief cornerstone, in opposition to the polytheism which the native religious tendency of the human mind had every where established, as it approached to civilization. Jesus declared the unity of God to be the first and great commandment, or principle, of the religion he was about to establish; and the precepts he delivered, were so many corollaries deduced from that acknowledged first principle; and the constant practice of them is suited to raise the moral character of the Christian, above all that Grecian or Roman lore ever contemplated. The fact, that the Deity is one Being, is the basis, by analogy of reason, of all our cheering prospects of the future. For if God is the only ONE GOOD BEING, all our faculties of body or mind are derived from Him; the direction of their native tendencies He superintends; their aspirations after future happiness He inspires; and that he must therefore be, ipso facto, without caprice, or partiality, leads to the last conclusion—the highest step of our reason—the last link of the concatenations of argument; namely, that the Deity, by the unchangeability which his unity demonstrates, having regarded his creatures with benevolence for a short period of time, will pursue their unending happiness with a constancy which will admit of no relaxation; with a fixedness of determination no contingencies can divert—no change of circumstances can alter—no period of existence can terminate!

Although this essential, this first principle of Christianity was so clearly taught by Jesus and his successors, and, like a mighty lever of prodigious magnitude and power, overturned the long established polytheism, idolatry and vices of the Roman empire; yet it soon degenerated, and became associated to the prevailing customs of the ages through which it successively passed. In fact, men were its depositaries—it was preserved in earthy vessels—and as the mind sunk in degradation, this great truth became doubted, and at length almost forgotten. The Gospel, in its march through despotic Europe, was gradually assimilated to the despotic forms of government; and a system of Christianity became thus established, of a contracted tendency in its theory; and in its results and final triumphs, as narrow as the contracted minds possessed by the men of those ages. The divine unity was changed into a trinity of persons—and the Father, by natural consequence of reason, became the great executioner of his sentient family, partaking of the character of secular tyrants, whose favors were dispensed to favorites selected by caprice; whose anger was unrelenting; whose justice was cruelly insatiate and unappeasable; or if ever appeased, effected by the offer of a bribe, or a large compensation, for an imaginary insult. Secluded by pompous palaces, and numerous trains of civil and military attendants, from any knowledge or direct communication with their subjects, they were not approachable, but through the aid of officers who sold their favors. Who can wonder, when these pageants and despotic tricks were continually acted before the eyes of the multitude, and associated with religious feelings, that the doctrines of the eternity of hell torments; the inflexible vindictiveness of Divine justice; the efficacy of the blood of Christ to appease or satisfy that justice;

the absolute need of the merits of Christ for our acceptance with the Father; the utter worthlessness of all good works to propitiate his favor; were so firmly established? Especially is it no wonder, when we reflect on the conduct of the clergy, who were believed to sustain a kind of mediatorial office with the supreme Being, and who sold the powers committed to them at regular prices—and hence the old proverb, “no penny, no pater noster.”

Even the feats of chivalry, the wars of the crusades, the common forms of administering justice—all conspired to rivet these ideas in the mind; and an attempt to prove the premises by the sacred Books, clinched them so fast, that ages of superior light have not been able to fully unravel the labyrinth. Add to which, the Northern hordes had overrun Europe; had burnt her libraries, and changed her manners; the human mind sunk into a lethargy, and submitted to any authority the church imposed on it.

Christianity assumed a new form congenial to the age, and a system became established which was acknowledged by the public sentiment, in unison with the native tendency of the then untutored mind; the religious faculty soon formed a fixed attachment to it, deeming it a superior light, and the impassable limits of whatever was true or good.

But learning revived; printing was discovered; books were multiplied—and are now to be procured at a price within the reach of nearly every man—the march of intellect proceeds; despotism is denounced, and a new epoch has arrived to set up new boundaries.

It requires not the spirit of prophecy to know the signs of the times, or the fate of those obsolete ideas; the public sentiment is changed; the forms of government are altered, and no longer afford a simile to the supposed administration of the divine economy. Rulers are respected only as they are just and good; not for any tinsel of splendor they may put on, or any cold reserve they may affect, by being lifted on the stilts of power. Punishment is no longer regarded as vindictive, but it is generally believed that it ought, at all times, to be corrective. The awe with which hereditary rights and privileges used to influence, has vanished. Religion is no longer thought to be a system of dry speculation, or an assent to dogmas; but a thing of practice, of which the mere theory is of little worth.

The ancient régime is upheld with a zeal worthy of a better cause; but who that runs may not read TEKEL in the most prominent characters, inscribed on all her halls, on all her teachers, on all her institutions?

The leading feature of the old orthodox system, was the unforgiving nature of the Deity; if once angry, never to be appeased without a compensation of pound for pound, cent for cent; hence, by an easy deduction, came the eternity of hell torments, (the most horrifying of all horrid ideas,) and the vicarious atonement of Christ. But what was the moral character of these believers? If the graces of Christianity ever shone in them; it was in contradiction to what they professed to believe of their Deity. If the pure love, which a knowledge of the perfections of Deity ought to inspire, ever enlivened their souls; it was in those happy moments when they chanced to forget their creed. And philanthropy only warmed their bosoms, when they haply forgot they were peculiar favorites of Heaven, and merely felt themselves men.

Hence, it may be inferred with certainty, that a fixed belief, founded on the decided evidence within every man's reach, in the perpetual benevolence of the supreme Being, is absolutely necessary to produce a perfectly pure devotion, and piety, and rectitude of life.

When Universalism (or a fixed belief in the universal benevolence of Deity, as exhibited in love to his creatures, without beginning or end) has received the assent of the mind, through the medium of the understanding, and is fostered by the affections, its influence on the soul of man is overwhelming; it is, to use a metaphor of holy writ,

“as a frontlet between his eyes;” an idea full of the most sublime sentiment, diffusing the purest pleasure; it resides constantly with the recipient, whether he wakes or sleeps, whether engaged in the active or social duties of life. It strews the paths of affliction with roses; gives prosperity a superior zest; makes the journey of life a pleasant walk; and the hour of death like the calm setting of a Summer sun.

When in secret retirement, or in public worship, he approaches to the Father of his spirit, either in prayer or praise, his affections are filial; his confidence is unbounded, and his devotion is of the most pure and exalted nature, springing from a constant conviction of the undeviating and ceaseless benevolence of the great Being, before whom he prostrates himself.

As by nature we are inclined to imitate whatever of the sublime or pleasing we meet with in life; so it is his highest delight to imitate the glorious source of all goodness; his highest aim to become a fellow-worker with God in the great work of universal benevolence; and as an outward sign of the vitality of that inward principle, he is careful to demonstrate its existence, by a rectitude of life; striving to become “a living epistle, read and known by all men.”

R. S. JOHNSON.

THE CONVERSION AND CLOSING SCENE.

BY REV. J. BUSHNELL.

The earliest preachers of Universalism, in our country, confined their labors, principally, to the northern Atlantic States. It was in this part of “the new world,” that the venerable Murray spent some years, in preaching the Gospel of the grace of God. His ministrations were in demonstration of the spirit, and with power. Many who had “gone astray,” were brought back into the fold of Christ; and the Redeemer's name was glorified. Among the number who became converts to Universalism under Mr. Murray's preaching, was Mr. R. S. Johnson, then residing in Gloucester.

Considering Mr. Johnson's general bent of character, it is singular that he should have been even one of Mr. Murray's hearers. Of naturally a religious temperament, at quite an early age he attached himself to one of the popular sects of the day. And having great fixedness of principle, aided by strong approbateness, he soon gained absolute ascendancy over his party. And he was careful to so manage as to retain it, that on all proper occasions, he might exert it. This was an enviable distinction in those days. Still, Mr. Johnson was thought eminently deserving of it; and his smile was courted by all classes. But with all his distinctions, and supposed firmness, when the truth came he yielded to its subduing power. On the very first evening of Mr. Murray's appearance in the place, he was prevailed on, by his wife, to go and hear him. When she first spoke of it, however, he was tremendously shocked. He could hardly believe it possible, that so excellent, pious, and, withal, so prudent a woman, as he esteemed his wife to be, should wish to expose herself to hearing so dangerous a doctrine. But he loved his wife, and he wished not to oppose her will, even in this. And further, he respected her judgment; and when she reasoned with him on the safety, not to say propriety of hearing and judging for themselves, he willingly assented. And taking her arm, accompanied by Edgar, who was then sixteen years of age, they cautiously repaired to the house of Mr. S—, a distance of half a mile; where a collection of people had already assembled, and the preacher was meekly, yet fervently addressing the throne of grace. The conclusion of the prayer was purely the effusion of a soul that had drank deeply at the fountain of God's love. It breathed the living benevolence of Heaven. The singing was good—and the sermon, to say the least, was a methodical display of the warm and vivid truths of the Gospel.

With this favorable opportunity for knowing the doctrine of impartial grace, we might think the most obdurate would become its converts. But not so with Mr. Johnson. His prejudices were too deeply seated; and the thick veil, that clouded his mental vision, was drawn too close, to admit at once the true light of the Gospel. But Mrs. Johnson was of easier perception. As the speaker advanced from argument to argument, till the enrapturing theme on which he dwelt glowed upon his very countenance, her warm heart was left with no weapons of defence. The foundation she had so long rested upon, she saw removed—the eternal promises were presented, and their ample assurance to sinful man, caught her flowing gratitude; and her heart praised God as she rejoiced in his great goodness.

Mr. Johnson, it is true, did not hear with his wife; nor, like her, believe to the joy of his heart; but he was by no means indifferent to what was said. All that he heard and witnessed, was with evident concern. Before the service was half through, the whole man seemed on the rack of torture. And he was no sooner out of the house, than he gave vent to his agitation. “It was blasphemy! The veriest doctrine of the devil, that was ever preached! Why, did you not see how he perverted the Word of God? And what assurance! The true image of satan, transformed into an —.” The enraptured, and now weeping wife could hear no more. Such words, to one whose very soul was full of the doctrine, were extremely painful. Seizing his hand, as if to stay the flood of passion, she entreated him to be composed. “We both came with perhaps equally distant expectations of hearing the truth. But allow me to say, for myself, I devoutly believe I have heard the truth of God. My conviction—my feelings—my whole soul, all bear me witness, that never, till this night, have I known ‘the fullness of the blessings of the Gospel of Christ.’ You may think it strange. And I acknowledge, myself, I know not how it is so. But the light and power of divine truth, who can resist it? It seemed to me that the love of God filled the whole house; and that every soul, like my own, had caught the heavenly flame. Surely you will not deny the preacher's sincerity; if you must still think him in an error. Allow him that, and I will be satisfied in the exercise of your usual candor, in judging of the truth of what he said.”

By this time they had reached the yard that fronted their house. Mr. Johnson—at first, surprised at the firm decision of his wife; now, partially rebuked by the warmth and kindness of her words—made no further remark. But could you have seen the workings of his mind rendered visible in his features, as he passed up the little alley that led to the house, and as he entered, and seated himself at his desk, on which lay an open Bible, you would say, there was something going on within, not unfavorable to his future reconciliation to that doctrine he so lately considered despicable. The truth is, what he had heard, had made a deeper impression on his mind, than he was then willing to allow. And the words of his wife were most fitly spoken. They had the happy effect to bring him back to himself. And he was led, from that night forward, into a train of thought, and prayerful investigation of the sacred Scriptures, which seldom fail to reward the mind with the rich treasures of immortal truth. * * *

It was in the month of September. The sun had just sunk behind the brown hills that skirted the western view, and its deep bronze hue, thrown back upon fading nature, added richness to the many tokens of divine benevolence.

“A beautiful evening this,” said Mrs. Johnson, as she sat with her husband by the window that looked out upon the spreading distance, in the direction of the lingering day. “How clearly does this, with the promise of returning day, speak of the disposition of our common Father. I have thought, many times, that nature herself furnished enough to destroy every partial view of the Deity, and inspire the heart with pure and acceptable worship.”

“This evening,” replied Mr. Johnson, “reminds me very sensibly, of the first time we were favored with hearing Mr. Murray. If I mistake not, it is now exactly a year. Yes; I am quite certain it was on the evening of the 10th of September. How widely different were our views and feelings then, from what they now are! Oh, may our hearts ever bless the Lord, who has brought us to a knowledge of himself, and his great and glorious Gospel. We can now worship him as the best and holiest of Beings. And his law—we now see it just and holy; and it is our delight to keep it. We have learned, to our profit, that intelligent beings need no stronger inducement, and can have no higher motive to break off from sin, and serve God, than love. This leads on to righteousness—in the way of life everlasting."

"How very true. It is the power of God unto salvation. And may we always rejoice together under its influence. Is Edgar out this evening?"

"I saw him in the garden a few minutes ago. He will be in soon."

"I was only thinking of him. Your words reminded me of the late change in his feelings and taste. We used to think him almost perfect. But we know there has been a very great improvement in his virtues. It cannot be denied. And what can we impute it to, but religion?"

"Not anything else. It is that exclusively. And we may only look at ourselves, and we shall find the same happy effects of the doctrine. It so regulates the will and smooths down the feelings. There is nothing it touches, but is the better for it. Even virtue, itself, grows brighter under the full rays of the Sun of Righteousness. I am more anxious every day, to have this doctrine known. It will not be rejected, I am confident, if it can only be known. And its holy and moralizing influence would—"

Here the conversation was abruptly broken off. Edgar entered the room, and told his father the coach waited. Mr. Johnson had engaged a passage from Boston to New-York. The vessel was in readiness, and designed to sail early on the following morning. So there was no time to be lost. And taking an affectionate leave of his family, he stepped into the coach, and was soon out of hearing on his way to Boston.

Seven weeks from the day on which Mr. Johnson left for New-York, a letter was handed to his wife, bearing date "New-York, October 6, 18—," from which we copy the following:—

"I have hardly strength left to bid you farewell. Before you receive this, my mortal will be exchanged for immortality. It is a change we have both looked forward to, with mingled pleasure. Be rejoiced—the prospect grows brighter and brighter. My heavenly Father bids me come—with joy I obey the summons. Edgar, our only and inestimable treasure, I commend to thy and Heaven's care. In the best of mothers may he forget the loss of a father.

"Farewell, till we meet in heaven!

It appeared that Mr. Johnson had finished his business at New-York, and was on the point of returning to the bosom of his much loved home, when he was attacked with the prevailing fever. For three long weeks he was the victim of all that human nature is capable of suffering. But the strong consolations of his God gave him comfort. And he died in the full assurance of a glorious and happy resurrection. During his sickness, every thing was administered that could tend to his relief and comfort. He fortunately fell into the hands of Mrs. Gray, a former acquaintance, who gave him every possible attention. She was a kind woman, as she was amiable; and every thing she did was done cheerfully, with a willing heart.

Mrs. Johnson received the intelligence of her husband's death with the deepest emotion. Her strong sensibility and warm feelings, had nearly overcome her. It was so unexpected and of all things she could anticipate, the most affecting. It could not be, that her mind was fully prepared to receive it. But what was better, her heart was prepared to endure it. In God was her strength. And as she closed the fatal letter, and laid it upon the table, she involuntarily exclaimed, "Thy will, and not mine, O God, be done." She felt to resign all to the disposal of Him, who cannot err. She had considered his doings upon the earth; and knew they were just and wise—coming only from his goodness.

The value of such a frame of mind, in the dark passages of mortal existence, is not to be estimated. It makes every thing look as it is—and keeps back even the thought of murmuring. And there is an inward peace, which those destitute of it cannot understand.

I have often thought of a little conversation which passed between Edward and his mother, a few weeks after the death of Mr. Johnson.

"My father was very dear to us both, and our loss in his death is great indeed."

"My son, do you think you are fully sensible of our loss in your father's death?"

"I endeavor to be; and though I conceive it too great to be replaced, I do not think it right to complain. I know you do not. Happiness is still thine."

"I am always happy my child, when I think on the wise and gracious providence of our heavenly Father. My soul finds rest, though he takes from me what I hold most dear. Death, as well as life, is of God; who is pure love—in which all his works are purposed and effected. Why, then, should we be otherwise than reconciled to whatever he is pleased to appoint for us?"

PARTIALIST RECIPROCITY.

BY BR. K. TOWNSEND.

A friend of mine (and by-the-by, he is an excellent brother) is sometimes called upon by one of these smiling, complaisant gentlemen who are often employed to solicit donations for the aid of a Partialist ministry. The method my friend has adopted appears to me to be a good one. To explain it, I will throw a late conversation into the form of a dialogue.

Presuming that the usual compliments have been gone through with, Mr. A. commences—I have called to see if you will render us a little assistance in supporting our pastor; as you are a liberal man I conclude you will not object.

B. Certainly not, friend A.; I am disposed to be liberal, and will subscribe ten dollars upon this subscription, with only one condition.

A. And what is that?

B. That you subscribe the same amount for our pastor.

A. You would not ask me to aid in supporting heresy?

B. Certainly I should not, unless you had first set me the example.

Friend A. had but a few words in conclusion to offer, and very soon ended his charitable visit.

Now, brethren, suppose you adopt this method when called upon to render your aid in building Partialist houses, supporting Partialist preaching, or in any way to aid or assist them. I am no prophet, but take my word for it this once, and in the words of the apothecary, "I assure you that it will be found a sovereign remedy."

A BASE SLANDER.

Messrs. EDITORS—I cannot repress the belief that you must be, in a great measure, wearied out in refuting the malicious slanders circulated by the enemies of truth against the believers in the doctrine of the restitution. But, brethren, suffer me to call your attention to another, set afloat by a Mr. Bell, a school teacher in this town, against the moral character of Rev. Hosea Ballou.

The story, as related by Mr. Bell, runs thus:—A public discussion was once agreed on, between Rev. Hosea Ballou and a Limitarian clergyman. The manner in which they agreed to conduct the discussion was, each, in his turn, was to ask the other, three questions. It was also agreed, that the Limitarian should propose his questions first.

They met according to agreement. The question first asked, was, "Mr. Ballou, are you in the habit of having family prayer?" Mr. B. objected to the question, as an unfair one. The matter being submitted, it was decided that the question was a fair one. Mr. B. replied to it in the negative. Question second. "Mr. Ballou, do you not, sometimes, drink spiritous liquors to excess, and get drunk?" Mr. B. "Unfair question." Submitted, and decided to be a fair question. Mr. B. replied in the affirmative. Question third. "Mr. Ballou, do you not, sometimes, get angry, swear, and use harsh words?" Mr. B. "Unfair question, again." Submitted, and decided to be a fair question. Mr. B. replied again in the affirmative. The Partialist clergyman now made an appeal, whether he would be justified in prosecuting the discussion any further, with a man of Mr. Ballou's character. It was decided that he would not be justifiable. Thus ended the famous discussion.

REPLY.

If it were not that there are some Partialists so very charitable, that they are ready to receive any slander against a Universalist, however improbable; we should deem the above worthy of no notice. The character of Hosea Ballou is so well known to be free from any suspicion, even, of drunkenness, profanity, or irreligious conduct, that to people acquainted with him, we may appear ridiculous for noticing such charges against him. So be it. We will answer the writer, nevertheless. The story is a fabrication. If Mr. Bell lacks ability to make it, some one has made it for him out of an old story about "a Universalist preacher" without a name, and most unwisely put the name of Hosea Ballou into the story.

We pronounce the story a falsehood—invented by malignity and meanness—and challenge any man, or set of men, to prove it true. If Mr. Bell dislikes the truth thus plainly told, let him, or his employers in scandal-retailing, name the time, when, and the place, where the occurrence happened. THEY CANNOT. A. B. G.

A GOOD REPLY.

"How shall I manage to remove the prejudices of my bigoted neighbors?" said a professed Universalist to his minister; "I have battled them often, and have done my best to convince them of the absurdities of their doctrines; but all to no purpose; they appear actually to be afraid of Universalism." "Live up to your profession," said the minister. "If you have a better faith than your neighbors, let your life be as much better. You may labor in vain to convince people that your religion is of more utility than theirs, unless you practice it in your daily walk. If you believe that God is good to all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works; let your actions to your fellow-men, prove the sincerity of your belief (as they certainly will). If you profess to believe that true piety is attended with happiness, and that sin produces misery; I would advise you, for your own good, and the good of others, to let your life, in every respect, correspond with your profession."

"Whoso readeth, let him understand." • H.

A GOOD HINT.

"I despise the conduct of that hypocritical pretender to religion, Mr. A."—said a rough, boisterous professor of Universalism, to an aged friend—"he pretends to be wonderfully pious; yet will cheat a poor man out of his last penny, and then let him starve rather than assist him." "Then be careful and not follow his example," replied the old man. "Remember that you, too, are a professor of religion—a religion which requires you to be upright, charitable, benevolent and kind; to love even your enemies, and do good to all men as you have opportunity; and unless you imbibed its pure principles, and invariably reduce them to practice, you, too, will be pointed at as a hypocrite, and your conduct will appear equally as despicable to others, as Mr. A.'s does to you."  EPISCOPALIANISM.....NO. II.
 ARTICLES AND SUBSCRIPTION.

As the thirty-nine articles of religion, which have obtained and are universally acknowledged in the Episcopal church, are accessible by all who have any desire to know what they contain, they need not be quoted entire—especially, as from their great length, they would occupy too much space in the columns of a periodical paper. Such parts only as fall under remark, will hence be introduced. Respecting the articles in general, it may be confidently asserted, that, though they must be subscribed by every minister of that church, both in England and America, the great body of the clergy do not believe in some of the most important doctrines which they contain. This will be fully shown in the course of the present article.

No fact stands out to public observation more clearly than this—that the ministers of the Episcopal church do not commonly believe, and have not for a long period of time believed, in the doctrine of predestination, or election. So far from this, they evidently design to have it understood, that they believe in the liberty of the will, on Arminian principles. Their sermons and publications, generally, warrant the conclusion, that they reject the Calvinistic doctrine respecting decrees and atonement; while, at the same time, it is equally manifest that they maintain both the doctrine of free will and an atonement for the sins of the whole world. But they do these things, in defiance of the most decided language of one of the articles which they professedly receive as the rule of their faith.

"ART. XVII. Of Predestination or Election.

"Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation, those whom he hath chosen in Christ, out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honor. Wherefore they who are endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called according to God's purpose, by his spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son, Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works; and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.

"As the godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ, is full of sweet, pleasant and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things, as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love towards God—so for curious and carnal persons lacking the spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes, the sentence of God's predestination, is a most dangerous downfall; whereby the devil doth thrust them either into desperation, or into recklessness of most unclean living no less perilous than desperation."

From this it appears that the framers of the articles of the Episcopal church, were predestinarians. Alas! what a falling away has taken place in the belief of this precious relic of by-gone days. And all the "sweet, pleasant and unspeakable comfort" flowing from "the godly consideration of predestination," has been long since lost to that church. So also, by inference, all other appendant consequences—many of which are carefully enumerated, have departed from those who have forsaken this doctrine, as the urim and thummim from the house of Israel.

On this subject, Mr. Buck, in his Theological Dictionary, art. Church of England, says—"The doctrines of the church of England, which are contained in the thirty-nine articles, are certainly Calvinistical, though this has been denied by some modern writers, especially by Dr. Kipling, in a tract, entitled 'The articles of the church of England proved not to be Calvinistic.' "

Mosheim, speaking of the different countries in which the doctrines of Calvin obtained, says—"It is well known, that the greatest part of those English, who first threw off the yoke of Rome, seemed much more inclined to the sentiments of Luther, concerning the eucharist, the form of public worship, and ecclesiastical government, than to those of the Swiss churches. But the scene changed after the death of Henry VIII., when by the industrious zeal of Calvin and his disciples, more especially Peter Martyr, the cause of Lutheranism lost ground considerably; and the universities, schools and churches became the oracles of Calvinism, which also acquired new votaries among the people from day to day. Hence it happened, that when it was proposed in the reign of Edward VI., to give a fixed and stable form to the doctrine and discipline of the church, Geneva was acknowledged as a sister church; and the theological system there established by Calvin, was adopted and rendered the public rule of faith in England." Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 112. (Baltimore edition, 1832.)

It is very true that, in "the form of public worship and ecclesiastical government," the church of England never adopted the views of Calvin. And to these Mosheim could not refer in the foregoing extract. The "theological system" of Calvin, therefore, refers to those very marked views which he entertained, respecting election and reprobation. And these we have accordingly found, in the seventeenth article of the "public rule of faith in England." And while that article retains a place in the symbols of the Episcopal church, to deny that it is Calvinistic, will only furnish evidence that there are men capable of denying anything—that, in defiance of the plainest forms of expression, there are minds too obtuse to perceive, or too perverse to admit their manifest meaning. See also, Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. pp. 263-6.

Another article, very generally disbelieved both by the clergy and laity of the Episcopal church, is that which relates to the doctrine of original sin. The bare imputation of maintaining that doctrine, in any form which approaches the Calvinistic view of it, would be regarded by most of the members of the English church, as a reflection upon their good sense, as well as their religious principles and feelings. And yet this very doctrine of the original, inherent corruption of human nature, is asserted, and stands forth in its unlovely deformity, in the thirty-nine articles. And this doctrine they have professed to receive before God; and to it, every accredited minister of that church, from the deacon up to the arch bishop, has solemnly subscribed. It reads thus:—

"ART. IX. Of Original, or Birth-sin.

"Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam, (as the Pelagians do vainly talk,) but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil; so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit; and therefore in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation. And this infection of nature doth remain; yea, in them that are regenerated; whereby the lust of the flesh, which some do expound the wisdom, some sensuality, some the affection, some the desire of the flesh, is not subject to the law of God. And although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized, yet the apostle doth confess, that concupiscence and lust, hath of itself the nature of sin."

A verbal difference, indeed, exists, between the expression of this article, and the creed or confession of some other churches; but when it is affirmed that original sin is the "fault and corruption of the nature of every man;" and that in consequence, "he is of his own nature inclined to evil," and "deserveth God's wrath and damnation," there is little room to doubt its import. So little, that few conscientious unbelievers in total, inherent moral depravity ought to subscribe it—and it is believed, that very few men, who can claim to have a conscience on that subject, will do it.

But there are other considerations which confirm the opinion, that we are correct in our estimate of the meaning of this article. The prevalence and influence of Calvinistic views, at the time the articles were drawn up and adopted; and the subsequent pertinacious adherence of the church to the last iota of the system framed under Edward VI., are sufficient pledges of its import. And whatever may now constitute the faith of the Episcopal church—or however far it may have departed from the obvious meaning of its symbols—the doctrine of original sin is, and ever has been, among the items comprised in its articles of religion; and as such, has been, and yet is subscribed, as an article of belief.

It is not because assent to these articles is required, that we object to their use; but because it is compelled, whether they are believed or not. And though we dislike a creed under every form, which cannot be expressed in the language, as well as sustained by the doctrine of the Bible; still we cannot object to the use of any formulary by those who believe what they adopt. But we want words to express our abhorrence of the practice of subscribing a number of articles, set forth as the criterion of religious faith; as a mere matter of accommodation, and to which it is morally certain many—very many do subscribe, without the least faith or confidence in some of its most important dogmas. Such an instrument, involving such practices, must be extremely hostile to individual integrity, and hurtful to public morals. Because under such a state of things, especially when encumbered by governmental patronage, there must always exist a multitude of inducements to prevarication, which the common honesty of mankind will find it extremely difficult to resist.

These evils certainly exist, to a much greater extent, in England, than in this country. There, subscription is a mere matter of State policy. Every place of honor, trust or emolument under the government, as well as the high places of the establishment, are accessible to those only, who can digest the whole body of the thirty-nine articles. The bishops, priests and deacons are at no loss on this subject; the nobility and gentry—together with the swarm of civil and military dependents, treat the subject as one of public convenience. And in consequence, they make their subscriptions under every form of mental reservation. To this, there are many honorable and noble exceptions; yet there are but enough of them, to render the general practice sufficiently odious. The enormity of subscription in England, is represented in very full light, by Dr. Priestly, in his well known letter to the bishops, (see "Tracts with Horsley," Lett. iv, Append. London, 1815,) in which he says:—

"It is, my Lords, a disgrace to this country, and to human nature, that men should, on any pretence whatever, subscribe to what they do not believe. It is perhaps the greatest article in the account of our national guilt, and consequently, that which threatens us with the heaviest of God's judgments. But this guilt is yours, if by your means the cause of it might be removed, and it be not removed. And can it be doubted, but that if your Lordships joined in remonstrance to government on the subject, this great evil, with all its attendant consequences, natural and moral, would be removed, and without delay? * * * * *

"Besides, nothing is more evident, than that all the provisions you make to secure uniformity of doctrine within your church, and especially the real belief of the doctrine of the trinity, does not answer the end. It only produces refinements in sophistical casuistry. On some pretence or other, very different opinions are well known to be held, and are even openly contended for, by the members of your communion—persons who have subscribed all your articles, and who join in the habitual use of your trinitarian liturgy. Lady Moyer's lecture was established for the sole purpose of inculcating the trinity—and yet, one of her lecturers, Dr. Benjamin Dawson, in his sermon on that very occasion, preached nothing but Socinianism under another name. * * * * *

"It is also well known, that the majority of the learned clergy are professed Arminians, though the compilers of the articles, and great numbers of the more zealous of the clergy, are Calvinists. And to my certain knowledge, there have been unbelievers among your clergy, as well as among those of the church of Rome. It is not, therefore, uniformity of faith, but a system of hypocrisy, that is supported by your subscriptions. If, then, you be the friends of sincerity and truth, you will not hesitate to abolish them, especially in universities, where they ensnare and seduce the unwary and the uninformed."

The foregoing, with much more of similar character and import, was written by one who had every means of knowing the truth of what he stated—and who, in making this appeal to the bishops, was more than ever exposing himself to their indignation and vengeance. And these statements, it is believed, have never been contradicted. They are, no doubt, true—and are of themselves, enough to convict the church of England, of a settled determination to maintain a system of religious tyranny at every hazard; even at the enormous expense of individual integrity and national honor.

The Doctor does indeed confine his remarks principally, to considerations relating to the trinity. But they are equally applicable to the particulars before named; and he incidentally but fully sustains the observation, that while the articles are decidedly Calvinistic, many of the clergy are Arminians, and openly reject the doctrine of predestination to which they have subscribed. And we must leave the reader to judge, with what consistency or countenance such ministers can urge upon their hearers, the importance and necessity of sincerity in all their thoughts, and plain dealing in all their intercourse with their fellow-men. Nor, is it easy to conjecture, how far such exhortations would be likely to succeed in the face of such clerical illustration and example.

That the evils resulting from subscription, do not exist in all their latitude in the United States, is not the fault of Episcopacy. They are partly—and only so far, excluded by the excellent provisions of the Constitution, as that some of the principal inducements to prevarication are removed. But the character of the practice, as far as it extends, is precisely the same in this country that it is in Britain. And there are moral consequences attached to clerical subscription in America, which are scarcely to be named; since it is not even pretended that all the doctrines contained in the thirty-nine articles, are believed. And those not believed, are the same in general, which have been already named.

If they really believe the doctrines of original sin and predestination, why do they not assert and maintain them? Other sects which make them a part of their creed, are perpetually thrusting them forward, training the youth in them, and endeavoring by every means to sustain them, for at least, another generation. Not so with Episcopalians; and the little that they say or do respecting these subjects, proves that they do not believe them. And if they are disbelieved—is not subscription by the clergy, a practice which tends to weaken the motives to integrity among them—to weaken the influence of their appeals to the consciences of their hearers against insincerity, and finally calculated to sink the Christian profession to a matter of mere form, instead of exalting it on the basis of principle?

Another fact relative to the views of Episcopalians, claims consideration in this place. We mean that which appertains to the doctrine of endless punishment. Whatever may be the fact respecting the direct avowal of that dreadful doctrine, in the thirty-nine articles, it is certain that the Episcopal church means to have it understood that they are believers in the endless sufferings of the wicked.

As a church, it is supposed by other denominations, to hold such belief in accordance with the meaning of its articles; and it is manifest that a great majority of its members maintain that doctrine.

Yet in this country, it is well known, that there are Episcopal ministers who reject the doctrine of interminable misery, as incompatible with the character of God, and inconsistent with reason and revelation. One of their number, Dr. Tyler, of Connecticut, published, a few years since, and during his lifetime, a work entitled, "Universal Damnation and Universal Salvation;" in which he endeavored to show that the thirty-nine articles favored the belief of the restitution. This is believed to be the only published work on that subject, by a minister who has retained his place—and by the only man of that class, who can lay claim to the praise of common honesty. As all the others only avow the belief of the restitution in the circles of their friends.

How far others of this class might venture under the eye of their superiors, at the present time, we presume not to judge. But we must be permitted to say—if they are as well known to their bishop as to some others, he must have a strange partiality for men, who have one creed for the public, and another for their friends. Like the supposed revealed and secret wills of God—not so secret, but that it is known to his favorites.

As men, as moral and accountable beings, they have an undoubted right to their opinions—but then, for the same reasons, they should be openly asserted, and manfully maintained. For we know of no human character so utterly base and detestable, as a professed Christian minister who can compromise his conscience and his rights, "for a mess of pottage." To call such a crawling creature, a fine, liberal fellow, is at best but doing homage to hypocrisy; and encouraging a sycophant to cringe still lower to public opinion, for the basest of interested purposes. And for the honor of the Episcopal church, and of human nature, these men should abandon their connexion with Episcopacy, or be suspended from their ministerial functions—not for their belief of any particular creed, but for the profession of what they do not believe. And we predict, that if this be not done by the authority to which they are amenable—an insulted and abused public will, in due time, assert its prerogative, and assign them their proper station. TOUR IN OHIO.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

I found the brethren and sisters in Cincinnati enjoying good moral, as well as physical health; and highly pleased with the prospect of a few weeks stated preaching. On the first Sunday in November, I was assisted in the labors of the desk, by Brs. Davis and Jolly. Our congregation was large, and seemed to manifest a deep religious feeling. As the society in this place was somewhat embarrassed, a few years since, they sold their house of worship, and have since held meetings in the Mechanic's Hall and public school-house. These buildings, however, are quite convenient, and will answer a good purpose till they can again build for themselves. Concert of action is, in part, wanting—the means they have.

On the following Monday, I visited Madisonville, seven miles North-east of the city, to attend a meeting held by Brs. Davis and Jolly. We listened to an excellent discourse from Br. Jolly—it was just what was wanting here, for the people had never heard the doctrine before, from a living speaker. The Sentinel and Star, conducted by Br. Tizzard, is located in this village, and I think the cause of truth might be greatly advanced, if proper exertions were used to increase its circulation, and render it more efficient. On November 6, I rode twelve miles to Mount Pleasant, where I had previously agreed to lecture on that evening; but the weather and going were so bad that no meeting was held, and I returned back the next morning with considerable fatigue to myself, and still more to Br. Singer's horse. On the 7th, I again visited Madisonville, in company with Br. Singer, of Cincinnati, who is always engaged in aiding the cause of truth, because he knows from experience its healing power. Our business, at this time, was to attend a meeting for the adoption of a Constitution for the Madisonville Liberal Institute; but circumstances were such that we returned back without proceeding to business. On Sunday, the 8th, our meeting was again held in the Mechanic's Hall, and attended by a respectable number of hearers, who seemed to receive the word with gladness. I was called on the 11th, to attend the funeral of Charles Carroll, son of Mr. Kingsbury, of this city. May Heaven comfort the bereaved parents. On the 13th, I again rode to Mount Pleasant, where I found many pleasant friends; to whom I preached on the evening of that day, in the Union meeting-house. By the politeness of these friends I was brought to the village, and conveyed back to the city, where I preached on the following Sunday in the public schoolhouse. All who attended our meeting this day must have been anxious to hear, for the rain continued to fall through the whole day and evening. Our congregation was not large, but the most devout attention was paid to the word spoken. Our meetings, on the whole, were well attended; and I am pleased with the spirit that is manifested by our friends at this place. They seem to be zealously affected in the good cause, and I think their principles, are in part, exemplified in their actions.

There are many rare curiosities and heart-rending scenes to attract the visitor's attention in this city. While here, I witnessed a grand display of mechanical ingenuity at the Western Museum, called the "infernal regions." Here the shocking abodes and miseries of the supposedly damned are awfully illustrated, by the use of real figures, as large as life! The proprietor of this museum must, therefore, have the honor of aiding modern Orthodoxy, by presenting to the world a real hell instead of an imaginary one. On the morning of the 16th, while I was waiting the departure of the packet for Dayton, I visited, for the second time, John W. Cowan, who murdered his wife and two children, and who was hung on the succeeding Friday. While I was conversing with the unhappy man, a scene occurred which none but the painter can describe. A man, in a fit of insanity, had tried to drown himself in the canal on the preceding night, but was taken out and confined in the jail. Preparations were now making to get him to the hospital; and as they were trying to put on his clothes, he exclaimed in the most frightful manner, "Let me alone, let me alone; the wrath of God is upon me! I shall go—I am going—going to hell!" As he pronounced these words, his countenance became distorted, and his whole frame awfully convulsed. I stood amazed; and while I looked and wondered long, a "Voice, from whence I knew not, for no one I heard, distinctly whispered in my ear, these words, This is" (the groundless fear of) "eternal death."

I left Cincinnati at 9, A. M., on the 16th, and passed up the canal to Dayton. This canal runs through an interesting section of country, and affords many delightful scenes to the traveller. Nothing of importance occurred on board, until within twenty miles of Dayton, when a very amusing attack on Universalism and its advocates, was made by a Presbyterian and a Methodist. The conversation between them and myself—for I could not keep silent—shall, in part, be given at some future time. I entered Dayton at 4, the next morning, and in the evening discoursed to a large number of anxious inquirers. A preacher of our order is needed and would be well sustained in this place and vicinity; for many ways to professional usefulness might be found. On the 18th, I travelled by stage to Springfield, where I had spent one day, on my tour out, in a religious discussion, with Mr. Lucas, a Methodist clergyman of that place. At early candlelighting of this day, the debate was resumed, but not in the same house in which it was commenced, for that was the radical and this the Episcopal Methodist house. But, alas, my first opponent,

Mr. L., was not permitted to enter the field again; for his brethren, becoming distrustful of his talent, or some other cause, had sent for Mr. Raper, their presiding elder, who had accepted the invitation and was now present, prepared for the work. The discussion proceeded between Mr. R. and myself, from this time till nine o'clock the next evening—making, in both debates, two days and two evenings.

I left this pleasant village and its hospitable inhabitants, on the 20th, and passed by stage to Columbus, where I was again received with cordiality and friendship. On Sunday, the 22d, I preached in this city to a small-but worthy and attentive auditory. A full meeting on this day could not have been expected, for it snowed very fast all day, and the going was bad. In this place we have some of the best of friends—I would name them, but I know not where to begin. Providence has ordained it; it is perfectly right that a few such people should be scattered about the world to keep it from retrograding. On the 24th, I found myself in the village of Newark, where Universalism is less fashionable than any other commodity. We held meetings, however, on two successive evenings, which were attended by a number of anxious and respectable hearers. There are a few worthy male friends in Newark, who are not ashamed of the truth, either in public or private; their excellent companions, however, have not yet put away "childish things."

UTICA, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1836.

EXPOSITION OF 1 JOHN v: 20.

Rev. D. SKINNER—I wish to request an exposition of a passage of Scripture contained in 1 John v: 20, as it is a point on which there has been some difference of opinion, in regard to the grammatical relation of "this," in the passage. "This is the true God, and eternal life." The circumstance which led to this difference of opinion, was an attempt to prove, in the "Young Men's Bible society of Hopkinton," that the Son is equal with the Father, or that "Christ is the eternal God."

Please give your views on this point, and oblige, per request of society, I. B. B. HALE.
Hopkinton, December 25, 1835.

REMARKS.

As to a strictly grammatical structure of the word "this," and its antecedent, we are aware that the rules of Grammar will allow it to refer, either to the antecedent immediately preceding, or to a more remote antecedent. Frequent instances occur, in which the Greek outos, rendered here "this," refers to a remote, instead of the immediately preceding antecedent. (See Acts vii: 18, 19, and 2 John verse 7.) And that such is the case in this instance, we think will be evident to any unprejudiced person who will carefully consult the context. The 18th, 19th and 20th verses read thus:—"We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not: but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself and that wicked one toucheth him not. And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness. And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true: [i. e. God] and we are in him that is true, being in his Son Jesus Christ." (Or, "and in his Son," etc., either word is allowable.) "This is the true God and eternal life." By the phrase "eternal life," the apostle doubtless meant to personify Jesus Christ, (he being the instrumental medium of our obtaining eternal life,) or by a figure of metonymy, puts the effect for the medium of its accomplishment. The clear and obvious meaning of the text is, that Jesus Christ, the faithful and true witness, who is "the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person," has come and revealed, or given us a knowledge of the only living and true God—his God and our God, his Father and our Father. "And we are in him that is true" (for in God we live, and move, and have our being) "and (or being) in his Son Jesus Christ" i. e. renewed in the spirit of our mind by the light of his Gospel; (for "he that is in Christ is a new creature.") This accords with what Christ says, John xvii: 3, "This is eternal life, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." "This is the true God and eternal life." That is, God the Father, and Christ the medium in and through whom he hath given to us eternal life. (See Romans vi: 23, and 1 John v: 11.

Surely Christ could not mean, John xvii: 3, that he sent himself. Nor could this be his meaning, John vi: 38, 39; "For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which I have sent me; that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." And although Christ and his Father were one in purpose, design, affection and grace, just as Paul in planting, and Apollos in scattering were one, yet that they were not one and the same being is obvious from common sense, reason, philosophy and Scripture. Christ says to the Jews, John viii: 16-18, "If I judge, my judgment is true: for I am not alone, but I and the Father that sent me. It is also written in your law, that the testimony of two men is true. I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father that sent me beareth witness of me." Thus does he confute his opponents, by the rules of their own law, by proving that he was not alone in bearing witness of himself, but that his Father, a distinct being from himself, also bore witness of him. D. S.

REVERENCE.

That man is naturally a religious being, has passed into a proverb. Among his religious faculties, the existence of no one is more clearly proved, than that of reverence. The misdirection of it, while it manifests its exercise, clearly demonstrates its existence—as clearly as the preparation of warm woollen garments for the poor naked Indians of the torrid zone, proves the existence of a desire to do good to men—i. e., of the sentiment of benevolence. The following case, recorded in history, is an affecting instance of the exercise of reverence and attachment to a personage inferior to Deity, even while disregarding duty to God.

In 1745, when the Chevalier, Prince Charles Stuart, was a fugitive in the land of his fathers from the vengeance of the house of Hanover; he took refuge in the miserable hut of a poor Highlander. Here he remained perfectly secure, protected and hid by his host, for three weeks; notwithstanding death was the penalty of doing so, on the one hand, and thirty thousand pounds sterling for betraying the prince, was the reward on the other! The poor fellow weighed the risk of life as nothing, and the reward, (one hundred and thirty-three thousand dollars) as less than nothing, compared to the indulgence of his feelings toward the lawful heir of Britain's throne—the direct lineal descendant of Scotland's kings. Surely virtue belongs not alone to the wealthy, the titled and the proud—the learned or the powerful!

Yet, in a few months afterward, this very loyal Scot was hung for stealing a cow! What a crime to be linked to such a strong virtue in this lowly peasant's breast! Had but the poor Highlander been trained to regard his heavenly Father with a moiety of the reverence he bestowed on the son of his king—or had he extended to his fellow-men the attachment he manifested to his prince—his days might have been longer in the land. He would not surely have violated the command of God, and injured his brother man. The feelings were implanted in him and richly cultivated—the capacity was occupied—the faculty was exercised—but, alas, it was misdirected—it was pointed to earth instead of heaven—to man instead of God! A. B. G.

ERRATUM.—In Episcopalianism No I., published in our first number, second column of the article, fifth paragraph, for "Sister of Charles V.," read "Aunt of Charles V."

WHAT ARE WE TO THINK?

What are we to think, when the Editor of a religious paper professes to believe in future punishment, and yet pronounces a future judgment "solemn mockery?"

What are we to think, when the Editor of a religious paper professes to believe in future accountability and a righteous retribution for all mankind, yet it the same paper publishes an article, and that of his own selection, to prove "that the doctrine of future rewards and punishments was purely of Heathen origin?"

Can we think such Editors sincere? or must we think that their belief is merely nominal? How long will it take to make all their readers believers in the doctrine they profess, if they continue this course?

REMARKS.

The above we copy from a late number of the Independent Messenger. What is the design of the first question asked, or to whom or what the writer—an Editor, we suppose—alludes, we know not, and it is utterly beyond our power to conjecture. But the allusion in the second paragraph and question is undoubtedly to us and to this paper. The writer alludes to our 51st number, volume six, in which we formally noticed an article from one of the Editors of the Messenger—and in which number, on the last page was a selected article headed Oaths, in which the expression occurred, "that the doctrine of future rewards and punishments was purely of Heathen origin."

Now be it known to the Editors of the Independent Messenger, that we did not select the article above alluded to, nor did we ever see it till it appeared in type. We then much regretted seeing that particular expression and some other kindred ones in it, and had thoughts of expunging the expression above quoted, or appending a note of disapproval, or of leaving out the article altogether. But the paper was just going to press—the printer was in a hurry and could not well wait to do either—so it went to press as it was. The article was selected by the Junior Editor, not on account of the above objectionable, or any kindred expressions, but because he approved of the general sentiments of the article respecting oaths. By what authority the Messenger asserts that we selected that article we know not.

By-the-by, is there nothing ever published in the Messenger—no word, phrase or sentence—but what each of its Editors fully believes and endorses, length and breadth? Verily, neighbors, if a beam is in your own eyes, are you wise to expend so much time and labor in attempting to pull the mote out of your cousin's eyes?

Whether the Messenger has replied to our article relating to C. H., in our 51st number we know not, as several numbers of that paper have missed reaching us. It is, however, a matter of little moment, whether it has or not, unless it is disposed to manifest a little more of a fraternal spirit. D. S.

SALVATION.

It is too frequently the case, in these days of sectarian zeal, that all previous knowledge is disregarded, and truth trampled under foot, to support the teachings of a creed or advance the interests of a party. In vain do the ablest and most esteemed commentators of a denomination instruct its preachers in the true meaning and application of certain texts or phrases; whenever expediency requires, those teachings are forgotten, and the texts and phrases most shamefully perverted and misapplied. The word at the head of this article is one thus used, too frequently, by Partialist teachers. The minister in his study will learn one thing...but hard pressed by an opposing sentiment to his own, he will give a very different view in his pulpit.

Professor Robinson, in his Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, though he bends the positive and universal assertions of the Bible to suit a doubtful and partial creed, well remarks, that "it becomes all students of the Bible to examine carefully the intentions of the writer, [not the teachings of a modern creed,] in passages where this term (or its cognates) occurs; and not to quote at random, as if to be saved always intended eternal salvation, since it may intend only temporal salvation, or a state of offered salvation, or a state of grace leading to salvation, or salvation begun but not yet completed. It may refer to personal safety, to spiritual deliverance, or to natural prosperity. Some may believe to the saving of the soul, (Heb. x: 39,) others, as Noah in his ark, may effect the saving, i. e. the preservation, of their families, ch. xi: 7." Good. A. B. G.

BR. T. P. ABELL.

By mistake it was stated in the list of preachers in this State, published in our second number, that Br. T. P. Abell, of Wyoming, Genesee county, was not yet formally received into fellowship. This was an error—he received a letter of fellowship at the last session of the Genesee Association.

Br. Abell proposes soon to make a tour in Ohio, by request of brethren and societies in that State. We commend him to the confidence and kindness of our Western friends. He will act as agent for this paper on his tour, and is fully authorized to receive money due for past volumes, or payment in advance for the present.

An interesting discussion of the question, whether a part of the human family will be endlessly miserable, or all become holy and happy, is now in progress in the Southern Pioneer and Philadelphia Liberalist, between the conductors of the Baltimore Literary and Religious Magazine, two Presbyterian divines, on the one side, and Rev. L. S. Everett, principal Editor of the Pioneer, on the other side. We have no fears for the result. Truth is mighty et prevalebit. D. S.

THE RECORD.

It is our intention to preserve a complete, yet brief record of every event of interest to the denomination, as news or for reference; but in the labors of closing one, and commencing another volume, we had not time to read the papers and note the items belonging to this department, until now.

SOCIETIES.—New societies of our order have been organized as follows:—In October last, one in Palermo, Me., of twenty-five male, and several female members. On November 23, one in South Dennis, Mass., to embrace the believers in that town, West Harwich and South Yarmouth. November 28, one in Hopkinton, Mass. One, sometime since, in Thetford, Vt. December 20, one at Conesus, Livingston county, N. Y. December 27, one was formed in Kennebunk, Me., of forty-two members. One, very lately, in the south part of Boston city proper, (the fifth in that city,) to hold meetings for the present in Boylston Hall.

CHURCHES.—A church of about eighty believers, formed in the Universalist society in South Boston, was recognized on December 25. Sermon by Br. S. Cobb. Another, in connexion with the society in New-Market, (Lamprey river,) N. H., was recognized on the same evening. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore.

CONFERENCES.—A quarterly Conference of the Hudson River Association was held at Lansingburg, on the 9th and 10th of December. Sermons by Brs. Whitcomb, W. Skinner, Woodhouse, M. B. Newell, and Rayner. Another Conference was holden at Wells' Corners, Orange county, on the 16th and 17th of December. Brs. W. E. Manley, L. C. Marvin, Wells and Cary were present.

PREACHERS.—A Br. Cary, who resides near Sheshequin, Pa., has lately commenced preaching the everlasting Gospel. Br. Hiram Bell, of Ohio, was named in our second number, as receiving a letter of fellowship from the Western Reserve Association. Br. George R. Brown, of Cold Water, M. T., (a moderate name, and betokening temperance!) as will be seen by his letter in last week's paper, has lately commenced preaching the glad tidings of the kingdom. Rev. Anthony F. McCabe, as we learn from the Herald of Truth, has lately renounced Partialism and commenced "preaching the faith he once destroyed." We had heard of him before, as one who was "not far from the kingdom of heaven." He is a native of Nova Scotia, a licensed and ordained preacher of the Presbyterian church, and now resides in Skaneateles, in this State. Br. Chase speaks of him as a finished scholar, a talented preacher and an honest man. Good.

INSTALLATIONS.—Br. Waldo, of Lynn, Mass., and Br. Drew, of Augusta, Maine, as formerly named, were installed pastors of the societies in those respective places. Br. T. F. King was to be installed pastor of the society in Charleston, Mass., on the 10th inst. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore.

REMOVALS.—Br. Jehiel Smith has removed to Barre, Vt. Br. A. L. Pettee, from West Townsend to North Wardsboro', Vt. Br. J. Hemphill, from East Montpelier to Springfield, Vt. Br. Willcox to Portsmouth, N. H. Br. C. C. Burr, from Anson to Bowdoinham, Me. Br. S. C. Bulkeley, from Peekskill, N. Y., to Danbury, Conn.

MEETING-HOUSES.—Besides those already named as having been dedicated in Lynn, Mass., Augusta, Me., and West Rumney, N. H., one was dedicated, December 27, in Wilmington, Vt.; one-half owned by Universalists; sermon by Br. W. Skinner. A commodious hall was also dedicated, December 3, in Franklin, N. J. Sermon by Br. T. J. Sawyer. Another has been dedicated at Amherst, Mass. Sermon by L. Maynard. A Universalist meeting-house is in progress at Southold, L. I., the first of the kind on the Island.

DELAYS.

One or two complaints have reached us respecting the late arrival of our papers at some particular offices. In one case we lost a subscriber. This is hard. We have been particularly careful, thus far, knowing that much depended on first impressions. Two or three times our hands have worked until past midnight in order to avoid a few hours delay in the first day's mailing. And they succeeded in avoiding it.

As to comparisons of the arrival of our paper and other papers—perhaps they do not mail alphabetically, and we do—and thus postoffices beginning with W, X, Y and Z are mailed last—on Saturday evening. As the book we use for mailing, as yet, contains both our own and Br. Skinner's accounts, the uncommon pressure of business prevented us from getting all of the first number to the postoffice on Saturday. This delay we trust will not be necessary in future. Excepting such delay, we plead not guilty. Let the blame fall where it may, or the cause be what it will, we know it is not our fault—nor our misfortune. A. B. G.

THE COMMITTEE.

It has been suggested that it would be satisfactory to many, besides the authors of the articles, if the names of the committee on the prose articles were made known. Those deciding on the articles on Universalism as a system of religion, were Rev. J. A. Aspinwall, of Clinton; John L. Kellogg, student of medicine, of New-Hartford; Dr. J. P. Newland and David Owens, of this city. Three others had been invited to sit with them, but were prevented from attending.

The poems were decided on by a committee of ladies residing in Clinton. A. B. G.

AGENTS.

In a late number of last volume we suggested the propriety of subscribers, in every place where we have no agent, selecting some faithful brother to act as such, and by remitting for the requisite number of subscribers, secure a copy (gratis) either for himself or some brother or sister who would be pleased to read, but does not feel able to pay for the paper. So far as this suggestion has been adopted, we find it saves trouble and expense both to our subscribers and ourselves, and we hope those who have not already adopted the plan will, as early as convenient. G. and H.

Br. W. S. Balch, of Claremont, N. H., has received and accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Universalist society in Providence, R. I., and is soon (if he has not already) to enter on his pastoral labors in the latter place.

EPISCOPALIANISM.

We beg a careful perusal for these articles. They are from a highly valued writer, whose name, if given, would be deemed good authority for their correctness and value. Though apparently long, much more than the usual amount of information will be found condensed in them, so as to cause the reader to wonder they are not longer. They will be continued at intervals of about three or four weeks, each, until the whole investigation (a very thorough one) is completed, and "spiritual wickedness in high places" properly exposed and rebuked. A. B. G.

PRIZE ARTICLES.—We publish them not in the order of their respective merits, but to suit our own convenience and the room we can afford to them in the paper. The Essay and the Poem in this paper, obtained, each, the third best premium offered for their respective classes. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday instant, by Br. C. S. BROWN at Norwich village—Br. W. BULLARD at Knox's Corners, Augusta—Br. C. B. BROWN at the Red schoolhouse, Hastings, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and at Parish, at 2 o'clock, P. M.—Br. S. R. SMITH at Madison—Br. GROSS at New-Hartford—Br. J. BODEN at West Hartwick—Br. WHITNEY at Denmark—Br. T. J. SMITH at South New-Berlin—Br. WAGGONER as Br. P. MORSE may appoint—Br. WOOLLEY at Munsville, and at Siloam in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. T. J. SMITH at Bridgewater—Br. BODEN at Richfield Springs, and at Little Lakes in the evening—Br. WHITNEY at French Creek—Br. WAGGONER at Russia.

Br. WAGGONER will preach in the evenings of Wednesday, 27th inst., at Russia, and on Thursday, 28th, at Martinsburg.

Br. E. M. WOOLLEY will lecture in Pratt's Hollow on the evening of the 30th inst.

Br. WHITNEY will preach on the following evenings:—Sheldon's schoolhouse, Remson, 26th inst.—Collinsville, 27—Leaville village, 28—West Martinsburg, as friends may appoint, 29—South Champion, February 1—Watertown, 2—Brownville, 3—Muskegon, 4—Lafayetteville, 5—Schoolhouse near James Whitney's two miles North of Depauville, 8—Three Mile Creek, near John Consul's, 9—Perch Creek, near Walter Cole's, 10—Theresa, 11—and thence through St. Lawrence county, as may be thought proper.

A Conference will be held in Norwich village, Chenango county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in February next. Ministering brethren are earnestly invited to attend.

PRIZE POEM.

Written for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

CONSOLATION FOR UNIVERSALISTS.

By DAVID WINTER, of Madison, Geauga county, Ohio.

All hail! rejoice, let anthems rise
To God our Father in the skies;
For all his works, below, above,
In chorus sing, our God is love.
Salvation flows in living streams,
Renew'd with every morning's beams,
From God's exhaustless fount of grace,
To all the lost of Adam's race.

All hail! rejoice, the angel's might*
Tears off the veil of mental night,
Which long had wrapped in awful gloom,
The hopes of man beyond the tomb.
Delusion shrinks, resigns his sway
To Gospel light, and mental day;
For God's unchanging oath is given,
To raise a ransom'd world to heaven.

All hail! rejoice, God's truth divine,
In flaming light begins to shine;
Pale Superstition, in affright,
Retreats, and sinks to endless night.
The clouds of Error pass away,
Unveiling ONE immortal day
Of unmix'd love, in Christ display'd,
For every soul that God hath made.

All hail! rejoice, the thrilling sound
Is to creation's utmost bound;
That sin, subdued, shall end in peace,
That death shall die, corruption cease.†
Hope brightens up like burnished gold,
And yields her fruit an hundred fold;
She hears the universe above,
To LIVE in bliss and wasteless love.

All hail! rejoice, the promis'd morn
Lights up, when lo! a world's new-born!
God's re-creating voice rolls through His vast domain! ALL THINGS ARE NEW!‡
Immortal rest, and peace, and life,
Succed to death, and pain, and strife.
Let every tongue, in heartfelt strains,
Respond AMEN, JEHOVAH reigns.§

All hail! rejoice! again, rejoice!
Let every creature tune its voice
For living praise: Let praise go round,
For sin and death cannot be found.
Let anthems rise, sweet, loud and long,
Let all creation chant the song;
No more shall Satan ¶ man enthrall,
For GOD, OUR FATHER, LIVES IN ALL.

* Rev. xiv. 6.—The doctrine of endless misery was first taught, in the Christian church, by Tertullian. The tenets of the Eclectic school of philosophy, at Alexandria, where he was educated, were drawn from the several creeds of Pagan theology, that had preceded. Among the doctrines there taught, was that of endless misery, a relic of the Magian philosophy. That cruel, blighting scheme, has the honor of being introduced among men, by Zoroaster, a Pagan idolator, about 570 years before Christ; and into the Christian church by Tertullian, another Pagan, professing Christianity, about A. D. 260. If it be one of God's truths, it is passing strange, that he should reveal it to Pagans, to be by them taught and believed for the long period of 830 years; and his own prophets and inspired teachers, be kept in utter ignorance respecting it! It is an absurdity. Notwithstanding the perfect consanguinity existing between the hellish passions of corrupted man, and this Calvinistic darling, it required no less than 270 years in that age of darkness, ignorance and priestcraft, to gain sufficient strength for recognition, by the bishops in church faith; that is, A. D. 532. It was annexed to the creed, in general council, A. D. 551; being acted on nineteen years before as an article of faith. Then commenced the dreary prophecy of the two witnesses, (the Old and New Testaments,) Rev. xi. 3, to continue 1260 years, clothed in sackcloth. This period terminated in A. D. 1792. The witnesses then were slain. The Bible was, that year, publicly burnt, with great ceremony, in Paris, (one of the streets of the spiritual Sodom and Egypt,) by the common executioner, and the Christian religion abolished by a national edict. Three years and a half afterwards, (the two witnesses revived,) the Bible was as publicly acknowledged the word of God, and the Christian religion restored. Then the angel commenced his flight, the garments of sackcloth were rent from the witnesses, Universalism received new life, God's truth blazed like a meteor, and the earthquake has rocked Christendom to its centre. Behold its effects in Europe and America for the last forty years, and be no longer blind to the signs of the times. D. W.

THE FLAT HEAD INDIANS.

The travels of Ross Cox in the very "far West," contain much that is interesting relating to the Indian character and customs. The following extract is descriptive of one of their most curious customs:—

"The abominable custom of flattening their heads prevails among them all. Immediately after birth, the infant is placed in a kind of oblong cradle, formed like a trough, with moss under it. One end, on which the head reposes, is more elevated than the rest. A padding is then placed on the forehead with a piece of cedar bark over it, and by means of cords passed through small holes on each side of the cradle the padding is pressed against the head. It is kept in this manner for upwards of a year, and is not, I believe, attended with much pain. The appearance of the infant, however, while in this state of compression, is frightful, and its little black eyes, forced out by the tightness of the bandages, resemble those of a mouse choked in a trap. When released from this inhuman process, the head is perfectly flattened, and the upper part of it seldom exceeds an inch in thickness. It never afterwards recovers its rotundity. They deem this an essential point of beauty, and the most devoted adherent of our first Charles never entertained a stronger aversion to a Round-head than these savages. They allege as an excuse for this custom, that all their slaves have round heads; and accordingly every child of a bondsman who is not adopted by the tribe, inherits not only his father's degradation, but his parental rotundity of cranium."

He will never be a satisfied and rarely a gratified hearer who takes only his intellect to church and leaves his heart at home.

It is no religion to stay at home and contemplate—to pass one's time in meditating, though ever so well, upon God, and truth, and eternity, or praying without ceasing, for if all men were to do so, the world would stand still and the race expire; yet if it be a duty to any so to pass their lives, it is to all. God then designed man for action; for activity of mind and body throughout all their powers. If, therefore, religion is not made to go along with and join itself to action, life, and common duty, it must be abandoned; it is something utterly hostile to man's well-being. But God requires religion; he has revealed religious truth, as we say, at great cost, and he demands our reception of it. It must, then, (truly received,) be an active principle; it must be what we mean by holiness and nothing more. Prayer, meditation, worship, in all their forms, are not then religion, but means and methods of creating it and increasing its power.

There are more good Samaritans than one, more Howards than one. They are to be found in every Christian village. No virtue is brighter than that of the mother, who, when she has returned to her humble abode—a cellar or a garret—after a day of exhausting toil, and to whom sleep, though upon straw, would be a luxury monarchs never knew—passes the night in ministering to the wants of a neighbor's sick child, or rocking into slumber her own restless and complaining infant—and this, in a spirit of patience and love which we sometimes think—how erroneously—belongs only to angels. The virtues of the poor are virtues.

To live in this world like brethren, in love and unity, we must not suppose our own judgment infallible; that nobody equals us in sense, virtue, and the like; for those things are disgusting to men of discernment, and we shall find it difficult to make them join us in our high opinions of our own perfection.—Fisher's Sermons.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 14th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. PAUL PRATT, of Whitestown, to Miss IRENE SESSIONS, of this city.

On Thursday evening, 14th inst., by the Rev. Mr. Shepard, Mr. WILLIAM WALTON, to Miss MARTHA ROUNDS, all of this city.

In Fort Plain, on the 3d inst., by Rev. J. Bushnell, Mr. WILLIAM EVERACKER, of Danube, to Miss MARGARET ZOLLER, of Minden.

DEATHS.

In Herkimer, on the 8th inst., EZRA C., only son of Ezra Graves, aged thirteen months and a half.

In Athens, Pa., December 20, 1835, Mrs. EMELINE FRITCHER, daughter of Rev. Salmon Adams, in the 27th year of her age. She died fully reconciled to the will of her heavenly Father, with a full assurance of a glorious immortality beyond the grave. Her husband has lost a beloved companion—her father an affectionate and beloved daughter. May God sanctify the affliction of the bereaved.

In Geneva, Ontario county, on December 21st, Miss MARIA COOK, aged nearly 57 years. Our deceased sister was formerly well known in this region as an able and exemplary preacher of universal salvation; and lately resumed her public labors, but for a short time, in this vicinity, where she then lived. Infirmities of mind and body admonished her that her end was nigh, and she ceased her labors; but Br. Chase of the Herald of Truth, says, "we have reason to believe that she died as she had lived, a faithful and exemplary believer in God's impartial grace." She has left many manuscripts on theological subjects behind her—whether they will ever be published is doubtful.

Her many virtues will long be remembered by her friends, who will drop the kindly tear to her memory.

A. B. G.

In Homer, on the 3d inst., of consumption, DEWEY GLOVER, in the 20th year of his age. He bade fair to be a blessing and an ornament to society, and died in the fullness of faith in the Gospel.

E. G.

At Middlebury, Ohio, on the 19th ult., of consumption, MARY, daughter of Henry Chittenden, Esq., aged 14 years. She was a most amiable and lovely girl, just blooming into womanhood, and like the tender blossom, untimely nipped, now lies low in death. She suffered much during her sickness, but with the most patient resignation; for she found abundant peace and consolation in religious meditation and frequent perusals of the Bible, and died in the most joyful hope of immortality. An appropriate discourse was delivered at her funeral, by Rev. Mr. Baldwin, of the Presbyterian church, from 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18.

"Sweet is the scene where virtue dies,
When sinks a righteous soul to rest;
How mildly beam the closing eyes!
How gently heaves the dying breast!
So fades a Summer cloud away;
So sinks the gale, when storms are o'er;
So gently shuts the eye of day;
So dies a wave along the shore."—Com.

NEW UNIVERSALIST HYMN BOOK.

The friends of "the restitution of all things" are hereby informed, that arrangements are now making to issue a new Universalist Hymn Book, to be published by W. QUEAL and G. W. MONTGOMERY. It will be ready for distribution by the 1st of April next, in the pocket hymn book form, and will contain about 440 pages, including articles of faith, the mode of forming a church, a few select prayers, with many original hymns. The selected hymns will be the best that we can take from a large number, characterized by piety, religious truth, moral influence, and flowing numbers. The book will be furnished with a copious index, which, in addition to the first line of each hymn, will designate the metres, so that any particular metre can be found without any difficulty. The subjects will be classified, while the book will be so arranged as to be used in connexion with Streeter's Hymn Book, by those societies who have them.

The object of this publication is, to furnish the denomination with a hymn book, which shall keep pace with its literary character and improvement; and also to be furnished at a price with which no fault can be found. It will be printed on good paper, will be well bound, and will be furnished at 40 cents the single copy. A liberal discount will be made to those who purchase by the quantity.

An edition of 6000 copies will be printed; and as we become personally responsible for the payment, in order to furnish a good hymn book at a reduced price, we confidently hope and expect that our friends generally will sustain us in this useful undertaking. Our friends may soon expect directions concerning orders for the work.

THE CALVINISTIC PREACHER.

BY REV. R. TOMLINSON.

"He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life." John iii: 3.

The peculiar manner which is employed to evade the full force of Scripture language, in some instances, has induced me to lay before the reader, the substance of some answers given to the questions naturally arising from the Scripture introduced for consideration.

FIRST. What is belief? It is the assent which the mind gives to evidence, in relation to any proposition introduced—whether that proposition is correct or incorrect. Christian faith, or belief, is, giving credence to the testimony God hath given of his Son—assenting to the truth of the record made, and the general revelation of the nature and object of a Saviour's mission, as bequeathed to the children of men.

Thus far, nothing particularly objectionable appears in the preacher's exposition. "But," said he, "although a revelation hath been made; we are by no means to suppose, that all the doctrines taught in that revelation can be understood—for there are mysteries that cannot be solved." In view of this, we ask the reader, if it is not objectionable to suppose that a revelation hath been made, and, at the same time, suppose that revelation is a mystery? Does not the idea of a revelation necessarily destroy the idea of a mystery? Most certainly—for a revelation implies the bringing to light things that were before unknown—whereas, a mystery denotes that which is still unknown. More than this—if, according to the preacher, the revelation or evidence given be a mystery, or beyond the understanding of man, how is Christian faith to be obtained? or the assent of the mind gained? For instance, that which is a mystery is no evidence. Hence, according to the preacher, the mind has nothing to which it can assent, unless it comes to the absurd conclusion, that a revelation is a mystery. And this, it is necessary to believe, as saith the preacher, or incur condemnation. But our Saviour saith differently. "This is the condemnation, that light hath come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." From this language it is seen, that men incur condemnation in consequence of not believing in the light, or that which has been made manifest; and not for disbelieving that the light is darkness. But we shall soon see the object of the remarks upon this mystery, as we proceed, with the preacher, to notice more definitely what we are to believe, in order that we may possess everlasting life.

SECONDLY. We are to believe in the person of a Saviour, in his human and divine nature—that he was very God and very man—that he was both the Father and the Son—that this character was our Mediator—that he suffered and died! Saith the preacher, "It was necessary for him to be both God and man, that he might not have an inducement to show special favor to either party." That is:—that his actions should not favor one part of himself, more than they did the other part. This supposes, that if he had been absolutely God, unconnected with man, he would have decided partially against men, and required more of them than was actually his due—and if he had been wholly man, then injustice would have taken place, from the fact, that he would have favored them beyond that which belonged to them. Hence, says the preacher, "it is necessary that we believe him to be both God and man. It was necessary from another consideration, viz., that he might have somewhat to offer in sacrifice for the sin of man, that should be proportioned to the nature of that sin. Man, by sinning, and in consequence of Adam's transgression, incurred an infinite penalty—was made liable to all the miseries of this life; and to the pains of hell forever. Therefore, that Jesus might have somewhat, as Mediator, to offer as a sacrifice to his inflexible justice, it was necessary that he should be both God and man. And it is necessary for us to believe that he was such an one." The reader will not wonder, by this time, that our preacher urged a belief in mystery, before presenting all this. But he has not yet done. In this stage of his discourse, he wisely raises an objection—after asserting that only Christ's human nature suffered. "If only his human nature suffered, how could the sacrifice have been infinite?" The utility of a belief in mystery is abundantly apparent in the answer to the above question. "Though his human nature only, suffered, yet it being offered upon the altar of his divinity, it became an infinite sacrifice; and thus satisfied the demand that inflexible justice held against the sinner, in consequence of the transgression of Adam. But we are by no means to suppose, that even this sacrifice is to deliver any, but such as believe as before shown, from the guilt of original transgression." This is what we are told we must believe that we may come in possession of everlasting life—and it may well be termed a mystery, no where revealed or spoken of, save in the creeds and traditions of men.

Reader, endeavor to find aught, that shall produce the least possible portion of moral enjoyment, or life, in all this bundle of absurdity and contradiction. If there be no life, to be derived from this source, then certainly it is not what is to be believed. The reader, by turning to the chapter in which the Scripture quoted at the head of this article is found, will learn what he is to believe; and it is without a mystical dress, so plain that the "way-faring man, though a fool, need not err therein." Or if he will consult the record, which St. John declares God hath given of his Son, he will find what he is to believe, which is—"God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." The reader will understand, that all this is vastly different from what the preacher said we must believe. He, by no means, produced the record as a subject of our faith.

By this you will readily perceive the difference between the preacher and the Bible; and you will be at no loss which to follow. But understand for thine own benefit, that the life mentioned, is to be found only in Christ. It is not out of him. This implies a breaking off from sin and a turning unto righteousness; for, as an apostle has well remarked, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things have passed away, and behold, all things are become new." Reader, would you enjoy life everlasting? turn to the record God hath given, and believe it; and you will come into possession of that "pearl of great price," which the world cannot give, nor take away.

DIALOGUE

Between a Universalist and a Calvinistic Baptist.

Universalist. Well, friend, I understand you have withdrawn from one Baptist church and joined another. What was your object? Were there too many members in the old church?

Baptist. Oh, no! There were not enough of the right kind. The truth is, the majority of the church are Arminian in sentiment—I cannot fellowship so abominable an inconsistency; and for

U. Ah! what fault can you find with Arminianism? I supposed it to be one of the improvements of the age—calculated to give mankind a more exalted opinion of God's character than they have learned from the creed which teaches that he foreordained, before their existence, a certain share of his offspring to never-ending woe.

B. A great improvement, I should think! to teach that God has created frail, mortal beings, and placed them amid temptations and besetments on every hand, and then left their eternal destiny dependant on the exertions of their fellow-mortals—perchance on the liberality of those who aid the missionary cause, or tract society! I believe that my eternal destiny, and the destiny of all, depend on the will of God, not on the will or exertions of man. I could enjoy no peace, day nor night, did I believe my future happiness or misery depended on myself, or the exertions of my fellow-beings. Besides, I think I can discover too much of a man-fearing and popularity-seeking spirit in the church I have left. I find that people of wealth and worldly influence, whose moral characters are no better than they should be, are retained in good fellowship, so long as they will pay liberally for preaching, etc.; while others, who possess less of this world's goods, are excommunicated for very slight offences, or a very little deviation from some peculiar points of faith. Now, such actions I do not like. I like to see professors of religion act consistently, fearlessly and decidedly—do what they believe to be right, regardless of offending this or that person—boldly declare to the world what they do believe, and live up to their profession.

U. You are really very frank and plain-hearted; so much so, that I will venture to propose a few questions touching your belief, and the cause of your difference of opinion from your Arminian brethren.

B. Very well; I will cheerfully answer any candid question you may propose, if in my power.

U. Do you believe that God has a fixed will and determination respecting the final destiny of every individual of our race?

B. Most certainly I do; and I believe that will and determination will be accomplished, too; for, "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure." Indeed, I have often been surprised that Arminians should be so short-sighted as not to discover, how very absurd it is, to suppose that an all-wise Being should create a universe of intelligences without foreseeing or determining their final destiny.

U. You have answered very promptly, and in such a manner as to supersede the necessity of asking the second question which I was about to propose: I will now ask you one more. Do you sincerely believe that God ever foreordained a being to wail in the regions of ceaseless woe and despair?

B. Ah! that is a subject which we should leave to God himself. He has not seen fit to reveal to us anything more than it is proper for us to know; and I consider it very wrong for us to attempt to pry into secrets, which doubtless should not be made known to us.

U. Are you quite sure that a mystery is involved in the question proposed, which should not be revealed to man?

B. Quite sure; for my mind was once quite perplexed on the same subject; and on appealing to my minister, he informed me that it was the workings of earnal reason which must be checked; and assured me that it was a mystery with which we had nothing to do; since then, I have not allowed myself to think much about it.

U. I had heard much about your seceding from your church on account of a difference of opinion respecting the will of God toward man; and from the frankness with which you answered my first question, I flattered myself that you would honestly and candidly tell me what you believe in that respect; but I perceive you are still under the control of your spiritual guides. You dare think, and speak too, of the inconsistencies of your opposers; but dare not even think on a subject which tries the consistency of your own faith—any further than your spiritual leaders are pleased to allow. The last question I proposed is one of vast importance; and should be candidly examined, at least by every disciple of John Calvin; yet you are afraid to investigate the subject. Oh! when will men learn to place more confidence in a reasonable revelation, than in a minister who assumes the right of setting limits to the faith of his fellow-man? But I am getting severe; I had almost forgotten that I was conversing with my friend. When I realize how much misery, through fear and anxiety, people might evade, by throwing off the yoke of bondage with which priestcraft would eternally enslave them, I cannot always control my feelings. Believe me, then, if I have been plain, it was in consequence of my real love for you, and my earnest desire that you may be induced to reject the doctrines and commandments of men, and think and act for yourself. I will not now press you further to answer my question. After a little reflection you may be better prepared to answer it.

B. I shall consider myself under no obligation to answer it, at any time; for I now perceive your object is, evidently, to entrap me; for if I should answer in the affirmative, you would reproach me for believing in a cruel, revengeful, unjust and unmerciful God; and should I answer in the negative, I should acknowledge myself a Universalist; for I have already assured you that God's will must, and will be done. I do not like to converse with those who are always trying to get the advantage.

U. It appears you do not; but methinks, if your system was perfect, you need have no fears on that ground—truth has nothing to fear from investigation. You say you like to see people act independently and honestly. So do I. Now your creed ascribes a character to God which would disgrace an earthly tyrant, and you must not complain if its infallibility should be questioned. Yea, more, you should never consent to ascribe such a detestable character to your heavenly Father, without the most scrutinizing research, and the most positive evidence. It would be the basest ingratitude to treat an earthly parent in the same manner. I hope you will hereafter remember, that you have no more right to slander the God of the universe, than you have to belie your fellow-mortals. But to the question. That which you consider a hidden mystery, you will find clearly revealed in Eph. i: 9, 10, which reads thus:—"Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he (God) hath purposed in himself: that, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and on earth, even in him." O, may its truth sink deep into your heart, and should it make you a Universalist, may your joy in beholding, by an eye of faith, a ransomed universe freed from sin and misery, basking in the sunshine of immortal bliss, abundantly compensate you for the sneers you must encounter by an open avowal of the sentiment. Adieu. H.

THE BLUE.

Messrs. EDITORS—Among the hundred things called nuisances, the most vexatious and despicable is that which every body tolerates, and with which nearly every family is tormented—it is a modern, orthodox blue. Not a blue-stocking, for such are commonly distinguished for native good sense and a respectable share of mental cultivation—but a mere blue without the stocking. She is generally from thirty to fifty years of age—poor as poverty, pious as a Puritan, proud as a princess, and pertinacious as any other Presbyterian. She is sometimes idle, and always ignorant and impudent—wandering from house to house, under pretence of making visits; but in reality for the double purpose of gleaning scandal for future gossip, superintending and directing the religious affairs of the household, and getting a comfortable living.

She is generally an object of compassion, and under different circumstances would be entitled to its charities. For she is a poor, feeble, nervous body, always under the care of two or three physicians, particularly eminent for their zeal in the new-measures system. And by these pious practitioners she is sent forth—to abide in whatever house she enters, especially if it be where there is a wealthy and liberal family. And if the good lady is not well established in her opinions, she is beset by this servant of the church with an unremitting intercession—to go to her meeting—to get acquainted with her minister, and especially with her dear, good Doctor. And it requires no small share of independence to withstand such assaults—for like Milton's toad at the ear of our mother Eve, this female tempter sits and utters her suggestions from morn to night.

Sometimes she turns the conversation upon the liberal religious paper, which lies from week to week upon the mantle-piece or table, in the room generally occupied by the family. After eyeing the subject with a fixed stare, till a few crocodile tears are elicited, she begins—"Now I wonder at your taking that paper, or, if Mr.  must have it, at your allowing it to lie in sight. I should never think a lady would read it—you don't, I presume—it is so very disgusting, and so apt to slander every body that has any religion, while it is full of impiety and blasphemy." Once, after hearing this for the nineteenth time, a very good woman presumed to ask—if her adviser had ever read any of the papers which she denounced. After bridling, until her indignation would admit of utterance—"No, indeed—you do not suppose that I would read one of those filthy things?" But the question was followed up—"If you never read one of those papers, how do you know what they contain?—how are you certain that they are so filthy and blasphemous?" "Dr.  told me so, and his word is enough to satisfy me."

At another time, after giving all the young Misses in the family her opinion about going to church, and which church she would have them attend, the good lady of the house, is addressed on the subject. "I am surprised that you should ever go to the Universalist meeting; Doctor  said he thought you would be pious, if it was not for your husband. Come, now, do go with me to church this morning—our minister is such a fine speaker, he is such a beautiful man—I am sure you will like him." Well, the good woman goes, to oblige this paragon of assurance and minion of hypocrisy—when, on returning from church, the question is put—"Will you now go to the other meeting this afternoon?" "O no, I am surprised that you should ask me to go!—how can you suppose, that I would leave my meeting to go and hear a Universalist? Besides, your daughter and niece are engaged to go with me, and I would not disappoint them; as I am very anxious to have them get acquainted in our meeting."

Failing in every attempt upon the worthy matron, the mode, as well as the object of attack is accordingly changed. The minister and the dear Doctor are of opinion, that no pains should be spared to win and secure the young ladies in the family; while the old folks should be let alone, as it would be a kind of indulgence less likely to awaken their suspicions of the actual plan of operations. Besides, it would be of much more consequence to gain the young members of the household, as their influence would, in a few years, supersede that of their parents.

On returning from church, the young ladies are addressed—"Well, Misses, what do you think of our meeting? Don't you really think, that my meeting is better than yours? Our congregation you know, too, is the oldest and the largest in town—and what excellent singing! Now as you are both singers, how pleasant it would make it for you to join our choir! Besides, I heard deacon  tell our minister, that if you would only go with us, he believed it would induce a number of other youth to attend our church. So, that you see, we all think you have influence. And then, only think of the consequences of using that influence in a wrong way! I shudder for you, when I think how your aunt, and, your mother, would have you use it. How very happy I should be, could I become the instrument of leading you from your danger, into the right way."

The week is now spent in making and receiving sundry calls. Some half dozen street-yarn-spinning veterans are on the alert—drop in to make their respects to the young Misses, and press them to take a seat with them any time, till further acquaintance shall enable them to feel more at home in the church. All the kind speeches of the heads of the church are very carefully repeated—and a very unexpected attack of hysterics! renders the attendance of the dear Doctor, indispensable. By the time he arrives, his patient is quite well—makes an apology for sending for a physician, but is very glad he came, as he can now speak to the family, on the subject of religion.

Well; the Doctor is surprised that he should never have known that there were young people in the family! He inquires of the hostess where she could always have hid her girls—and fine girls, too—that he should never have seen them at church before. He had known that herself and husband were attached to the Universalist meeting; but he hoped she would not object to her daughter and niece's attending their meeting. They should be welcome to a seat in his pew—unless they preferred taking a seat with the choir, as he understood they were singers. And it would be particularly gratifying to see them there at the present time, as there appeared to be an uncommon movement upon the minds of the youth; and it would place them in a situation to do much good, as well as to profit by the present opportunity of putting themselves in the way of grace.

The young ladies having heard all this, are surprised into a wish to enlarge their acquaintance; and as their own meeting was held but two Sundays in a month, they found no inconvenience in attending church with their maiden sentinel, the next Sunday. They were now pressed, and noticed, and shook hands with, by so many—and heard so many kind-things said during the time of getting out of the house, that they began to think it would, on the whole, be as well to come to that, as to their own meeting.

The next Sunday came; the family were as usual in preparation to attend church, when a sly and meaning look from the lady blue, induced the good mother and aunt to say—"My children, I hope are going to meeting with me to-day?" After some hesitation, and some embarrassment, the ringleader in this family rebellion, answered—that they were to have a sermon to the youth, and then several young persons would be presented for admission into the church—and that the young ladies would like to be present. "Well," (replied the matron,) "I am sorry all this happens to-day—and I think my children will be so, too. They will meet our minister, who will probably be surprised to see them leave his meeting without a cause—and they will certainly feel ashamed, if not sorry for going away now, when they have so many days to go without interfering with his appointments."

But the arrangements had been made—each goes accordingly—and the good lady's prediction proves true. The young ladies were so fortunate as to overhear a conversation carried on in a whisper, between the Doctor and their conductor, which developed the whole plan that had been laid to win them to church—which in its further progress was to make one of them a superintendent of a Sunday school class, and in a few weeks, by proper preparations, to carry them to a protracted meeting in another town. This satisfied them of the error into which they had been led—and it also satisfied the blue that as her labors were ended there, she should seek another home. X.

TALENTED PREACHERS.

I frequently see notices of the want of talented, young, judicious, good and true preachers of Universalism, and for the life of me I cannot understand what they mean. They do not tell whether one talent or ten is required. I should be sorry to suppose that any Universalist preacher, myself in particular, had not as much as one. I am not exactly a young man, that is, in age; for in that respect I am in a state of betweenness; but in relation to experience and years in the ministry, I presume I am young enough for the most difficult. Then a judicious young man is needed; and Br. B. is judicious; but, unfortunately, I am unacquainted with Br. B., and that ends that subject. Next, a good man and true is in request. I hope they have never been imposed upon by a bad one—A BAD UNIVERSALIST! a contradiction in terms, as I understand language. Then I should not like exactly to set up for a good man and true—that is, if it means any better or more trusty than the rest of my brethren. I hope the writers do not mean to insinuate that any of our preachers are not judicious, that they are destitute of talent, bad and unworthy of confidence. However, I think it would be an excellent plan to be a little explicit, or else erect some standard of talent, goodness, etc., by which we may measure ourselves, and ascertain whether we are fitted for their service. TOUR IN OHIO.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

On the evening of the 25th of November, I arrived in Mt. Vernon, and put up at the house of Dr. Burr, where the stranger is always entertained with kindness and hospitality. At this place I had an evening lecture appointed, and though there was but a brief space in which to give the notice, we had a respectable congregation assembled, who listened to the services with a devout and lively interest. At the close of my discourse, a Methodist clergyman arose and addressed the meeting. "Universalists (said he) hold that hell is in this world—that it is present unhappiness, and that every sinner has a part in it. Now if this be the case, and there is no hell in the future world, I shall escape hell altogether; for I have none in this, because I am not unhappy. Universalism (he added) is said to make men happy in proportion as they become acquainted with its principles, but on me, I must say it has a contrary effect; for I find that I am becoming more unhappy every time I hear it preached." Here the gentleman had placed himself in a very ludicrous condition, because he virtually acknowledged himself already in hell, his declaration to the contrary, notwithstanding.

After sharing much kindness with our friends at Mt. Vernon, I proceeded to Wooster, where I arrived a little before sunset. The next morning, while I was in bed, my trunk was accidentally placed on a southern stage, and was making its way back again. I arose early and discovered my loss, despatched an attendant, who overtook it within nine miles of the village. After having my property restored, I left Wooster and proceeded to Massillon, a distance of twenty miles, where I had appointed to preach on the succeeding day, which was Sunday. Our meeting was held in the large school-room over the collector's office, and attended by a small but respectable audience. There are many in this place who seem to fear their Limitarian neighbors more than they love the truth; for though they desired to hear the doctrine of a world's salvation proclaimed, they were prevented by the fear of being called heretics. There are a few, however, whose garments are not defiled, and who gladly receive the word, notwithstanding they have fallen into the error of supposing that preachers can live on faith.

From Massillon I pursued my journey to Akron, where an appointment was got up for an evening lecture. We had but a few hours in which to give the notice, yet we had the pleasure of meeting a respectable congregation, who listened with much interest to the services. Near the close of my discourse, I proceeded to show that Universalism cherishes more goodness than any other system, because it produces more happiness, and happiness and goodness are inseparable. At this moment a Methodist brother who was present, and who could not govern his combativeness, exclaimed vehemently, "It is not so—it is false!" I paid no attention to the man, but finished my remarks and gave liberty for speaking. Three gentlemen (one a Methodist) arose in quick succession, and expressed their indignation at the ungentlemanly conduct of the intruder.

After sharing the hospitality of our friends at Akron, I proceeded to Hudson, a small flourishing town some twenty-four miles South of Cleveland. In this place there are a number of active Universalists, to whom an evening lecture was proposed. They did not excuse themselves by saying they had no place to hold meeting in, and knew of none that they could obtain. They set about the work with a zeal becoming the doctrine they professed, and in a few hours we had the pleasure of seeing a good congregation convened in the Methodist chapel, of which the greatest part is owned by liberal men. I was much pleased with the conduct of our friends at this place; they lack neither courage nor independence in the support of their religious sentiments.

After sharing the kindness of these noble friends, I was conveyed to Cleveland by Br. Hine, who, with the rest of his brethren, spares no pains in the promotion of truth. I found a cordial welcome at the house of Spencer Wright, by whom and his amiable family I was very agreeably entertained during my stay in the village. There are a number of excellent friends in this place and vicinity, with a part of whom I formed an agreeable acquaintance. After spending one day in the place, and discoursing to an interesting congregation, I took stage to Buffalo, a distance of two hundred miles; which, as the weather was extremely cold and the roads bad, was the most disagreeable part of my journey. After travelling three days and nights, we were overturned within seven miles of Buffalo. No serious injury was received by the passengers. At about 8 o'clock, A. M., on the first Sunday in December, I arrived in the city, and supplied the desk in the Universalist chapel, where Br. Tomlinson labors to good acceptance and profit. Our congregation was small, as might be expected, for the snow fell one foot in depth during the day.

On Monday morning, after being very hospitably entertained by our friends at this place, I shaped my course for Niagara, where I arrived at 1 o'clock, P. M., and put up at the Cataract House, kept by Gen. Whitney, to whose acquaintance I was introduced by a friend at Buffalo. An evening lecture was appointed after my arrival, and I had the pleasure of preaching to a very attentive congregation, who received the word spoken with all readiness of mind. While at this place I was favored with an opportunity of viewing the Falls with the surrounding scenery, accompanied by a guide from the Cataract House.

The Falls are seldom visited in the Winter season, as it is generally supposed they are most beautiful in the Summer. I cannot say what they are in the Summer, but in the Winter they are indescribably grand. The mist from the Falls, which gradually freezes upon the trees, bears the appearance of pure alabaster. The trees and shrubbery thus covered with transparent sleet, seem like glittering chandeliers of all descriptions, and it is not till the scene has become familiar to the eye, that its sublimity can be realized and felt.

From Niagara I proceeded to Lockport, a distance of twenty miles, where I lectured in the evening to a small congregation assembled in the courthouse. In this place the Gospel has a few worthy friends, but their number is small. They are anxious to procure a preacher. I tarried here over night, and after sharing the kindness of our friends during my stay, proceeded to Rochester, where I was cordially entertained by Br. H. Roberts, who had recently been on a tour to Canada. On the 11th, I pursued my tour to Palmyra, a distance of twenty-four miles, where I discoursed in the evening to a very respectable congregation. In this village I found a number of zealous friends, by whom I was kindly entertained.

On Saturday, 12th, I proceeded to Lyons, a large flourishing village forty miles East of Rochester. On the second Sunday in December I preached three discourses in this place, to small but increasing congregations. It is thought by the friends at Lyons, that a preacher of our order would be well supported in this section. May God, in his own due time, supply their wants by sending a shepherd who shall feed them with the true bread of life.

On the 14th, I continued my journey to Salina, where I tarried over night. An appointment for an evening lecture had been given, but the inclemency of the weather prevented our assembling. The next day I reached Utica, and had the great satisfaction of finding my family in good health. I had been absent two months and a half, travelled about eighteen hundred miles, formed many agreeable acquaintances, and now return my unfeigned gratitude to Heaven for all blessings conferred, and my safe return to my family and friends.

P. S. Br. Tizzard will mail his paper to E. S. Woodin, Hudson, O., and Spencer Wright, Cleveland, O., beginning at number 20. They will remit by letter, according to conditions. J. W.

STATISTICS.

The first Universalist society in Ellisburg, Jefferson county, was organized in 1821. Present number of male members, thirty-three. A church was constituted the same year. Present number of members, male and female, thirty-one.

The society and church at present employ myself, as a preacher, one quarter of the time. Meetings are well attended, and the cause is prosperous.

The first Universalist society in Hastings was organized in 1833. Present number of members, male and female, twenty-eight. The society have, the past year, employed me as a preacher, one-eighth part of the time. Our cause in this place is steadily, though slowly advancing. Mexico, January 4, 1836. C. B. BROWN.

ABOLITIONISM.

BY REV. K. TOWNSEND.

Do not be alarmed, reader, for I have no disposition to agitate a question which has hitherto been discussed with so much acrimonious feeling. But there was a small abolitionist tract put into my hands, the other day, which attracted my attention, and gave rise to a few reflections. There were two pictures placed in contrast, and the object was fully explained. On one side was a person surrounded with blacks, engaged in instructing them from a book he held in his hands—on the other, a man with an uplifted whip flogging them to their duty; and the question is gravely propounded, Which is the best and most consistent mode of treatment? I thought upon it intensely, and the subject finally resolved itself into the question, What method will God pursue with his poor, benighted children? Will he eternally scourge them with unending hell torments; or, by instruction, enlighten their minds, and prepare them for the joys of immortal life? Reader, what think you? "Be ye followers of God?"—"Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

TEMPERANCE.....NO. II.

Dr. A. W. Benton thinks it would be "folly, if not presumption, to attempt a formal reply to such a modern JUNIUS, as appeared in number 52, vol. vi., without name, date or residence;" and yet I am led to infer, from the tenor of his article, that the reason why no more of the "objections" named in that communication, were "worthy of notice" was, they were unanswerable. But come, now, "let us reason together." We are not so widely different as might be supposed. Our motives and objects may be the same. We are both friends to temperance, and the primitive objects of temperance societies. The writer of this is not only a friend to temperance societies, but is, and has for years been a member. He opposes, not temperance men, but some of their acts; not temperance societies, but their ultra measures. His object is to make men temperate, by appealing to their reason; to take away the disposition to drink, by destroying the appetite; to win the drinker from his glass by persuasion—not take the glass away by force; to awaken all the energies of the friends of the cause to fight against the common enemy, and not to spend our time in wrangling, proscribing and quarrelling with each other, for the promotion of objects, not only unjust, but morally impossible.

I will say a few words of the immorality of the traffic in ardent spirits. Immorality is crime;—and is it not universally acknowledged, that the motive always gives character to the action? And are we prepared to say, the maker, the vender and the furnisher of materials for the manufacture of ardent spirit, are actuated by a wish to debase human nature; to destroy the peace, the happiness and prosperity of their fellow-men; to fill our land with paupers, and our prisons with victims? No; we know better.

But admit, for the argument, that it is the consequences which follow, and not the motive which conceives, that give the character to an act. I would ask those who are so ready to proscribe, how long is it since they were engaged in the same pursuit; since they furnished materials, made and sold ardent spirits, and considered it no crime? And what a noble, charitable, heavenly spirit must actuate our bosoms, if we would crush our neighbor for his acts of to-day, when we were guilty of the same acts yesterday, and escaped with impunity? But it may be answered:—we sinned innocently; we did not realize the consequences of our actions. Ah! and does not your neighbor sin innocently? Is he to be despised, because you are more favored of Heaven; blessed with keener perception and greater advantages? In the language of Dr. Benton:—"Have you the authority to fix bounds to his acts, say 'thus far mayest thou go, and no farther?' Must he abandon the dictates of his own conscience, and be measured by the standard of yours?"

But we are not to stop even here. The question is gravely asked:—"Ought Christians to patronize the men engaged in this traffic?" "Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us?" Are we not social beings? mutually dependant on each other, for the harmony, the happiness and the blessings of life? commanded to have patience and charity, one toward another; to forgive the wrongs of others, and as far as in us lies, to live peaceably with all men? And shall I cut all connexion, refuse intercourse and withdraw patronage from a father, brother, neighbor or friend, for a mere difference of opinion? Shall I unite with a class of exclusives, who declare they can live independent of the world around them—who virtually say to a respectable class of their fellow-men—"Stand by, come not near us, for we are holier than you?" No; every dictate of human kindness, of reason and philanthropy, and every precept of Heaven, is against it. Rather let me prove to my neighbor, who is in error, by acts of kindness, of friendship and love, that I am his friend, and not call into exercise the worst passions of his heart, by erecting a partition wall between us.

Further:—it is morally impossible to prevent the making or selling of intoxicating drinks, so long as they are demanded by mankind. The appetite for them must first be destroyed; the call for them, cease. Man must be convinced by reason, that it is against his interest to use them. Individuals may resolve to withhold the products of their farms from distilleries. The consequence will be, coarse grains will rise in value, and self-interest being the ruling principle of man, enough will always be found who will carry their produce to the best market. And it appears to be forgotten that, at least one barrel of whiskey is made from the offals of every hundred bushels of wheat manufactured at our flouring establishments. How visionary the idea, then, that we can compel men to discontinue this traffic. How worse than useless its effects on the temperance cause! For instance:—a man is engaged in the traffic. An attempt is made to compel him to relinquish it. That man has relatives and friends. Human nature is sympathetic, and those friends will not stand tamely by and see him immolated. A party is created in his favor. The temperance men profess they have no enmity to the man, but the cause demands their course. They are taken at their word, and the cause has to suffer for the unwise and unwarrantable course of its professed friends; who are exemplifying the fable of the ape, which, out of pure love for its offspring, hugged it to death! A FRIEND TO TEMPERANCE.

LETTER NO. II.

To Rev. Josiah Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit." 2 Cor. i. 15.

DEAR SIR—I wish you to wait with patience for my epistles, as I am dependant upon leisure time to frame my addresses. I have to labor that I may not be a charge upon any one for my subsistence; therefore am not prepared at all times to do with my pen even as I am wont. You may think that you ought to be in possession of my name, that you may know the authority from whence come these epistles. I have given some reasons against that, and I will render one more and then take up your article in the Banner.

I am desirous of doing something to arrest the disposition you, and too many others, have, of making the authority the criterion and datum of your judgment, rather than the intrinsic merits of the productions of that authority. Whatever comes from the high standing officers of "the church," is deemed "orthodox—genuine"—and not to be gainsaid or questioned, because of the authority. This is wrong. So if I can start a habit in you to peruse epistles from a writer who is "incognitus;" who knows but that you may go on thus examining subjects independent of their authority, and finally, going clear of the error you are thus habituated to, may find and embrace the truth in its fulness, and be saved. A lingering hope that I may thus incline you, is the reason I now render, in addition to those before suggested, for not giving my name. And I think you must see and appreciate the utility of the course. Now for your communication.

You say—"In a former communication I endeavored to prove that man was created a holy being. I shall now attempt to show that his circumstances have entirely changed—that he has fallen, and has entailed an unholy nature on all his unfortunate posterity."

The suggestion that you would "attempt to show" so deplorable a change in the nature of man, was very proper. A man may, for certain purposes, very properly say he will "attempt" a thing which cannot be accomplished in fact. But with all your attempts, the truth remains the same, and man is no worse off through the transgression of Adam, than God in his wisdom, in his great original plan, intended he should be.

The reason why you and your brethren in the faith, desire "to show" that man is involved in so wretched a condition, and inherit fallen natures meriting endless death, is apparent. You are preaching and laboring to save souls from an endless death. Now it is evident that, if souls are not exposed to such a death, your preaching "is vain and your faith is also vain." So it becomes necessary, in order to shield your craft from danger, that you keep up the tradition and impression upon the minds of the people, that they are now, by nature, liable to such a wretched doom.

And it is by such "attempts" that the old romance is kept alive. For surely no one who acquired his knowledge from the sacred writings, would ever come to such a conclusion; and if the Scriptures declared it, it would require no "attempt to show" it.

But, Sir, do you suppose that Adam, by his transgression, changed his nature? Do you suppose his nature changed, because of his sin, any more than your own changes when you sin, or transgress a law of God? His "nature." If you wish to be understood in your use of the word nature, as it is commonly understood, you mean by it, that peculiar constitution of man in his moral parts, inclinations and feelings in which he comes into being, as formed and moved by the Designer of all things and the unchanging laws of nature. Now, that any power short of God can or could change the nature of man, as thus defined, appears to me impossible. Man cannot bring himself into existence, but is dependant upon a Creator—he is a creature, and therefore springs from an author or creating cause. This being the case, he comes into being with just such a nature as the Creator shall give him. This you cannot, with propriety, deny. Then you will see that, if man's nature is changed by Adam's transgression, a change must first have been wrought in the designs of God, so that he formed man thereafter with a different constitution or nature. This must be the fact, unless you say that man is self-created, and a promoter of his own nature. Man cannot have a voice in his own creation. You, yourself, beyond a doubt, teach the young that God made them. Would it not seem a strange doctrine for a man to advance, that mankind form their own natures?—that they are their own creators thereof? I wish you not to confound the nature of man with any habit he may establish. You take the broad ground of a radical change of the nature of man, by reason of the transgression of Adam, so that an "unholy nature" is "entailed" upon "all his unfortunate posterity." An entailed unholiness of nature is a very different thing from an evil habit established from the example of an ancestor. Abel, or even Cain, in his helpless infancy, was as innocent and "holy" (if you prefer the term) as if their parents had never transgressed the command of God. And I hope I may introduce some evidence of the fact, before I leave the subject. Suppose, in your present reinstated condition, (as undoubtedly you pretend to have been born again,) a child is born unto you: what do you suppose to be the nature of the little helpless creature as it lies in its mother's arms? Is it "unholy"? From whom did it inherit that unholiness? It is a twig from your tree. Will you say from Adam? But it sprang from your loins subsequent to your conversion. The truth is, Sir, if the child be corrupt, it is because you were corrupt; but it by no means follows that because the parent be corrupt, the infant offspring will be corrupt. No, let man be as wicked through habit as he may be, his offspring will be ushered into existence with all the purity of primeval innocence. Here lies your infant child of scarce three days age, and beside it lies the offspring of the man matured and hardened in crime, of the same brief age. Look on that; then on this. Wherein do the little innocents differ in their natures? Not at all. Yours may become the murderer, and the other the saint and philanthropist. When they come to partake of the "fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil," then, agents of their own moral careers, experience and habit is to establish their characters and determine their earthly lots. So, I believe, the idea, that man's nature is changed because of Adam's sins, is preposterous, and unsupported by any evidence whatever. I shall present before you some Scripture evidence, at a proper time, on this subject. You will excuse me for the present.

AMICUS.

THE BIGOT DESCRIBED.

Messrs. EDITORS—As an admirer of your valuable journal, and a firm believer in the precious truth of the Gospel which it boldly advocates, I would ask a publication of the following relation.

In the year 1832, I filled the situation of clerk and book keeper in the store of a Mr. S., of the village of M—lle, Upper Canada, with whom I resided for some time. It was here I became acquainted with your invaluable paper, under the most curious, and I will add, the most fortunate circumstances.

In regulating a room adjoining the store, which was occupied with old articles, lumber, etc., I discovered a large number of your papers, thrown into a by-corner, with some rubbish over them; the greater part of them had their covers, and some were of a recent date. I thought this circumstance very singular, and remarked it to my employer, who (I beg leave here to state) kept the postoffice. He said they were "infidel papers," and contained heretical principles of doctrine. The only objection" continued he, "that I had to my former clerk, was his neglecting to destroy them as soon as they were received into the office, as I had instructed him; but do you use them in the store in place of wrapping paper." Accordingly I collected them, and having examined some of them, I found they contained some excellent matter, such as I was unacquainted with; viz., that relating to the unbounded love of an ALMIGHTY FATHER, which induced me to lay them up for my own reading; but in this I was disappointed, for the papers were withdrawn from my room, by some secret hand. This last circumstance excited my surprise the more, and led me to reflect, that my employer's instructions were incompatible with the regulations of the postoffice, or, in other words, a direct violation of a Postmaster's oath, who swears previously to entering into office, "that he will not willingly or knowingly, open, detain, delay or embezzle any letter or letters, packet or packets, relating to the postoffice, that may come into his power or custody by virtue of his said office of Postmaster, except by consent of the party or parties to whom the said letters or packets may be addressed."

Here we see the baneful effects resulting from fanatic zeal, blended with bigotry. It is certainly astonishing, how it affects the human mind.—When once the miserable devotee of bigotry is entrained in its chains, he acknowledges neither moral nor divine law—none except that which is dictated by this inexorable and tyrannical master. My employer was a man of very religious habits, or at least, wished to appear so in the eyes of the public; he held family worship in his house, evening and morning, in a very formal and sanctimonious manner. Family worship, we admit, is highly becoming when accompanied with true piety; but when it emanates from Pharisaical hypocrisy, "to be seen of men" rather than of God, it is deeply deplorable.

I shall pass over my employer's private character, which, I regret to say, I became early acquainted with, much to my disadvantage in pecuniary matters—but of that I shall be silent. However, I may be allowed to remark one particular, connected with the present subject, that is, so strongly did Mr. S. oppose the circulation of your paper where he was Postmaster, that he not only withheld the papers from your subscribers, but he, moreover, wrote to your office, to say that Dr. C. had removed from M—lle, requesting you to discontinue the paper.* This statement was, indeed, a downright falsehood, as Dr. C. was never known to be absent from the village, excepting on business, or to attend his professional calls. But as he knew the Doctor to be friendly to your interest and the cause which you advocate, he meant, by such a step, to deprive you of one of your most steady subscribers, and the cause of religion, of one of its most able advocates, and supporters. This was, no doubt, a genuine specimen of piety in opposing any innovation that would tend to deprive Orthodox believers of their sweet and heart-cheering doctrine of endless misery! Shall we say then, that he was actuated by the same spirit that St. Paul was, when he persecuted the church of Christ? I apprehend not; for if he had been, he would have been long since converted to the faith. In this we discover a man, acting as he supposed, under the impulse of a religious spirit, violating his oath, defrauding his neighbors of their just due, and telling a palpable lie; thus combining the united crimes of perjury, fraud and falsehood! Away, then, with a system of religion, that will embitter my mind against my fellow-creature, or prompt me to act thus.

Before I close these remarks, I would state, as I do with peculiar satisfaction, that the cloud of darkness which hung over the village of M—lle, is now beginning to disperse; as many of its inhabitants and those in its vicinity, joyfully appreciate the glad tidings from the mouth of your preachers. Mr. Langworthy, one of your preachers, visited that part of Canada, a short time ago, and was graciously received. His calls to preach in different parts, were numerous, and his meetings were crowded to excess, combining the intelligence and respectability of the surrounding country. Different societies are being formed in that neighborhood, for the purpose of disseminating the principles of universal grace among the brethren, and for the advancement of godliness and religion. So may the word run, and the people grow in grace, till truth covers the whole earth as the waters do the sea.

MORAL CHARACTER OF UNIVERSALISM.

It is a proverbial saying, that it is never too late to correct mistakes; but, in reality, even this needs correction, for it is never too early to rectify errors. And there are prevailing errors respecting the moral character of Universalism. It is not surprising that the moral bearings of this doctrine should have been misapprehended by its opposers. For they argue from their own views, as the basis of a system as unlike theirs as can well be imagined; and consequently, infer results, fairly deducible from their own premises, but which have no relation to the subject as believed and maintained by Universalists.

Nor should we wonder that, in the strife about the peculiar and distinguishing doctrines of Universalism, its advocates should have been over anxious to establish these in the minds of their fellow-men. Pushed as they were, on every hand and by every sect, they were compelled to fight their way up to the station which they now hold, and so triumphantly maintain. And the attention which they must necessarily bestow on the mere theory, left little time to follow out the moral bearings of their principles. They were sensible that it was the duty of all Christian professors, to live "soberly and righteously" in this evil world; and contented themselves with repelling the false and sometimes foolish inferences of other sects, respecting the licentious tendency of their opinions.

But there is some reason to believe, that the native moral tendencies of Universalism were not well understood by its professors—that it was to the spirit and power of this doctrine, alone, that we are to look for the moral renovation of the world. As the rage of controversy passes away, the attention will be more and more directed to this very important subject. It is destined to consummate the triumph of Universalism, not only over the individual heart, but eventually over all opposition, throughout the world. This is the power, which will effectually put to silence "the ignorance of foolish men." But this power can only result from the premises laid in the Gospel of God—in other words, from the principles of Universalism. Let a few illustrations suffice to establish these truths.

1. It will be readily admitted, that the knowledge and love of God lie at the foundation of all substantial morality, and all true religion. Hence, if it be necessary to moral virtue and religion, that God should be loved—it is indispensably necessary that he should be known. But he must be known in the character in which he is set forth by the doctrine of Universalism—or he cannot be loved. Consequently, the genuine love of God, and, of course, all true morality and all true religion are exclusively based in the view which Universalism presents of the divine character. We do not mean that there can be no devotional feelings, and no acceptable worship, without such views. For both these existed under the institutions of Heathenism, long before the light of the Gospel shone upon our world. And both now exist under the Christian name and profession, where scarcely one proper or worthy idea is entertained of the character and perfections of the only true God.

We put the case—you are a parent; and, as such, can you feel well assured that you rightly know God, when you suppose that he can make the creatures of his power, forever miserable? Remember that he is the Father of the human race—that he avows a love for his offspring, greater and more intense than that of earthly mothers. But if you still think your views of his character correct—with the possibility that your own children may be the fated subjects of that misery, can you love him? If you cannot, and we do most religiously believe, that while in your right mind you cannot, is it not morally certain that you have mistaken his character? And if you think that you do love him, under the dreadful certainty that he may make your children, and even yourselves infinitely and interminably wretched, is it not probable, not to say certain, that you deceive yourselves—and possibly, though unintentionally, deceive others? Think of this—and ask yourselves, whether you are in the love of God? "We love him, because he first loved us."

2. It will also be admitted, that the obedience which springs from the influence of correct moral feelings and principles, is a far more acceptable obedience, than that which is inspired by the dread of punishment. But we go further, and maintain that nothing but the most profound ignorance, on the part of man, of the nature of and motives to virtue, can render the service prompted by fear acceptable to God. For happily he requires of man "according to that he hath." Hence, if people have nothing but the fear of hell to restrain them from vice—it is simply better than nothing. Though we must be permitted to adopt the sentiment of another, and say, that such motives to obedience seem better adapted to the condition of a barbarous people, under a barbarous age, than to a Christian community in the middle of the nineteenth century.

The motives to obedience, presented by the doctrine of Universalism, are such as greatly distinguishes it from every other system among men. They are founded in the perception of the fitness, utility, necessity and supreme excellence of moral virtue; as well as in the consciousness of its being a duty to God, and conducive to individual and social happiness. In a word—Universalism (or, the Gospel) leads men to practice virtue, because virtue is loved—and because it assimilates man to the character of his God. And these views are beginning to be received by many of the most intelligent and humble Christians of every denomination. When, therefore, they become to be better understood, and more fully appreciated, they will expel forever from the minds of believers, the dark and miserable theory, that fear can furnish worthy motives to Christian virtue, or inspire an acceptable devotion to our Father in heaven. Universalists have been the first to embrace these views as a part of their religious system, since the apostolic age; and the influence in purifying the affections, and reforming the life, has already done much for the moral improvement of society.

* This notice we distinctly recollect receiving from the Postmaster at M—lle, in the Fall of 1830. But are not positive whether it was from the present incumbent or his predecessor in office.

D. S.

3. An affectionate regard for mankind, is the best pledge of the practice of integrity, justice and benignity towards them. And it is too plain to admit of controversy, that Universalism not only gives a better character to human nature, but furnishes higher motives to the feelings and exercise of philanthropy, than any other religious system ever inculcated among mankind. It considers the whole human race, as alike the offspring of God—as created in his likeness and bearing his image—as the objects of the constant care of his providence, and the subjects of divine grace—and finally destined to an equal and glorious immortality.

But it is not blind to the moral differences which obtain among men. It sees an immense proportion degraded by the animal and selfish passions—sunk in ignorance and crime; and alike insensible of the real dignity of their nature, their best interests, and their high destiny. But instead of perpetuating the distinctions between men, it puts in requisition the benevolent feelings of the heart, and gives instruction to the ignorant, leads back the wandering to the path of duty, and pours the light of truth over the mind where once reigned the darkness of sin and the miseries of despair. The horizon of hope expands under the light of benevolent affections; and the believer looks abroad from the eminence on which the Gospel places him, and sees in the revolutions of ages his kindred race “taught of God,” turning to him, and worshipping before him.

The Universalist is thus taught to cherish feelings of kindness for the lost ones of his race, which other views neither know nor encourage—he is enabled to carry into the field of labor, enterprise and collision, feelings of respect for the rights of man, that no other system of religion ever inspires; and to carry out in practice the virtues which honor God, dignify man, and diffuse general good, from motives above the comprehension of the slaves of fear and the devotees of crime. The love of God, the love of virtue, and the love of mankind, are not only sufficient to secure the practice of obedience—but they must, in due time, recommend the system by which they are embraced and enforced, to universal acceptance.

REASONS SECOND. III.

FOR REJECTING THE DOCTRINE OF ENDLESS MISERY.

“Produce your cause, saith the Lord, bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob.” Isaiah xli: 21.

Having already shown the utter uselessness of endless misery, with regard to God, angels, and saints in glory, we proceed to remark,

4. That it is useless to the sufferers, themselves, of so dreadful a destiny. Indeed, we know not that any advocate of endless misery has ever pretended that the victims of ceaseless hell torments would or could receive the least possible advantage therefrom. For the very condition in which the doctrine supposes all its victims will be placed, precludes forever, all possibility of the least good ever being enjoyed by them. It supposes, not only that they will be deprived of all imaginable good, present and prospective, real and imaginary, but that they will endure every conceivable evil, infinite in number and magnitude, and endless in duration, unmingled and unmitigated by aught that bears the name of good, so long as the throne of God shall stand. It is not intended to reform them or fit them for happiness, or even permit them to enjoy it if it should. It is not intended to humble their pride, but taunt and mock them in their degradation. It is not designed to soften their hard hearts and produce repentance unto life; for life can never be theirs, and though the heart may break, it can never be melted into sincere contrition for sin; for its very element is supposed to be sin, and rebellion against God its only ambition and aim.

Suppose one of those unhappy victims doomed to experience the immortal pangs of ceaseless hell torments, to be addressed, after it had endured the most exquisite of torture for ten thousand ages, each one as long as has elapsed since the creation of the world, and to be asked what benefit it had derived from its sufferings—what advantage had accrued from the untold anguish it had experienced—or what real good was likely to be effected by its continuance through the same period thrice ten thousand times told—yea, through the countless ages of eternity? What answer would or could it give? Or what answer could be given to such questions by any of the advocates of the doctrine?

Will any contend that as “misery loves company,” those doomed spirits will derive a mutual and infernal gratification from seeing each other endure the pains of hell forever? If this be so, and the popular views of the rich man and Lazarus be correct, how happens it that the “rich man in hell” should pray that his brethren might not come to that “place of torment”? Moreover, if the damned in hell rejoice over each other’s misery, and the saints in heaven rejoice at the same, are not the saints in heaven and the damned in hell just alike? But if the saints in heaven rejoice at such a prospect, and the damned in hell are justly represented by the rich man in the parable, and are like him, then the inhabitants of the latter place appear to be the more benevolent of the two; and hence the inhabitants of the two worlds, it would seem, ought in justice to exchange places and conditions. But we need not pursue this point further, inasmuch as we know of no one who is disposed to argue that any benefit will accrue to the sufferers of endless misery from such a doom.

We know of no other class of beings, except those already named, on which the endless misery of a part of the human family can be supposed to have any effect either good or bad, unless it be that imaginary class of beings called infernals, demons, fiends or devils. We are aware that certain wild and ranting fanatics, as they allow themselves to revel in the luxuriant vagaries of their own bewildered imaginations, have sometimes undertaken to describe the malignant triumph of devils and fiends when they succeed in tempting and deceiving souls and leading them down to hell, and the infernal joys they experience in torturing them after they get them down to their dark and doleful prison: But we will not insult the understanding of our readers, by supposing for a moment, that any of them soberly entertain such an opinion, or stand in need of any argument to disprove so ridiculous a theory—a theory which has not even the semblance of argument for its support either from reason or revelation. Nor will we suppose—even if any of our readers could be weak enough to believe that devils or infernal spirits derived any pleasure from witnessing or inflicting misery on the damned—that they could be weak enough to believe at the same time that a holy and all-merciful God would employ the energies of his own omnipotence in rendering his own offspring eternally miserable, merely for the fiendish gratification of devils, allowedly the worst enemies both of God and man! For if devils delight in the misery of the damned, and the Deity also delights in it, and both act in concert, in inflicting it, the question might well be asked, Which being is the worst? And in answering it, although it must be allowed that both would be upon a par, so far as malignity and cruelty were concerned, yet the humiliating fact would have to be acknowledged, that as the devils inflicted the misery not on their own offspring but upon the offspring of their eternal foe, and as the Deity inflicted it on his own offspring—beings of his own creation, therefore he must be infinitely worse than those beings called devils!

We have now shown, as we think, conclusively, that the endless misery of a part of mankind is entirely useless, even if true, and that it can do no good either to God, to angels, to saints in heaven, or sinners in hell, or to devils, if devils there be. Cui bono? is a question that has often been asked in relation to this doctrine, but has never yet been answered; and in our opinion it never will or can be answered. “Who will show us any good” in the doctrine of endless misery? The truth is, it is only evil, unmixed and infinite evil; and therefore there is no good about it. Having shown its uselessness, we shall in the next place proceed to show that it is absolutely pernicious in every point of view.

PREACHERS WANTED.

A subscriber in Kemptville, Upper Canada, says that an occasional sermon in that place and vicinity, would be well received and rewarded.

Our agent at Fredericktown, Ohio, regrets that Br. Messenger flew so rapidly through that region—“travelling more than one hundred miles without making a pause—not even an exclamation point!” He promises that our Ohio friends will bear longer acquaintance, and wants ministering brethren who travel that way, to try them. In reply, I would state that Br. Messenger, probably, was limited in point of time—his engagements at home preventing deliberate travel. But the regret is recorded for the benefit of others who travel through Knox county, Ohio.

Another Ohio friend, who dates at Bazetta, says, “there are but few Universalists in this section, though there are some who cannot swallow the bitter potion of endless sin and woe, and are measurably inclined to cast off the yoke of bondage, but for a love of popularity. Our preachers, in their travels Westward, pass all around us, leaving us without a call. If they could be induced to visit this section, (say at Warren,) they might in a short time, witness the results of their labors.”

Br. Joseph Jackson, of Pleasant Vale, Pike county, Illinois, writes, “There is a great want for preachers here. I think a preacher—any young man of good character and abilities—would get a good support—say from four to five hundred dollars per annum—in this and Adams counties. Can you send us one?”

Besides the foregoing, preachers are wanted at the following places:—In Flemingsburg, Poplar Plains and Hillsborough, Kentucky, on a circuit. Call on Brs. Stockwell, Pierce and Winn, residing in the above places respectively. In Marion, Marion county, Ohio—half the time. In Vermont, the societies in Berkshire and Swanton Falls want preaching half the time, each—and those in Cambridge, Bakersfield, and Highgate, one-fourth the time each. In Lower Canada, the friends in Caldwell’s Manor, want preaching one-fourth the time. In this State, the friends in Lockport, East Bloomfield, Eatonville and Salisbury are endeavoring to secure the services of a preacher, each, of the two first named, and one jointly, for the two last named. Our friend in Aurora, Erie county, is informed that we have taken measures, as requested, to secure a preacher for them.

Surely—surely “the fields are white for the harvest”—and that “harvest is plenteous; but the laborers are few.” We have not given the names of all the places, nor probably of half the places—we have heard and read of, wanting preachers—yet what a number are here named! In some places, probably, the support would be feeble—in others, the friends would be rather choice in their selection of a preacher—but on the whole, the call, alone, shows the progression of our cause. May it continue to advance!

A. B. G.

UNIVERSALISM.

IN MAINE.—By the Banner and the Intelligencer, we learn that our cause is in a prosperous condition in this State. Brs. Drew and Gardner, of the Banner, give cheering statements of its situation and prospects in various places of note and prominence. For instance—in Portland city, “the good, old society of Universalists” has freed itself from the embarrassments under which it has been laboring for many years, and has taken measures to put its old meeting-house into good condition, and add to it modern improvements, and thus make it look “as well as new.” In Winthrop, our friends have decided to build next Spring—have purchased a site, and appointed a building committee. In Bangor a similar state of things exists. Our friends are very numerous, able and worthy. In Dexter, “the judicious and zealous labors of Br. Smith” (G. Smith,) have much prospered the society. “It is probably one of the best and strongest societies in the Eastern section of the State.” In Levant, our friends are erecting a house—one sign of prosperity. In Bucksport, the society is “steadily increasing,” under the efficient and zealous labors of Br. Fuhner. In Milburn, Bloomfield, Anson, Kennebunk, Solon, Bingham, Dover, Sangerfield, Guilford, Abbot and other places, we have many warm friends—in some of these places they are active, and ask for preachers—in others they are partially supplied with ministrations of the word of life.

IN MASSACHUSETTS.—Br. Whittemore, in the Trumpet, gives us, in general terms, the assurance, that in Boston and vicinity, an increased engagedness and activity prevails among our friends, and that highly favorable results may be expected during the present year. In Boston, especially, more may be expected in 1836 than has been effected in any former year. Among the numerous other places where our cause is at present particularly prosperous, may be named Charlestown, where Br. T. F. King has lately been installed as pastor of the Universalist society. In Haverhill a new Universalist paper has just been started, Br. O. A. Skinner, Editor; and a Sunday school embracing about one hundred scholars, and a female social Association, have just been organized. In Methuen the society is engaged in erecting a meeting-house—a Bereah society has just been organized, and much interest has been excited by it in community—after which it is needless to say, the cause is prospering. In West Amesbury a few friends have made arrangements to erect a meeting-house. Br. Whittemore says there are twenty or thirty societies in the State needing houses, and better able to build them than the friends in West Amesbury! West Newbury, East Bradford, and New-Rowley are encouragingly named, by Br. Skinner, of the Gospel Sun. Marblehead is similarly named, by Br. Whittemore.

IN NEW-HAMPSHIRE.—The Trumpet, the Watchman, the Star, and the Sun, all unite in testifying that New-Hampshire is doing well. An Association has lately been formed in Dover, for Strafford county, which it is believed will be beneficial to the cause. Rockingham county is doing well. Exeter is revived. In Hampstead, the dead are waking up to act, to live, to enjoy. A Conference lately held in Dorchester is believed to have aided the prosperity of the cause in that place. The society in Newport has been prospered under the labors of Br. A. L. Balch, and have resolved to arise and build. The society in Bath have engaged Br. Moses Ballou, for half, instead of one-fourth of his time, and will build a meeting-house soon. The brethren in Holderness have aided in building a union meeting-house. There has been very little preaching of our order in that place heretofore.

UNIVERSALIST PERIODICALS.

The Herald of Truth has been enlarged to the size of this paper, (as noticed in our last volume,) and three numbers of the new volume have been received. They contain a tale by Nelson Brown, of Henrietta, and the usual variety of interesting and instructive articles, original and selected. As we have some new readers, we will state again that the Herald of Truth is published at Geneva, every Friday, by Brs. I. Prescott, S. Miles and J. Chase, Proprietors.—Br. J. Chase, Editor; and Br. G. W. Montgomery, of Auburn, Corresponding Editor. Terms, the same as this paper.

The Watchman and Impartialist has again changed hands, and I think for the better. It is published at Lebanon, N. H.—Brs. John Moore and B. H. Fuller, Editors and Proprietors. Terms, $1.00, if paid within three months—$1.50, if paid within the year, and $2.00, if not paid within the year. The editorial articles certainly possess more spirit than when the paper fluctuated between two firms and the Association that was to have published it as a denominational paper.

Since writing the above, another number has been received. Brs. Moore and Fuller have ascertained that they must suffer loss, or raise the price of their paper. Hence they give notice that from henceforth new subscribers will be charged $1.50, if paid within six months, $2.00, if paid within the year, and $2.50 if delayed till the expiration of the year. Those who were subscribers before the 23d inst., will receive this volume at the prices above named. We hope, however, all who can afford it will pay the increased price—lowering the price was a very injudicious measure, and if it ends in nothing worse than "smoke," we shall think the doers of it well off.

The Southern Evangelist we are informed, by letter from its proprietor, Br. Andrews, commenced a new volume on the 6th inst., at Charleston, S. C. It will hereafter be published every week, and in the quarto form. The prospectus will be given by us soon.

To each and all of our numerous periodicals, we wish much success in prospering the cause to which they are devoted, and in rewarding their Editors and publishers.

STREETER'S HYMN BOOK.

Dr. Russel Streeter, at present the sole proprietor of this work, has published a statement respecting its present prices, in the Trumpet of the 17th inst., which occupies more than a column in that paper. As I would feel bound to append some remarks to it, if we copied it at his request—as Brs. Queal and Montgomery would be entitled to room to reply to it, if they wished it—as these might call for another statement from Br. Streeter—and as I believe our readers do not wish to pay for and read a controversy on that subject, I will merely state—Br. Streeter complains he is about five hundred dollars deficit for expenses in getting up the pocket edition, and that, nevertheless, he will reduce the prices as named below.

PER CONTRA.—Brs. Queal and Montgomery state that their proposed Hymn Book will contain more pages and more hymns than Streeter's, be as well executed and better bound, and yet can be afforded by them, by the hundred and the dozen, so as to allow the bookseller the usual profit on their proposed retail price, forty cents single—they printing an edition of six thousand copies.

The following are to be the prices of Streeter's Hymn Book, from the present time. The large size, to be published by Dr. P. Price, of New-York, at thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents per hundred, and five dollars per dozen. The pocket size, to be published as heretofore, by Br. T. Whittemore, of Boston, and sold at thirty-five dollars per hundred, and four dollars and seventy-five cents per dozen. The retailers to fix the prices of single copies to suit themselves—as low as they can afford them.

N. B. These prices, of course, apply to those in common binding, only.

NEW SINGING BOOK.

Evangelist A. C. Thomas, of the city of Brotherly Love, proposes publishing a new singing book for concerts of praise. It will contain about seventy tunes, (air and bass,) and about two hundred hymns. He has obtained permission from Mr. Joshua Leavitt, of New-York, to select a number of pieces from the Christian Lyre. It will be afforded very low—viz., twenty-five cents per copy—two dollars and fifty cents per dozen, and twenty dollars per hundred. The Evangelist must come into this region and start his concerts of praise, or the singing books will be bought and used only in the family circle—and, perhaps, occasionally, in the public meeting. From an acquaintance with Br. T., I expect an excellent work.

NOTICE.

All who have not notified a discontinuance are now considered subscribers for the volume. If there are any others who wish to discontinue, they should have notified sooner. We do not wish to force the paper upon any one; but we do not consider it right for subscribers to ask a discontinuance after we have issued some two, three or four numbers. For, even if they are returned, they are generally so defaced as to be unfit for supplying new subscribers.

In several instances where Postmasters were requested to notify discontinuances, they have neglected it until some three or four numbers have been issued. Consequently, those numbers remain dead in the postoffices. If our agents are willing to take them out and distribute them, it might be the means of extending the circulation of the paper.

THE GREAT FIRE.

We had designed, long before this, to notice the appeal of the committee of relief of New-York—but this has lingered behind with several other matters. They call for aid—for donations—for the relief of the mechanic and laborer who has lost his goods—his employment, even, for a time—and of the widow, the orphan, the lonely female and economic domestic, who had vested all their property and little savings in insurance and other stocks, now rendered worthless. This class is very numerous—and many of them must suffer severely, and for life, unless aid is rendered. It is said that the widow of Governor Clinton is among the number. The committee ask contributions from all who can give; and recommend that their fellow-citizens in the various cities, towns, villages and districts adopt such measures as may best aid in collecting the various sums into one, and transmitting it to the treasurer of the committee, JACOB LORILLARD, Esq., number 8, Jacob-street, New-York. A. B. G.

AGENTS.

Revs. T. J. Smith, W. H. Waggoner and E. Beale will act as agents for this paper wherever they may labor or travel. Also, Willard (instead of William) Martin, Guilford Centre, Vt.—Jabez Holcomb, P. M., Penn Line, Pa.—Thomas Cole, 2d, Little Falls—Nelson Nethaway, Alabama—Benjamin Abbott, Kelloggsville, Ohio—Robert Hilton, Detroit, Mich.—Anson Frisbee, South Cameron, will act as agents in their respective places and vicinities. Also, Br. Benjamin S. Keeler, of Newport, will act as agent for this paper in receiving and receipting money from any of our subscribers in Newport, Middleville, Fairfield, Herkimer, Little Falls, or vicinity, who may find it more convenient to pay him. Br. K. has a supply of sundry Universalist books for sale—such as the Discussion between Ely and Thomas, Skinner's Letters to Aikin, Memoir of Rev. J. Freeman, Streeter's Hymn Books, etc., etc.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. T. J. SMITH at Bridgewater—Br. BODEN at Richfield Springs, and at Little Lakes in the evening—Br. WHITNEY at French Creek—Br. WAGGONER at Russia.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in February, by Br. T. J. SMITH at Marshall Forge—Br. BODEN at Fly Creek—Br. WAGGONER at Little Lakes—Br. BRITTON at Theresa—Br. WHITNEY at Antwerp—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. POTTER at Salisbury.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in February, by Br. GROSH at Bridgewater—Br. WHITNEY at Richfield Springs—Br. POTTER at Eatonville—Br. J. FRENCH at Tully, and in the evening as the friends may appoint.

Br. J. FRENCH will preach on the evenings of Thursday, February 18, at the red schoolhouse in Hastings—Friday, 19, Salina—Monday, 22, La Fayette—Tuesday, 23, Truxton Corners.

* * In consequence of sending Br. C. B. Brown's letter to Clinton, his appointments were omitted, I having forgotten to copy, and being unable to remember them. They will appear in our next if not too late. A. B. G.

Br. BRITTON will preach at Plesis, (Flat Rock) on Saturday evening, February 13.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUN.

BY S. A. DANFORTH.

That orb which brightened Eden's bowers,
And spread the new-made earth with flowers,
Still, with its inexhausted powers
And radiant flame,
Through every age and every clime,
From days remote of ancient time,
Remains the same.

By it the mountain lava burns;
By it the cheerful Spring returns;
And the philosopher discerns,
By nature's laws,
Whether simple or compound,
In every thing some trace is found
Of the First Cause.

And when the darkness of the night
In some degree obscures the sight,
Then heaven reflects, with twinkling light,
Its borrowed rays;
But as the light of day returns,
Those heavenly lumps more dimly burn,
Then die away.

There's not a plant or tree that grows,
A bud that blooms, a stream that flows,
Or crystal in its cavern glows,
Without the sun;
For by its universal sway,
Life is diffused through earth and sea,
To every one.

Thus are the ways of God displayed,
In all the works his hands have made;
And through this medium is conveyed
To mortal ken,
Not only gifts which nature yields,
But Heaven in sweeter songs reveals
Good will to men.

And as the fainter light decays,
Before the sun's resplendent rays,
And vanish from approaching day
Like morning dew;
So Gospel truth as far outshines
The unregenerated mind,
When brought to view.

It waked the shepherds from the plain,
Who trembling viewed the heavenly train.
And learned from them the purest strain
To mortals given;
And joy broke forth from every tongue,
While praises in the highest rung
To God in heaven.

The veil of mystery flew away
Before the light of Gospel day,
When light and immortality
Were brought to light;
The lame received new strength to walk,
The deaf to hear, the dumb to talk,
And blind their sight.

Such matchless love, till then unknown,
Through Christ the Mediator shown,
Who came in mercy to his own,
The lost to seek;
And with a miracle he fed
A needy multitude with bread,
And blessed the meek.

He healed the sick, he raised the dead,
His vanquished foes before him fled,
And life's immortal ray was shed
Around the tomb;
And that bright hope which never dies,
Of future bliss beyond the skies,
Dispelled the gloom.

Then, as the brilliant source of day,
Dispels the gloom of night away,
And ever with impartial sway,
Falls not to shine;
So may the beams of heavenly love,
From every heart each doubt remove,
With truth divine.

In vain I sought six lines to find,
Of proverb true or precept kind,
To occupy this corner spare;
I searched each paper, scrap and book,
Till vexed, perplexed, my pen I took
And six lines wrote—lo, here they are!

THE TRIUMPHS OF FAITH.

This vain world
Is colder than the northern skies, but faith
Looks o'er the icy mountains, looks beyond
The wintry clouds, and sees unfading bloom
Of paradise—sees peaceful streams of joy;
And warm effulgence of the God of love.

The human mind is constituted to believe in an intelligent First Cause of all things, and in its own advancing and immortal destiny. When this faith is an abiding inhabitant of the heart, and exerts a lively influence over its feelings, and the outward expression of them, it is indeed the best gift of God to man. It comprehends all that the most ardent wishes of the heart can desire, all that its most soaring ambition can seek. Endless life, boundless knowledge, and unchanging happiness.

To no human being are the things of futurity a matter of small moment. There is a deep and inextinguishable interest in the mysteries of the unseen world; for there are the loved and lost of this, and thither the footsteps of each survivor are rapidly hastening. That shadowed and cloud-wrapt futurity! How often do its secrets crowd upon the mind, and mock its irrepressible, but fruitless questionings! How eagerly does the mind grasp at any thing however slight, that promises to raise the veil! How easily does it give credence to those who profess to dissipate its darkness, without sufficiently testing the authority of their credentials! The metaphysician has grown grey in his speculations on the nature of the soul, but died and left the reality unfound. The hour of dissolving nature has been watched to see if the last stern conflict could throw any light on the path of the departing spirit. The student has entered into the very theatre of its operations, and dissected the fibres of its tenement, but found no trace of the wonderful tenant. The machinery was all there—but at rest, for the operator was gone. The keys of the instrument were all there—but the music was silent, for the musician had fled. The baffled inquirer turns from his feeble efforts, to divine promise—from the darkness of his powers, to the lights of faith; not, however, without feeling that the effort to know, indicates a life to come, and dimly shadows forth that immortality it sought, so unavailing to develop.

The mind is not satisfied with earthly joys and earthly things. It seeks something purer and more exalted than the best and noblest of this world. Its feelings of veneration that are inherent, demand an object, on which they may flow unchecked by the errors and imperfections which cling to the most perfect of mortals—in one word, they demand a God! Faith supplies that want—she reveals that object in the Deity.

The mind seeks also a home for its splendid creations, and would fain realize its brilliant illusions, and embody somewhere its cherished idols of beauty and excellence which find here no counterpart. Faith promises a world where each innocent hope shall be fulfilled—each pure and beautiful thought enter into its full and perfect rest.

In the weakness of our nature, is the triumph of faith. It is not in the sunny hour of prosperity that her full value is felt, and of necessity acknowledged; but when the storm has arisen, and the frail vessel rocks wildly, on a tempestuous sea; when winds and waves make fearful strife around, and bury her in the deep:—then how welcome is the voice which says, "Fear not, thy Father is at the helm!" There is bliss in the assurance, and fear and sorrow are lost in filial trust; for a father will not, cannot make shipwreck of his children.

And how often is that assurance needed in the varied events of life, for grief here is a familiar word. The cup of felicity is dashed from the lips, or drops of bitterness mingled with its sweets, and man is born to weep in every stage of his being, from cradled infancy to that second childhood which totters on the bank of the tomb. The social affections are but "fountains of tears." Change and death are ever busy with earthly love. There are moments when all consolation is utterly vain, save that which flows from a reliance on the wisdom and goodness of our Father in heaven. These moments are when the feeble pulse grows feebler beneath our touch; when the eye grows dim as we gaze, and the labored breath is rapidly sinking into that awful mysterious stillness, which the loudest thunders cannot disturb, or the still more potent agony of the broken heart. Life has no more terrible moment—faith no sterner trial than when love watches by the deathbed of a friend. Then the wealth of worlds would be gladly given to stay for one instant the parting spirit, and the hope that we shall meet again, is dearer than the dearest of earthly blessings. Well may reason tremble on her throne, as the skeptic looks on the animated clod, never again to be kindled with the fire of intellect; well may he lament, in inconsolable bitterness, the hour that woke him into being; well may he pray for the dreamless slumber that shall steep his sorrowing spirit again in unconsciousness, never to be broken; that shall wrap the mourner and the mourned in the same eternal repose.

Happy are the children of faith, for to them misfortunes have lost their sting. Happier than the monarch on his throne; the conqueror with the flush of victory on his brow, or the philosopher in the "cyry of his eagle thought" are these often despised believers in the Most High; these humble dependants on his parental care. To them the dark passages of life are all bathed in sunlight from above. To them the grave is but an entrance to a more glorious mansion in their "Father's house;" the place where the mortal puts on immortality. If the light of their lives has perished; if one by one, the bright stars of their horizon have gone down, and the "radiance has grown dim in their hearts"—yet they are not cheerless; for the promises of God pour in their splendid hopes upon the darkened spirit. The world beyond the tomb shines gloriously down on their path—so gloriously, that the pilgrims walk onward, though with bleeding feet, through a rugged and thorny way, with eyes fixed on that blessed consummation of their being, with hearts that utter but one sentiment—The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice.

EXTRACT.

It is the belief of the Arabs that to the earliest places of human worship there clings a guardian sanctity—there the wild bird rests not, there the wild beast does not wander, it is the blessed spot on which the eye of God dwells, and man's best memories preserve. As with the earliest place of worship, so it is with the earliest haven of repose—as with the spot where our first imperfect adoration was offered up, our first glimpses of divinity indulged, so should it be with that where our full knowledge of the Arch Cause begins, and we can pour forth a gratitude no longer clouded by the troubles and cares of earth. Surely if any spot in the world be sacred, it is that in which grief ceases, from which, if the harmonies of creation, if the voice within our hearts, if the impulse which made man so easy a believer in revelation, if these mock and fool us not with an everlasting lie, we spring upon the untiring wings of a seraphic and pangsless life—those whom we loved, around us; the aspirations that we nursed, fulfilled; our nature, universal intelligence; our atmosphere, eternal love.

Love your religious opposers, treat them with attention and respect, show them that you are not governed by illiberal and uncharitable feelings.

NEW PUBLICATION.

J. Kidwell proposes to publish, "by subscription, in Philomath, Ind., for the benefit of the W. U. Seminary, a monthly periodical, to be entitled the Philomath Encyclopedia," to be devoted to the sciences.

TERMS.—The Encyclopedia is to be published monthly, on super-royal paper—duodecimo form, at $2 per annum, in advance. All communications to be directed to the publisher, Centreville, Ind.

MARRIAGES.

In Houseville, Lewis county, on the 18th inst., by Rev. M. Salmon, Mr. GEORGE WOOLWORTH, to Miss EMILY COLLINS.

DEATHS.

In Sodus. — MERRY, son of our esteemed Br. Merry, in the 5th year of his age. As he was entering the house, he fell from the stairs leading into the door, and struck his neck on a piece of timber which (though at first it was considered but a small bruise) terminated in his death. His parents, brothers and sisters mourn not as those who have no hope. The writer attended the funeral, and tendered the rich consolations of the Gospel to the mourners, and to a large and respectable concourse of people. T. D. Cook.

THE PREACHER.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY A. B. GROSH.

"But it is good to be zealously affected always, in a good thing; and not only when I am present with you." Gal. iv: 18.

I design, in this discourse, to examine familiarly into various means and measures that might be used and pursued to advance the prosperity of our cause. I have selected a text rather as a matter of form than of utility, though the sentiment it conveys is both excellent and correct.

The observing mind of a Shakspeare has declared, that "there is a tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at its flood, leads on to fortune." To every society blessed with such a tide, I would respectfully propose for consideration the following desultory remarks on the means of improving the blessing to the greatest advantage. To the inquiry, then, How shall we be zealously affected toward the good work of advancing the Redeemer's cause? I answer briefly,

I. By a regular attendance on meetings. Where numbers are but few, punctuality in attendance is the more necessary, as the absence of any one is the more readily felt. That absence affects sensibly those who attend; and especially does the speaker feel the frequent absence of his hearers, as a silent but eloquent rebuke for the uninteresting, uninteresting nature of his sermons—or looks with sorrow on the spiritual apathy of his flock to the subjects. Persons not belonging to the congregation, are differently affected by the absence of a hearer from his regular place of worship. Seeing him sauntering around the streets, or woods, or fields, or spending his Sunday in reading at home, or in attending other meetings, the first inference is, there is no meeting; or, if there is, the speaker must be one not worth hearing—or, if the speaker is worth listening to, the meeting must be disreputable, or unpopular, for surely that person would not otherwise absent him or herself from it. Thus, very frequently, the meetings are rendered base and contemptible in the eyes of the public, by the neglect of our friends to attend them regularly. And certainly we cannot ask others to respect, and to be interested in what we do not outwardly respect, nor manifest any interest in, ourselves.

If the hours for attending the meetings are inconvenient to the great body of hearers, let them be altered for the better—but, at all events, strive to have every possible thing out of the way of interference with attendance on meeting. I do not approve of a Pharisaic strictness, or fanatical imprudence, in attending on public worship—but let not a trifle keep your feet from the sanctuary—at least, let nothing hinder your coming which would not be sufficient to prevent your attendance on ordinary business—at some social meeting, or on some party of pleasure. The great absence of people from churches in a city, on a rainy Sunday, has led some wags to speak very gravely and learnedly on the pernicious and unhealthy effects of Sunday rain on all persons, except preachers, bellringers, and a few others—and to ask why it is so? for certainly (they argue) people who do not mind a smart shower on all other days of the week, dread most keenly, the slightest sprinkling on Sunday. In country places, where muddy roads are added to "weeping skies," there is more excuse for a small meeting on rainy Sundays, than there is in cities, where only an umbrella is required as a shelter. But in both, the general rule might be laid down, to go in despite of any trifle which would not hinder our going out on any other day of the week.

In relation to the interesting or uninteresting nature of the services, much, perhaps, depends on familiarity with the speaker's voice and manner—but more on the state of mind and feeling cherished by the hearer. Though we all had rather hear a lively, than a dull speaker—an intelligent, than an ignorant one, yet I know that a habit of regularity in attending meeting, will render even the latter more pleasant than the former would be, without such regularity. And, surely, if the preacher does not exercise all his little stock of ingenuity and knowledge in retailing error, the lover of truth can always hear something which will repay him for attendance on his ministrations—some instructive matter for future meditation. And how can it be expected that your preacher will improve in sprightliness of tone and manner, if you depress his heart with coldness, inattention and neglect? Or how can he have courage to prepare himself properly for the duties of the desk, when he has the fear of empty seats and an absent congregation constantly before him, during the preceding week? Afford him the necessary stimulus of your presence, and the encouragement of your attention, for two or three hours on each Sunday, and if he does not then make the necessary exertions to repay your efforts, exchange, not the congregation, but the preacher—absent not yourselves, but procure some more industrious, or useful, or acceptable man to minister to you in his room and stead, when the term of his engagement shall have expired.

It often happens to a public speaker, that he is the last one of the congregation to become acquainted with his own failings and deficiencies as a speaker. Yet without knowing wherein he is deficient, it is impossible for him to rectify the defect. I would, then, that our congregations did their duty to our preachers, in this respect, particularly. It is poor evidence of a physician's humanity that he suffered a limb to perish, lest he should give some small pain, by probing its wounds, that they might be healed. So it is but poor evidence of a zeal for your preachers' welfare, to sit Sunday after Sunday, and hear them repeat errors, or witness frequent exhibitions of their defects, and yet never name neither to them, lest they may feel a little mortification at not finding themselves altogether perfect! Do you not see that, by your silence and their consequent ignorance, they are but exposing themselves, and rendering themselves more and more ridiculous in public estimation? If, then, you love your preachers, or respect the cause in which they are engaged, point out to them their defects and errors, and teach them how they may render themselves yet more worthy of your esteem and support. Nor deem one instance of such kindness sufficient. Errors and defects are not thus easily cured. Renew, therefore, your admonitions, until the cause of them is seen no more. Do this properly and faithfully, and in a moderate length of time you will have little cause to absent yourselves from meeting, because of the uninteresting nature of the services there. For your interest in the services will then be as great as is the preacher's. You will look on each other as mutual instructors and friends, anxious for each other's improvement and welfare.

Hence, if you would have your meetings respected—if you would acquire an interest in them—if you would have your speaker improve for your edification and pleasure—and if, by these means, you would advance the cause of truth—be careful, regular and prompt in attending the meetings, not as casual spectators, but as interested members of them. Such a state of feelings—such a union of reciprocal interests—is undoubtedly a good thing, and it is good to be always zealously affected in a good thing.

II. To advance our cause, it is well to be zealously affected in keeping up all the forms and feelings of social intercourse, among all who are within the sphere of our influence. I was much struck with the remark of a warm-hearted brother from the South. "Your Universalists are not sociable enough—more converts are made, and more friends are kept warm and zealous, by social intercourse, than by public preaching." The censure and the observation are both very correct. I do not say that we are behind our Partialist brethren in social kindness—for we are far before them—but we are not kind and social enough.

Though the time has passed by, when people expected to see some signal mark of Divine disapprobation stamped on the forehead of any one who professed a belief in Universalism—though the belief of our depraved and immoral condition, in consequence of our faith, is fast being weakened by an exhibition of our acts—yet still, our religious characters and our religious sentiments are perfectly abhorred by a large portion of the Christian world around us. Being ignorant of our sentiments, they abhor them—and abhorring them, they will remain ignorant of them. It is a dark picture for our hopes to look upon, but it is a correct one. They will not read our books and publications—or if they do, it is to pick out defects and pass by beauties—to read with prejudiced eyes, and a determination not to understand and believe. They will not attend our meetings; for they deem Universalist meeting-houses the synagogues of satan—or if they do attend, it is with ears stopped, that they may not hear what is said. Are they not deserving of your compassion? Can you not remember when you were as miserably prejudiced as they are? And will you do nothing to release them from their narrow prison? O, mingle with them kindly—converse with them affectionately—instruct their ignorance, soothe their fears, calm their opposition, gently bear with their weaknesses, and, by an exhibition of the truth, shew them how far you agree with them, and how important is the agreement—wherein you differ from them, and the reasons of that difference. There are but few—very few Partialists that may not be won to Universalism, by such a course of conduct on our part.

How often, in preaching in a new place, have I heard some one say, who had heard Universalism preached for the first time, "Is that Universalism? Why, how very different it is from what I have always heard it represented!" Now, it is not often that your preachers can get such persons to listen to them—but you may find them and converse with them often. O, then, deal mildly and gently with them; for they have been cruelly deceived. Carefully remove their prejudices from their understandings, and explain fully, and clearly, and repeatedly, the glorious truths you profess. Make them know the surpassing loveliness of God, and Jesus, and the Bible, and religion, and duty, and morality, in our sight; and learn them that instead of hating, despising, or feeling coldly toward them, they are most dear to our hearts and precious in our estimation. And not only do this by precept—but by example prove it to them. In your daily walk and conversation with them and with each other—at the domestic fireside, in the social circle and in the public sanctuary, let your actions draw forth the merited declaration, "See how these Universalists love each other!" And when you have succeeded, in part, in removing their ignorance of us and our faith, and consequently in breaking down their unwarranted prejudices, then let your influence be exerted to bring them to unite with you in the public sanctuary, and in hearing the instructions of the Gospel from your preachers.

I know that nearly all Universalists feel a delicacy on this subject—nor would I have you officiously and impertinently to intrude your invitations—but kindly offer them as a reciprocation of that anxious civility with which Partialists invite you to their meetings. To the young, particularly, these remarks are respectfully submitted for consideration. In them, friendly and social attachments are peculiarly strong and lively—unaccustomed to separations, they follow, with yearning hearts, the footsteps of wandering associates. And on that day of days, when all nature seems wakened to devotion and praise, their affections are also awakened, and they have a strong desire to walk to the house of God in company with the youthful partakers of their weekday joys. Owing to the rigid, narrow views of Partialism, and the illiberal sectarianism it inspires, this longing of the soul is easily suppressed in Partialist youths and maidens. But Universalism, kind, lenient and tolerant in its views, and liberal in its practices—yea, even in its forms of devotion—is not so unyielding.—Hence, it frequently happens that Universalist young men and women become almost constant attendants on Partialist meetings, to please their associates; when those associates will scarcely ever (if ever) be seen in Universalist meeting, to please their Universalist friends in return. Is such conduct the equality of friendship and mutual affection? or is it the inequality of slavery, and of the reciprocal duties of master and slave? Are there not reciprocal duties and mutual obligations, in every relationship and union which can be formed between one moral being and another? And are not these duties and obligations equal, on both sides, in that relation called friendship? If so; how can friendship exist where the obligations and civilities are so unequally laid and paid, as in the case we have just named? Surely a Partialist young man cannot respect the faith, or virtue, or moral honesty and moral courage of his Universalist friend, when he finds him so weak and pliant—so accommodating to Partialism—so cold and indifferent to Universalism. Nor can he regard him as his equal, when he finds him so willing to submit to every caprice and whim—so willing to give up all his rights—to oblige his Partialist acquaintance, without ever asking a reciprocity of the civility. Depend upon it, my youthful friends, when friendship becomes all demand and authority on one side, and all compliance and submission on the other, it is only another name for degrading inequality, and moral slavery. Never, then, give up your privilege of equality in friendship—and never wholly forsake your own meetings, until you forsake the faith there taught.

To reciprocate occasional attendance at other meetings, is both good and proper for you—but to give your own up wholly, to please another, is base, cowardly, and weak in any one—in Partialist or Universalist—in male or female—in the child or in the parent. If, in the performance of any act, the dictates of judgment and conscience should be obeyed, they surely ought to be in the public worship of our heavenly Father. And cold and ungrateful to that kind Father of all, must that heart be, which can deliberately forsake the places where He is worshipped in spirit and in truth, to attend wholly on ministrations where God's highest glory and praise is withheld from him—and where his character is blackened in the most shameful manner, by ascriptions of tyranny and cruelty unutterable! Oh, if it were possible for God to be as vindictive as his children slanderously report him, the hottest fires, the deepest agonies, and the severest tortures of his wrath, would surely be the portions of those cowardly hypocrites who knew him most lovely, and yet thus desecrated him—who knew how to worship him, yet wilfully and habitually united with others in slandering his holy name!

While, then, you assert and freely exercise your rights, let it be done with kindness and civility for the rights of others. Cherish that spirit of social intercourse which makes you equal with our opposers, and them equal with you. Remove their prejudices, by approving all that is true in their faith, and correct in their conduct—by pointing out clearly the differences between their faith and your own, with the reasons why you thus differ from them:—and win them to a candid and full examination of the truth, by showing the liberal and salutary influence which it exerts on the conduct and affections of its believers. And if to do thus be good in itself, and good in the end it is calculated to produce—and who can doubt it?—then remember that “it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you.”

III. I have seldom, if ever, presumed to meddle in the pecuniary concerns of our societies; and (may I not say it with modesty?) I have not been anxious to profit in a pecuniary manner by their liberality. But while on this subject, I would be guilty of an avoidance of duty, did I not say, that the cause of truth may be much advanced by a careful attention to an increase of your pecuniary funds, and, by their aid, an increase of the number of your stated meetings and other means for promoting the knowledge of the truth.

It frequently happens that there are some, who, when support for public worship is sought, are passed by—persons who would willingly assist, if their assistance was solicited, and who feel themselves neglected as of no account, if they are not solicited to aid their brethren. True; they may live some distance off—and their assistance may be but small, compared with the trouble of procuring it—yet to secure their attendance, and to build them up with the other members of the society, in brotherly unity, is worth attending to. For I need not inform you who are acquainted with the workings of the heart and the mind, that while one man deems it criminal to support the preacher by pecuniary contributions, another deems it as criminal to attend often, without contributing his proportion of the pecuniary support. We should be glad to secure the attendance of all, so far as can be done. And it would be well, therefore, for the increase of our congregations, for the frequency of our meetings, and for lessening the burdens of the few who now yield their support, if those at a distance, or those who can contribute but a small sum, were respected and called upon, not in proportion to their ability and your case, but to their willingness to give, and the importance of their regular attendance with us. And I do think, that if our younger brethren generally, were to call meetings among themselves, allot to each other a certain portion of the necessary labor, and go to work with all the energy and perseverance which I know they can exert in so good a cause, and one, too, to which they owe so much—I do believe they could, in a short time, secure sufficient to warrant you in supporting the preached word for a part, if not all, of the time; and for all other purposes which need money and can be made beneficial. The effect of such a gain would be very great in advancing the prosperity of our societies. But it must be done by our younger members. I would be ashamed to ask or expect it from those venerable fathers in Zion, who have already so nobly borne the heat and burden of their day; and who, now that the shades of evening close around them, are faint with toil, and need repose instead of activity. Excuse me for pressing this hitherto neglected subject. I believe that “now is the accepted time,” and I feel most sensibly that your efforts in this affair must be crowned with considerable success—that your success will infuse new life and vigor into the societies to which you are attached—and that this, again, will impart new spirit and energy to your preachers, and render their labors more animating and interesting. May I then fervently implore and beseech our younger friends to think seriously of these things—to look around and see what can be done, however trifling—whenever they meet each other, in recreation or business, to compare and communicate their several plans and observations, and allot to each one his due portion, and set about its performance immediately and steadily, with all their energy, prudence and powers? Remember, “it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing”—and may God give you grace and strength to be so—for I am more and more satisfied that Universalism must be practised as well as professed—that it must be practised with energy, as well as be loved with ardor—if we would have it prevail abidingly either in our own hearts, or in the hearts of others.

WHAT IS MAN?.....No. 1

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

“The proper study of mankind is man,” says the old axiom, and says it truly. The proposition seems self-evident, that an examination of the powers and faculties bestowed upon us by the Author of our being, must be an employment both pleasing and useful. Mankind are created in measurable ignorance of the properties of their nature, yet with capacities fully competent to acquire all needed information upon this interesting subject. But before this knowledge can be obtained—before the above inquiry can be correctly answered—these capacities must be duly cultivated and properly exercised, that we may look in upon ourselves, and take cognizance of the wonderful powers we possess. It is a lamentable truth, that the great mass of the world have ever neglected this important study of self, and have passed heedlessly through life, without reflecting, or deeming it necessary or useful to reflect, upon the nature of the distinctions between the human race and the brute creation. And yet it needs but a slight glance at the peculiarities of the evils which beset mankind, to discover that the greater proportion of these evils arise from an ignorance in men, of the real nature of their most vital wants, and a consequent blindness as to the sources from whence these wants can be supplied. And so long as this ignorance shall continue, so long will they remain liable to that unhappiness, which, though not necessarily flowing from their constitution, is yet the legitimate fruit of ignorance. Hence, the study of the nature of man, assumes an importance commensurate with our desire for true enjoyment.

Were mankind to learn the qualities which elevate them above the brute, and were they to act in constant reference to, and under the entire guidance of, these distinctive qualities, the most fruitful sources of earthly suffering would become annihilated. What, then, is the distinction between the human race and the animal creation? The answer is concise and plain:—In addition to all the powers which man possesses in common with the brute, the Father of mercies has kindly bestowed upon us moral and intellectual capacities. These are the highest properties with which man is endowed; and they form the only, yet striking distinction between him and the lower orders of creation. Deprive him of them, or let him deprive himself of their exercise and influence, and although he may still possess the form, yet he will have no legitimate title to the appellation of man.

From these slight observations it will be discovered that the question above can be properly answered thus:—Man is a moral and intellectual being. These faculties raise him to an almost infinite degree above the brute—they make him an entirely different creature, capable of loftier requirements, and susceptible to higher, purer influences. They form the relationship which unites him to a still loftier grade of beings, dwellers in a holier and happier world. The Scriptures are a warrant for these assertions. They instruct us, that man is created in the image of God. In what respect have we been created in the image or resemblance of God? Surely not in our bodily construction. But we have been created with moral and intellectual capacities similar in nature, though incomparably less in perfection, to those possessed by the Deity. These powers in us, are but a faint shadow of those which shine in resplendent glory in the character of our God.

In the same light should we view the declaration of the Psalmist, that man is made, "a little lower than the angels." We have powers and faculties resembling those with which the angels are endowed, and indeed so similar that, in the great scale of being, we rank next to the angels of God. From the peculiarities of our earthly state, we are "a little lower than the angels." The mighty powers of the human soul are, at present, locked in this tabernacle of flesh and blood, contaminated and fettered by the low passions of their frail tenement. But change the condition of the soul—release it from its house of clay—strike off those manacles which chain it to the sinful propensities of the body—exalt it to another world, amid more favorable circumstances, and with the same mental and moral capacities it now possesses, it will become an angel! How intimate, then, is our relationship with heavenly beings—how close the approximation between our high powers, and those of the angelic hosts! It is an ennobling thought, which elevates man immeasurably above that low standard by which his nature and capacities have too long been measured.

LEADING SOULS TO HELL.

BY EV. J. LEWIS.

It is often asserted by the opposers of Universalism, that the preachers of that doctrine, and indeed all who take any active part in its promulgation, are leading the people (blindfolded, as it were) to hell: That is, as they wish to be understood, to a place of endless misery; for this, they contend, is the proper meaning of the word hell in the Scriptures. Now I am certain that this definition is totally incorrect, and that the above accusation is false and slanderous; yet, for the sake of argument, let the one be admitted as correct, and the other be allowed to stand uncontradicted. The advocates of Universalism are then engaged in a most nefarious business. But a thought has struck my mind. Should they succeed in getting the people to hell, it is by no means certain they will be able to get them in. "The keys of hell" are in the hands of Jesus Christ. Should he refuse to second their designs, their whole scheme must fail. It is he, alone, who can crown their labors with success. Will he, then, open the gates of hell, at the call of those arch-deceivers—signify his approbation of their conduct, by accepting at their hands, the poor, deluded souls whom they have decoyed away from the road to heaven; and order the unhappy wretches to be confined in the prison of infinite and unending pains, because they were so weak as to be led astray by men more cunning than themselves? Partialist, what is thy answer?

It is sometimes said, respecting an individual, not merely that he is leading the people to hell, but that he has actually accomplished it, in numerous instances. Allowing this to be correct, the blessed Redeemer has not only been accepting from this deceiver, the poor victims of his seduction, that he might shut them up in interminable torment, but he is actually allowing him to return, again and again, for the purpose of seducing more. * * * Oh, my soul! Are the opposers of the doctrine of the "restitution of all things" aware of the fact, that the above accusation is calculated to fix an indelible stigma upon the character of the immaculate Jesus? "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

A CONVERTED UNIVERSALIST.

BY REV. K. TOWNSEND.

Yes, reader, a real, tangible, living, moving, converted Universalist. An itinerating preacher, especially a preacher of Universalism, sees some strange sights, besides hearing some "strange things;" and it was my good or ill fortune, while journeying in Canada, to see what I had long wished to see—a Partialist that would unequivocally avow that he had once been a Universalist. There were some fifteen or twenty persons present, I speaking, they listening; my subject of course, the "great salvation." I had not proceeded far, when up stepped a gentleman, meeting me with rather an uncourteous contradiction. In plain words, says he, "'Tis not so," and by way of confirmation, added, "I was once a Universalist myself." Now I should never have been a Universalist, had I taken every man's "say so;" so I begged liberty to ask him two questions. He thought he would answer them. Well, friend, you say you were once a Universalist; and pray let me ask, what are you now? "Oh," he replied, "God has seen fit to show me my error, and I am now—I suppose you would call me a Presbyterian—I belong to that church." Very well; now will you be so kind as to tell me what Universalists generally believe Jesus Christ came into the world for?—to save men from what? The answer was ready in due time. "From punishment." Well Sir, I replied, you are the very man I took you to be, and it has been my fortune to hear of the death-bed renunciation and protracted meeting conversion of a number of such Universalists. Men as ignorant of our faith, as was the beast of Balaam. All eyes were turned upon the man, and shame and confusion were indelibly written upon his countenance. He finally stammered out a request that I would answer my own question. This I declined, assuring him that if he was ever a Universalist, he knew as much about it as I did. For a moment he seemed in a deep study, but finally broke silence with, "Well, I don't know as I ever really believed the doctrine; but I tried to!"

Friend, said I, before you go, I have a few words to offer. You commenced our conversation by saying you were once a Universalist; you have already admitted that you were a hypocrite. You next inform me that you are a Presbyterian; you will excuse my suspicions of your integrity, as you commenced our conversation with a falsehood. With a few words of advice, we parted, and should this ever meet the eye of the converted Universalist, I feel confident that it will find him a wiser, and I hope a better man.

BIBLE READING.....No. I.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

As in the present enlightened state of society, the rules and principles contained in the Bible, form—or are intended to form—the basis of our laws and characters, it seems highly necessary that that Book should be studied much, and with devotional attention, both by young and old. I do not, indeed, approve its being used for a school book, as has lately become the fashion; for in this case, its divine instructions assume the form of tasks; and we all know how the mind revolts, even in long after years of ripened judgment, at the bare idea of perusing those old, worn-out lessons, through which we were once daily drilled, and whose hard-spelled words used so often to vex our little impatient hearts. I would not, therefore, have it used as a school book, for the above-mentioned, and many other equally good reasons; but I would have children early acquainted with the most important portions of its history and precepts, and more particularly with the kind, parental Being, who gave it as a revelation for their greatest good. These things a truly pious and affectionate parent will find pleasure, as well as profit, in teaching to his children. A slight knowledge of infantile feeling and capacity, will enable him to select, for their perusal or hearing, those simply beautiful and touching passages, which will not only tend to elevate and improve their understandings, but warm their young, tender hearts with love and veneration for their good Father in heaven, (whom their imaginations will naturally liken to their dear earthly parent,) and also with deep affection for each other; and thus lay the foundation for lives of humanity, piety, usefulness and consequent happiness. I am necessarily brief on this subject, but am not without hope that this slight hint may arouse, to at least reflection, some of those parents who are too apt, amid the bustling cares of public or private life, to forget that the tares of the enemy may spring up unnoticed in the hearts of those darling ones, for whose moral characters they are to be, in a great measure, responsible. Let them see, then, closely to their first impressions. Let them remember, that they have in their hands a Book which is able to make their children, as well as themselves, "wise unto salvation"—and that the neglect of the same may cause them to become wanderers and outcasts upon the face of the earth—"without hope and without God in the world."

The following is extracted from the Saturday Courier, of August last. To some of your readers it will probably be new, and I doubt not that all will be pleased to see that the Editor of this extensively circulated periodical dares to speak out, and speak plainly too. K. T.

"SERIOUS QUESTIONS."

"We find the following in the course of some judicious observations in the Philadelphian of last week, on the riots and outrages that afflict the patriot and cast down the philanthropist:—

"The papers from all quarters are filled with details of outrage and crime, popular violence and individual wrong. Our country is in a 'dreadful state.' There are deep heavings in the mass of agitated mind. The laws have become nugatory. Agrarian principles are taking deep root, and no man can say how long he is secure, or how soon he may be at the mercy of misguided and ferocious mobs. Such is the spirit of violence abroad that every trace of order, freedom and public virtue will disappear, if the friends of truth and liberty, of morality and individual rights, do not speedily rally and combine their influence and strength." [Upon this the Editor of the Courier remarks.] "Is it so? Is it not a pity, then, that the millions that have been gleaned in this country for years past, and sent off to distant countries for the improvement of the 'Heathen,' had not been applied to the education of our own youth, to the moral and intellectual improvement of our own people? Not, we do not mean, to be expended in the promulgation of tracts, filled with all manner of illiberal dogmas of narrow-minded bigotry, but in disseminating useful knowledge, promoting public virtue, and in strengthening 'the friends of truth and liberty, of morality and individual right?' Is it not time to pause, and worth the while of those who evince so great love for the natives of the far India, and the inhabitants of strange lands, to consider whether real charity does not begin at home? What an immense amount of good might have been achieved in our own land, by the millions that have been sent away, and that have accomplished—WHAT?"

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE CHAUTAUQUE CIRCUIT CONFERENCE.

Convened at Dunkirk, January 20, 1836, and organized the Council by choosing Br. A. Sprague, Moderator, and Br. A. Williams, Clerk.

Voted, That all brethren present, not delegates, be received as members of the Council.

Whereas, it is signified to this Conference, that there are yet several societies within the limits of the circuit, destitute of preaching, and whereas, they have manifested their desire to obtain preaching, therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend to those societies, to report to their respective circuit committee, and through them, or by delegation to the next Conference, the amount they will raise to sustain the preached word, that measures may be immediately taken to satisfy their wants.

Voted, That when the Conference adjourn, it adjourn to meet at Panama, the first Saturday and Sunday in March next.

Voted, That Br. A. Williams, prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, with the solicitation for them to be copied in the Herald of Truth. A. SPRAGUE, Moderator. A. Williams, Clerk.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.....PART I.
(INSCRIBED TO A—A.)

I. I cannot find anything with which I may more appropriately commence this selection for your use, than the subjoined sonnet, by Mrs. Hemans, which I have copied upon one of the blank leaves of my mother's Bible. Mrs. Hemans, like myself, seems to have been educated solely by her mother. My mother had the sole charge of me from my fourth year, when my father died, till her own death, in my fourteenth year. During that period she, with unceasing care and effort, and with a mother's winning tenderness, labored to implant the seeds and elements of piety, virtue, and all goodness. For which cause I often pour, "with grateful tears, heart-blessings on the holy dead."

TO A FAMILY BIBLE.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

What household thoughts around thee as their shrine
Cling reverently! Of anxious looks beguiled,
My mother's eyes upon thy page divine
Were daily bent; her accents, gravely mild,
Breathed out thy love;—whilst I, a dreamy child,
On breeze-like fancies wandered oft away,
To some lone tuft of gleaming spring-flowers wild,
Some fresh discovered nook for woodland play,
Some secret nest:—yet would the solemn word,
At times, with kindlings of young wonder heard,
Fall on my wakened spirit, there to be
A seed not lost; for which, in darker years,
O Book of Heaven! I pour with grateful tears,
Heart-blessings on the Holy Dead and Thee.

II. Take the common or authorized version of the Bible, my dear A—a, and there read the first psalm, and afterwards ask yourself the following questions:—In what does the blessedness spoken of, in verse 1, consist? Are the characters enumerated in this verse, each, one degree more debased and more hopeless than the one immediately preceding? Does standing denote a closer intercourse than walking; and sitting, a communion more intimate than either? In what way does the spirit and conduct, mentioned in the second verse, conduce to blessedness? Or does the second verse point out the nature or the source of the blessedness? Is a tree planted at the meeting of waters a very forcible or impressive emblem of a man "whose way is prosperous"? In what respect are the wicked like chaff? You may take also, what constitutes a very good commentary and exposition of the sacred writings, a Bible with parallel passages, and after examining the parallelisms, and having collected all the aids you can, to ascertain the sense of the writer of this hymn, compare the result to which you arrive with that view of the psalm which is conveyed in the following translation and notes, which I long ago made from the Hebrew. Whichever of the views—that to which you arrive by your own researches, or that deduced from this new translation—whichsoever seems to you to have been the meaning of the writer, or whichsoever imparts the most important truth, to that adhere, my dear A—a, and lay it up in the storehouse of thy memory.

Before I give you my translation and remarks, I may remind you, that this psalm has always appeared to me one full of beauty and of truth; and that it is one most appropriately prefixed to the collection of Hebrew hymns. The knowledge which David, and other writers of these sacred songs, had of the attributes and perfections of God, and of the means by which we are assimilated to the character of our heavenly Father, must have been pretty extensive and correct. I agree with Mr. Belsham, when he says, (sermon i.) "The Psalms of David and other pious writers under the Mosaic dispensation, shew the excellent tendency of the Jewish revelation to excite a spirit of sublime devotion." Luther, I think it was, who said that the psalter was a little Bible.

TRANSLATION OF PSALM I: 1-4.—1. "How great the progress of that man who walketh not according to the plans of the unjust (or unfair), and in the way of transgressors hath not stood, and in the seat of the scornful hath not sat."

2. "Because this is his support, even his delight in the law of Jehovah, and according to his law doth he devise his plans by day and by night."

3. "Such a one is as a tree planted by the divisions of waters, which giveth its fruit in its season, and whose leaf withereth not: all that he doth shall prosper."

4. "Not so the unjust; for their foundation is as the chaff (or sand) which the wind driveth away."

Verse 1. I translate asheri, progress, (literally progresses or goings-forward,) because this is the primary meaning of the word, and because it thus suggests or indicates the source of the blessedness—a secondary sense of the word—viz., progress towards perfection, or in assimilation to the Divine character. Progress seems to be meant as the immediate consequence of acting in the manner mentioned in this and the succeeding verse; and blessedness is undoubtedly the consequence of progress. Bishop Jebb in his "Sacred Literature," has made the following remarks upon this verse:—"The exclamation with which the psalm opens, belongs equally to each line of the succeeding triplet." To understand the Bishop, you must know that he thus, in the form of poetry, arranges the component lines of this verse,

How great the progress of that man!
Who walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly,
Nor standeth in the way of sinners,
Nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.

"In the triplet itself," continues Bishop Jebb, "each line consists of three members; and the lines gradually rise one above the other, not merely in their general sense, but specially throughout their correspondent members. To walk, implies no more than casual intercourse; to stand, closer intimacy; to sit, fixed and permanent connexion; the counsel, the ordinary place of meeting and public resort; the way, the select and chosen foot-path; the seat, the habitual and final resting-place; the ungodly, negatively wicked; sinners, positively wicked; the scornful, scoffers at the very name or notion of piety and goodness."

I also think, from the genius and construction of Hebrew poetry, which I will explain at some length to you in future, that the writer of this psalm meant to intimate that there is a gradation in wrong-doing. This truth has been remarked by Heathen, as well as Jewish and Christian observers of human nature. It is impossible for any one who forsakes the right path, to foresee whether he shall wander, or how low he shall debase himself. He has stabbed the "guide of his youth," even his conscience. Few, when they first deflect from the path prescribed by parental love and authority, or by conscience, propose to become finally associates of the most virulent scoffers. But the path hath been trodden by many; and those who hold such a consummation as devoutly to be deprecated, should listen to, and obey the voice of reason and of conscience, the two greatest gifts of God. Let them beware of the first derelictions of duty. Obsta principis is a wise maxim.

Verse 2. I would paraphrase this verse thus:—The cause of this progress is the support which he derives from his delight in ascertaining from reason, experience and revelation, what is the will of Jehovah—what he approves and rewards, and what he disapproves and punishes; and not only does he delight in finding out these marks of the will of the Supreme, but he conforms his conduct continually thereto. Am, I translate, support or foundation; otherwise it is a mere expletive.

The second clause of this verse, in conformity with the genius of Hebrew poetry to be hereafter detailed, rises in sense above the commencing clause: To practice virtue, is more than to know or to be delighted with it; to conform oneself to the dictates of the supreme Ruler, is more than merely to admit that they are lovely and right.

Verse 3. To us, this may be but a feebly-impressive emblem: In an Eastern, burning clime, it would be otherwise. On the margins of rivers or springs are the only spots where vegetation can, in such climates, long withstand the scorching of the Summer's sun. At the place of the meeting of waters, vegetation could scarcely fail. The good man, as described in the first and second verses, could not but be always making progress heavenward—going from "strength to strength."

Verse 4. I do not know that muz, the word translated chaff, is ever translated sand; but here that would make the most direct opposition to the foundation and nutriment of the good man's progress and virtue, compared to a well-watered and rich spot. It makes, also, the most consistent sense. In Eastern climates, vegetation springing up among the arid sands of the desert, is almost sure, ere long, to have its foundation swept away; as winds, there, carry clouds of sand before them. What is meant in this verse, I think is this:—The food and nutriment of the goodness of those who are not like those first described, in spirit and in conduct, is as liable to be neutralized or destroyed as chaff, or sand, is to be blown before the wind. What little constitutional goodness such persons possess, hath "no root," no aliment: it withers, and is ready to die.

May your goodness, my dear A—a, continue ever to grow and increase; having its foundation in ever-enlarging views of God's character and government, and in ever-increasing devotion of the whole faculties of your being to his service. And may these four verses, which have oft been the theme of my solitary musings and meditation, yield to you, as they have to me, serene delight and solid satisfaction.

LETTER III.

To Rev. Josiah Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say."—1 Cor. x: 15.

DEAR SIR—From what source you can draw an inference, or deduce a conclusion, that man's nature was changed by the transgression of Adam, I cannot conceive. We read in an old work, called "The English Primer," this popular couplet:—

"In Adam's fall,
We sinned all."

This would favor your idea of the unhappy circumstance of one man's disobedience, involving unborn millions in sin. But I hope that "Primer" is not the foundation of your belief; for the question—What authority has that couplet? will leave you again without authority. Happily, there is no "thus saith the Lord," for any such belief.

Before taking your evidences into consideration, I must notice a succeeding part of your letter. It seems that, before you ventured to "show" that man's nature was changed, you were disposed to let the reader know the views of the church upon the subject, and upon such passages as you should introduce. You say, "Before I adduce my arguments, I wish distinctly to explain our views of this doctrine." You were cunning in this step. You well knew that the greater part of your readers, being members of Methodist societies, placed more reliance and dependance upon the views of their clergy, than upon the words of the prophets and apostles.

It was an evil cunning in you, to take such a course. I say evil, because it tended to fix their prejudices still stronger in favor of what you should "attempt to show"—knowing that what you were going to advance, would be in accordance with the views of your and their church. By the course taken by you, no impartial reader can do otherwise than see, that you labored to make the subject conform to the articles of faith of your denomination—that you twisted the Scriptures to bear a favorable construction to that purpose. A sorry situation a man or set of men is in, when he makes a church creed the standard of truth, and uses the inspired writings as a species of evidence—a secondary instrument to support it. I consider such a course as prostituting the Scriptures to a wicked purpose. I think, on calm reflection you will see the error you committed. Time will sweep away the specious creed you so darlingsly hug to your bosom, and place the divine Revelation exalted before all nations, as the source of salvation, to the exclusion of all earthly creeds and powers.

Are you dependant upon the views of your bishops for your views of Scripture? Alas! it seems too true that you are. Do you suppose you gave any light upon the subject of man's nature, by giving two articles of your faith? Merely giving the opinion of one man—a dozen men—or a thousand men—whether organized in church form or not—will not establish a truth pertaining to something which happened in the garden of Eden. We desire to know what the Scriptures declare. I am sorry, Sir, you should be so chained, and seek to chain others, to the juggernaut of man-made creeds and church ordinances. But I must introduce those articles. Thus you proceed:—

"1. We maintain that, although man was created in the image of God, which comprehended righteousness and true holiness, yet, by transgression, he totally lost the moral image of God; so that he was entirely destitute of every good principle—his nature became morally diseased, and the sole bent of his mind was to evil, and that he lost all power to think, speak or do right, without the special agency of divine grace. The condition of man after the fall of Adam, is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and works, to faith and calling upon God—wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing [going before] us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will." Here you refer to "art. vii. M. E. church."

After advancing ideas like the above, strange as it may appear, you advocate free agency. You first make man "destitute, entirely, of every good principle," having "no power to do good works—cannot turn—without power to think, speak, or do right—entirely dependant upon the special agency of divine grace," and then you will go into your pulpit and preach up free agency! Yes, with one breath you will declare man entirely dependant on special agency, even to think right, and with the next breath declare him free to act, and make his salvation to depend upon the event of a proper exercise of his own power and agency.

It cannot be that you are sensible of the abominable absurdities and contradictions you are compelled to, and do, advance, in order to support the creed of your church. You proceed:—

"2. This corruption of man's nature is hereditary, and has been entailed on all his posterity. Original sin standeth not in the following [that is, the imitating] of Adam—as the Pelagians do vainly talk—but it is the corruption of the nature of every man that is naturally engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and of his own nature, inclined to evil, and that continually." Here you refer to "art. viii. M. E. church."

We see that the articles of your church assume that man's nature was changed, hence we see why you "attempted to show" it. Had not the fabricators of the articles of the "Methodist Episcopal church" assumed this error, I think Elder J. Keyes would never have been involved in the difficulty of "attempting to show" it as a truth. Had you, through life to your present day, been left to the dictates of your own good judgment in reading the Scriptures—unshackled by tradition and prejudice—you never would have been troubled with such an egregious error.

After introducing the above articles of your church, which you saw fit to make your first authority, I shall be prepared to review some of your scriptural evidences, which you introduced secondarily.

I really hope you will yet gain a triumph over error, which will dispose you to put your articles of the "Methodist Episcopal church" under your feet, and make the BIBLE the primary oracle and standard of truth, and the man of your counsel.

AMICUS.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CONDUCT OF UNIVERSALISTS.

Messrs. EDITORS—Permit me, in the spirit of candor and kindness, to present a few remarks for the respectful consideration of yourself and your readers. I am no religionist, but I am, I trust, a lover of pure morals and practical virtue. As to creeds, I value above all others, that creed which lays the foundation for purity and rectitude of conduct; that creed which, not ending in speculative faith, leads its possessor to the cultivation and constant practice of those virtues and Christian graces which adorn and dignify human nature, and shed a bright radiance of happiness on the dark path of human existence; that creed, in short, which makes its advocates not merely sounder, but better men. But though a professor of no faith and a member of no sect, I am, perhaps, on that account, not the less likely to judge without partiality or sectarian bias, of the relative validity of those claims to be the disciples of Christ, which the different Christian denominations have respectively put forth. The Saviour of men prescribed the method of deciding these claims, when he directed us to judge the tree by its fruits. This is a method at once simple, natural and unerring. Nothing is more natural, than to suppose that a man's sentiments must control his actions. Whether we behold him in the assiduous practice of every virtue, or sunk in the depths of depravity and crime, we are alike led to attribute his conduct to the influence of the principles which he may have imbibed. [But no one would suppose Judas acted on Christian principles in betraying Christ. Ed.]

By their works shall ye know them. Let this, then, be the touchstone by which to try the faith of Universalists. They profess to believe in the doctrine of God's impartial grace; a doctrine, alike consoling to man and honorable to his Creator. It would seem that a belief, apparently so fraught with the most exalted and adequate views of the character and attributes of the Deity; so replete with that principle of benevolence and love which forms the basis of all the social virtues; should induce a rigid and scrupulous observance of those more obvious moral duties, which the word of God so positively and unequivocally enjoins. But what is the fact? In relation to this there should be neither exaggeration on the one hand, nor palliation on the other. It cannot be doubted that there are men, and those not a few, within the pale of this denomination, who are patterns of moral excellence; but it is no less true that there are others, and many too, who, as far as the cultivation of morals and the practice of virtue are concerned, are a scandal to the Christian name. To the truth of this, every person who has had opportunity and inclination for observing, can testify. Enter a country village, and note the character of its inhabitants. Some, perhaps, of the most respectable and moral among them, are Universalists. But who and what is that bustling, officious character, who spends his time in lounging about taverns, horse-jockeying and similar occupations, not forgetting to take an unfair advantage of his neighbor when an opportunity presents, not scrupling to make a common use of language, not only vulgar, but profane, and who, while he ridicules and opposes temperance and other virtues, fails not occasionally to exemplify his sentiments in this respect, by steeping his senses and drowning his reason in the inebriating bowl? And who and what are those young men spending their earnings at the midnight carousal, alike despised by and scouted from respectable society? Universalists—strong, decided, zealous Universalists—advocating their faith with enthusiasm on all occasions; making it alike the theme of social converse and bar-room disputation. Charity, indeed, induces me to hope that this class are not numerous; but that there are such, who, if I am correctly informed, are in good standing and full fellowship in Universalist societies, personal observation compels me to admit. [Universalist societies! is this true? Are there none among you to attend to this?] But however few, comparatively, there may be of this degraded stamp, still it cannot with truth be denied, that among Universalists, as a denomination, the standard of morals is far from being sufficiently elevated; a lamentable moral apathy, which characterizes few other Christian sects, prevails; and too frequent occasion is given for the oft-repeated charge, that this doctrine is of licentious tendency.

In view of this state of things, what must be our conclusion respecting Universalism? If such be the fruits of this system, what must be the system itself? So far as these facts are allowed to influence the judgment, we cannot well avoid one of three conclusions: either, 1. Universalists do not really believe what they profess; or, 2. they do believe it and act accordingly, and these are the legitimate results of that faith; or, lastly, they do believe it, but do not act accordingly; or, in other words, they have a speculative faith in their doctrine, which, instead of affecting the conduct, is altogether useless and inoperative; a faith which plants itself in the head, but touches not the heart. That the last of these conclusions is true, in regard to thousands of professed Universalists, I have no doubt; and it may not, perhaps, be altogether impossible to account for it. Perhaps no sect exhibits more untiring and indefatigable zeal in the promulgation of their sentiments, than Universalists. No set of preachers explain and enforce their doctrines with greater clearness and cogency, than those who proclaim the salvation of all men. They seem almost, literally, to compass the earth to make one proselyte, [not so; Universalists are Home missionaries,] but having once secured his faith, they seem to regard their work as completed, without deeming it necessary to inculcate and enforce practical godliness. Seldom, indeed, do we enter a Universalist church, and listen to a sermon of an exclusively practical nature. But after all the bustle about doctrine, of what value is it or can it be, without practice? Wherein consist the benefits which religion confers upon man, unless it be to make him a holier and happier being? What avails the most orthodox and unerring system of faith, unless it exerts a corresponding influence on the heart? What avail the most profound disquisitions of polemic theology, unless they result in established principles, which shall exert an abiding and salutary influence on the conduct? Do not Universalists know that one individual, whose daily walk corresponds to his religious sentiments, is a far greater acquisition, than a score of such advocates as I have had occasion to notice? If, then, they would convince the world of the truth and efficacy of their faith; if they would see their cause marching surely and steadily forward; let them so cultivate the practice of virtue, and so far assimilate their conduct to their creed, as to confound the gainsayer, and convince the doubter. LOCKER ON.

REMARKS.

We insert the foregoing, not in deference to the writer, (for he has not given his name as a pledge of his veracity,) nor yet because we believe its statements to be as generally true as the writer seems to think, (for we know them to be generally false within the circle of our acquaintance,) but for the purpose of showing some professed believers in our faith, and avowed friends to our cause, their value to our denomination and doctrine! Dear, indeed, are their professions and pretensions to us, if our whole denomination must be charged with their ungodly conduct as the price of their fellowship. Are such characters really our friends—do they actually believe in our doctrine? Let their friendship be more beneficial to us than to overwhelm us with disgrace—and their conduct be more in accordance with their faith. We ask them not to leave us—we ask them not to abandon the Christian name and profession—but to abandon the hypocrisy of their present conduct—the unrighteousness in which they profess the truth. We rejoice in seeing those whom Partialism, with all her terrors, could not convert to godliness and true piety, coming among us—for we hope the love of Christ will kindle their quenched affections, and the goodness of God lead them to repentance. Let them come, then—let them claim the Universalist name—but let them leave all Partialism behind, and come in sincerity, and call upon Christ in truth and righteousness.

But to the communication. That the conduct naturally resulting from a man's belief, is a fair test of that faith, is readily admitted—but even the writer admits that the conduct he censures does not naturally result from the belief of Universalism. After men have become vicious and immoral under Partialist teaching, and then embraced Universalism—or become opposed to Partialism—is it fair to say their new sentiments are the cause of their immoralities? We admit that there are profane and immoral men who profess our doctrine—but we do deny that their faith extends further than profession. If they call themselves more, they add lying and hypocrisy to their other violations of God's law. We go further, and say, they practice their ill doings in the hope of escaping punishment—at least, in the belief that they will experience more pleasure than pain in sin—and are, thus far, lying Partialists—hypocrites! It is to be desired that every such character may have this fact flung in his face, every time he practices iniquity, and at the same time, professes faith in Universalism.

That we are less moral than other denominations is not true—at least the records of our courts and registers of our prisons appear to tell a different tale. But it is freely admitted that we should be far more moral than any other—and that too many professors among us are a disgrace to us. God grant them grace to repair the injury they have done and are doing to us!

In the causes of the immorality among Universalists, we differ. In making converts from other denominations, we too often get the slaves of the fear of hell, who bring their pernicious tendency to sin with them, and the remnants of that corrupting doctrine, "Ye shall not surely die," which they sucked in with their mother's milk. This has been particularly the case with many of the preachers we converted from the Methodist denomination in this section. They disgraced us and ruined themselves. But the fault was not in Universalism, but in its recipients.

It may seem indelicate in us to defend our preachers—it is needless where they are known—but it is certain that every preacher we know, does indicate, very frequently, the practice of Universalism as the best and surest test of its truth. Many have been censured for preaching too many practical discourses—"Are they ashamed or afraid to come out boldly with their doctrines?" say our opposers, of these. Others would do it even more frequently than they now do, but for the frequent misrepresentations of our doctrine by our opposers, which renders doctrinal preaching especially necessary.

But enough. Be the writer what he may, he has had a hearing. He has told us of some faults, and made some admissions, which I hope will do us good. And may those in particular, whose vices a "Looker on" has charged to the whole denomination, see the injury their evil conduct inflicts on their real friends, and "abate the nuisance" as soon as possible.

UNIVERSALISM.

IN VERMONT.—Br. Eli Ballou, in a letter to the Editors of the Watchman, represents the cause in the Northern section of Vermont as needing only preachers. He names, as prosperous, the societies in Swanton Falls, Stowe, Morristown, Highgate, Berkshire, Bakersfield and Cambridge. If the societies in St. Albans, Georgia and Fairfax would agree on some central place of meeting, and could get a preacher, they would furnish a large and prosperous congregation. In Burlington they have had no preaching since Br. Gregory left. Br. R. O. Williams has lately visited Newfane, and says our cause is prosperous there. The friends are about to employ a preacher the whole time, between the two societies in this town at Williamsville and Fayetteville.

IN LOWER CANADA.—The same letter from Br. E. Ballou, states that there is quite a number of brethren and sisters in the townships of Shefford, (where Br. J. Baker resides,) Brome, Dunham, Stanbridge, St. Armand, Noyan, and Caldwell's Manor. In the latter place they want preaching a quarter of the time.

IN OHIO.—The several tours published in this paper, will obviate the necessity of any detailed description of the state of Universalism in Ohio. Brs. Jolly and Davis having lately travelled about one thousand miles and preached seventy sermons within about two months, (on a large circuit,) the former has published a brief account of their tour, from which we extract information new to our readers generally. In Marion, county seat of Marion county, there are many friends who are anxious to procure a preacher for half the time. In Georgetown, Hillsborough, Leesburg, Chillicothe, Londonderry, Richmond, McArthurstown, Athens, Belpre, Westly, Decatur, Wattertown, Marietta, and many other places, he found the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us." Br. Beals writes us from Norwalk, Huron county, immediately after his return from a circuit in that and Richland counties, as follows:—"Since my arrival here, I have preached in a number of towns and villages, and there are frequent calls from different places to come over and help them. Besides my Sunday appointments, I preach from three to five discourses during a week, in different places. Our cause is truly flattering in this region. The shackles which have so long bound many souls in the dark bondage of error, are crumbling asunder, and the prisoners are arising to freedom. The light of truth is spreading its glorious and benign rays on the minds of many, to the no small joy of every benevolent heart. I expect to preach in this vicinity some three or four months, and what may be the result of my feeble labors time must determine. But I trust my labors will not be in vain in the Lord."

IN KENTUCKY—where Brs. Jolly and Davis preached while on the tour above named—there are some places where the pure Gospel finds worthy recipients. Minerva, Flemingsburg, Hillsborough and Poplar Plains, are named in particular, as places where preachers will be gratefully received and well rewarded, by liberal friends. Our excellent ministering Br., N. Wadsworth, it will be remembered, is at present a resident in this State. He labors in Greenup county, Ky., and in Sciota county, O. at present, and it is fervently hoped his labors will be highly beneficial in that region, though present prospects are rather discouraging.

Our readers have now all the general news from abroad, at our command. It will be seen that it is, thus far, quite cheering and encouraging. We may add that in Pennsylvania, New-Jersey and this State, it is no less so, as far as heard from. In fact, the fields are white with the abundant harvest—laborers only are wanting—and if our friends will but be active, prudent, enterprising and devoted, the victory is ours. The year 1836 will witness a general extension and spread of Universalism—an increase of its believers, and an improvement in their virtues and graces—seldom witnessed before in any single year. What say you, brethren? Shall we go up and possess the land? The sons of Anak are powerless before us, and the land is given us—shall we go up and possess it?

A. B. G.

P. S. In a future number I will give a statement of our cause in this State.

ELDER KNAPP.

A friend in Madison writes for information respecting the following statement, made by this anecdotal revivalist, on the 17th ult., at a protracted meeting in that village.

While he (Elder K.) was holding a protracted meeting in Ithaca, the Universalists also attempted to hold one (!). They put up their notices. On the first night they had about two hundred hearers—on the second, this number dwindled down to about one hundred, and on the third night it was reduced to about fifty, nearly all of whom were drunkards and tipplers.

The Elder's love of the Universalists has led him into a little embellishment. By referring to Magazine and Advocate, vol. vi, p. 95, the reader will find a letter from Br. Whiston which declares that, at the last discourse, the spacious court room was insufficient to comfortably hold the congregation that attended. As this account was published at the time, and circulated in the very place when and where this meeting was held, and as it was not only not contradicted, but has actually been confirmed to me, lately, by two respectable females who then lived in Ithaca, and were acquainted with the persons attending the Universalist meeting, I presume the Elder has a bad memory, which retains falsehoods better than truths. As to non-respectability, it was the Elder's meeting which was a kernel for all the refuse of Ithaca, and a scene of disgraceful riot and confusion.

This statement is made, not because we believe Elder Knapp worthy of notice, but because some of his hearers have such a charitable credulity as to believe anything the even Elder Knapp may choose to say of Universalists.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

A friend of the Liberal Institute requests an answer to the following queries, through the medium of the Magazine and Advocate.

"Who were among the first promoters of this anti-sectarian school? When was it founded? What are its laws, or regulations, concerning religious doctrines? Is any one religious doctrine, or are all religious doctrines, or is no religious doctrine allowed to be taught in the Institute?.....How much of the $5000 fund has been received? Can any person become a stockholder now, by the payment of ten dollars? Was the money which has been paid in by the stockholders, given as a donation to the Institute, or was it invested as capital stock on which dividends of profit are to be received?"

Questions of a similar description have been so often answered, that we feel some degree of reluctance in again pressing the subject upon the attention of those who have any recollection of our previous remarks. The Constitution has been several times published, and even the by-laws have been given to the public; so that there is nothing either in or out of the establishment, and appertaining to it, concerning which the public has not been generally informed.

But for the gratification of our friend, and for the information of those unacquainted with the nature of the Institute, we answer:—

1. That most, if not all of the original projectors of the Liberal Institute, were Universalists. And the reason is plain—few others either see or feel the need of a strictly unsectarian literary institution.

2. The Institute was founded in A. D. 1831, by appointment of the Board of Trust, and Executive Committee. The same year about $5000 were subscribed; and in 1832 the buildings were erected, and the schools duly organized. An academical charter was obtained in 1834.

3. All religious opinions are tolerated in the Institute; and books published by a great number of sects are now in its library, which is accessible by all the students. But the peculiar doctrines of any sect whatever, are strictly prohibited from being taught in the Institute. And those articles of the Constitution, which secure the religious liberty of the students, are unalterable.

4. Since the notice was given that $5000 were wanting, very little has been received on the permanent fund. Former subscriptions have been collected to some amount but they were not embraced in that estimate, and the fund has not been augmented by contribution during the past year, over $500.

5. Any person can become a stockholder in the Institute, by the payment of ten dollars, or upward. And its Board of Trust, would be glad to add a thousand such stockholders to its present list of contributors.

6. The money already paid in, is in all respects a mere donation. No investment could be made of any consequence.

quence, until the buildings were paid for. And no dividend can occur, until the income shall exceed the necessary expenses of the institution. An annual income of $250, is requisite to entitle the institution to a distribution share of the Literature Fund; and heretofore the Institute has not been able to raise that amount; and consequently, has never realized any part of the bounty of the State.

These inconveniences it is in the power of a liberal public to do away at once. If some active man would exert himself in every neighborhood, some four thousand dollars might be raised in one month. And we cannot but hope, that there are enough such men, to set about the work in good earnest, and accomplish it. There is generosity enough, if there was a sufficiency of zeal to commence the undertaking.

Remittances can be made to Joseph Stebbins, Clinton; D. Pixley, Kirkland, Oneida county, or Rev. D. Skinner, Utica. S. R. SMITH, General Agent.

ADDITIONAL.—As the number of our subscribers who send donations for the Institute through our agents, is evidently increasing, we will publish the remittances for the Institute separately, naming the amount received from each person.

As many wealthy subscribers have sent but one dollar for the Institute, we have feared they might suppose they were limited to that sum in our solicitations for their aid. This is not the fact. We earnestly desire and beg of them to send in according to their ability—five, ten, twenty, fifty or one hundred dollars—for some who have sent one dollar each were able to give the largest sum here named, and not miss the donation a week afterward. They should remember that even if each subscriber to this paper sent in one dollar, the sum would not be larger than could be profitably used—that many, from distance, poverty, and other causes, will not send in one dollar each—and that, therefore, others who live in this State, and are able, should make up the deficiency. We hope these things will be remembered and acted upon, briskly, hereafter.

DEDICATION AT NEWVILLE.

On Thursday, the 21st ult., the new and beautiful Union meeting-house, lately erected at Newville, Herkimer county, about six miles south of Little Falls, was solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. The services on the occasion were conducted in the following manner:

Morning.—1. Reading the Scriptures, by Rev. Mr. Swackhammer, (Lutheran.) 2. Hymn. 3. Prayer, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, (Universalist.) 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon, by Rev. Mr. Swackhammer. 6. Address to the congregation on the occasion of the union, by D. Skinner, (Universalist.) 7. Consecrating service, by Rev. Mr. Swackhammer. 8. Concluding prayer, by Rev. L. C. Browne, (Universalist.) 9. Hymn. 10. Benediction.

Afternoon.—1. Introductory prayer, by Rev. M. B. Newell, (Universalist.) Sermon, by D. Skinner, from John iv: 22. Concluding prayer, by Rev. Mr. Swackhammer. The afternoon services were variegated with singing as were those of the morning. In the evening a lecture was preached by Rev. L. C. Browne.

The day, though cold, was remarkably pleasant, and an immense crowd of people were present during the whole of the services. The singing, led by Br. T. A. Paine, was very good. The house is a beautiful and commodious wooden building, pleasantly situated, and sufficiently capacious for convening five hundred people, though evidently many more than that number were present at the dedication. It is surmounted by a modest steeple, and handsomely painted outside and in. It was built and is owned in conjunction by Lutherans, Universalists, and Methodists, mostly, we believe, by the two former. The services during the day of dedication were all conducted, so far as we could judge from appearances, in the spirit of union and the most entire charity and good feeling. The congregation was devoutly attentive, and we trust that good was done in the name of the holy Jesus. Long may the house stand as a monument of Christian union and zeal, and long may it be filled with devout and happy worshippers of the true God.

AN OFFER.

LET US DO GOOD ONE TO ANOTHER.

Those subscribers who are indebted to Br. Skinner for the last volume, are probably aware that he will require them to pay two dollars and fifty cents. Now for the benefit of such, we will make this offer. If any of them will pay to one of our authorised agents, remit through their Postmaster, or even at our expense, a five dollar bank note, accompanied with the name of a new subscriber, before the first of April next, we will settle with Br. S. for the last volume, and credit them in full for the two copies of the present. Agents and companies will recollect that they will be entitled to fifteen copies for twenty dollars in advance. G. and H.

THE RECORD.

Br. L. C. BROWNE is at present engaged to supply the Universalist society at Fort Plain with the preached word. We rejoice that our friends in this flourishing village, after being for several months deprived of the valuable labors of Br. Bushnell, on account of his ill health, and not knowing on whom to depend from Sabbath to Sabbath for the services of the sanctuary, now have the cheering prospect of being supplied for a time by one who will come to them in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ. Br. Browne requests all letters and papers designed for him, to be directed, for the present, to Fort Plain, Montgomery county.

Br. A. WILLIAMS, who has been itinerating extensively in Chautauque county, has agreed to settle in Carroll, in that county, to labor with the society there half the time. He wishes all letters, etc., directed to that place.

Br. Price will copy this, and send Br. W. the "Union."

Br. J. A. ASPINWALL, who has hitherto been pursuing his studies at Clinton, has agreed to settle in Leyden, and labor with the society there one-half his time. He has not yet removed.

We rejoice at this measure, and hope the connexion will be a profitable one to both parties. There is, at present, no settled preacher between this and Watertown, a distance of eighty miles!—and there are several large, convenient and able societies, (particularly in Leyden and vicinity,) able to support two, three, or even four preachers, yet living for years without a stated minister! Whether there was any adequate cause for this strange state of things, I cannot tell; but I heartily rejoice that it is to be, in part, removed.

Br. HENRY JEWELL, a member of the Universalist society in Methuen, Mass., has lately commenced declaring the word of reconciliation.

The third Universalist society in New-York city have resolved to engage Br. B. B. Hallock as their pastor, pro tem. This is the society left destitute in consequence of Br. Le Fevre's tour through Europe. Br. Hallock will supply until his return.

A quarterly Conference of Universalists, for Essex county, Mass., was organized at Haverhill, on the 20th ult. Beside the ordination of Br. J. B. Morse and the installation of Br. O. A. Skinner, sermons were delivered by Mrs. H. Ballou, W. H. Knapp, and T. F. King. The portion of services denominated a conference, lasted about two hours, and appears to have been what Br. Thomas calls a concert of praise. The services are, altogether, spoken of as highly interesting and edifying.

A Conference was holden at Bucksport, Me., in December last, which was very well attended, and is spoken of in very pleasing terms, by those attending.

Br. Otis A. Skinner, late of Baltimore, Md., was installed pastor of the society in Haverhill, Mass., on the 20th ult. Mrs. H. Ballou, J. M. Austin, T. F. King, W. H. Knapp, J. Gregory and J. A. Gurley took parts in the services. Sermon by Br. S. Streeter.

Br. J. Gregory, late of Burlington, Vt., was installed pastor of the church and society in Woburn, Mass., on Wednesday evening, 27th ult.

Br. Samuel Davis, of North Amherst, Mass., was ordained by Council, at Shutesbury, Mass., on the 6th ult.

Sermon by Br. R. O. Williams, other services by Mrs. Searl, J. P. Fuller, and the candidate.

Br. J. B. Morse, of New-Rowley, Mass., was ordained by Council, at the Conference held in Haverhill, on the 20th ult. Mrs. H. Ballou, S. Streeter and T. G. Farnsworth took parts in the services.

THE LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The respective schools of the Institute commenced the second Winter Term, on January 25th—with very favorable prospects.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching to-morrow by Br. Sias at Perch River, near Br. Cole's—Br. C. B. Brown at Ellisburg, and at the red schoolhouse in Wardwell's settlement, in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday instant, by Br. T. J. SMITH at Marshall Forge—Br. BODEN at Ffy Creek—Br. WAGGONER at Little Lakes—Br. BRITTON at Theresa—Br. WHITNEY at Antwerp—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. POTTER at Salisbury—Br. C. B. BROWN at the shingled schoolhouse in Palermo, and at Jennings's Corners in the evening—Br. L. PAINE at Foot's schoolhouse in Conesus—Br. ASPINWALL in Leyden—Br. Sias at South Champion, and at Copenhagen in the evening.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday instant, by Br. GROSH at Bridgewater—Br. WHITNEY at Richfield Springs—Br. POTTER at Eatonville—Br. J. FRENCH at Tully, and in the evening as the friends may appoint—Br. BULLARD at Cooperstown—Br. DELONG at Burlington Flats—Br. M. B. NEWELL at Salisbury—Br. C. B. BROWN at Union Square, and at Mexicoville in the evening—Br. Sias at Lowville, and at the brick schoolhouse in East Martinsburg in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. BULLARD at Hartwick—Br. WHITNEY at Cedarville—Br. M. B. NEWELL at Middleville—Br. Sias at Denmark, and at Carthage in the evening—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford.

Br. Sias will preach in the evenings of the 8th inst., near Br. Woodruff's in Pamela—9th, at the Field settlement—10th, Lockport—11th, Burrville—12th, Pinkney, as the friends may appoint—15th, Hounsfield, near Stowell's (stone schoolhouse)—16th, Jericho—17th, Muska-lunge settlement.

A meeting will be held at South Champion, on the fourth Tuesday inst., for the purpose of organizing a Universalist society for that town and Rutland. A sermon may be expected, to commence at 10 o'clock, A. M.

D. SKINNER will deliver a funeral sermon at the village of Camden, in memory of the late Mrs. Byington, deceased, on Wednesday next, 10th inst., at 1 o'clock, P. M. Also, a temperance address at Salisbury, at 1 o'clock, P. M., on Tuesday, the 23d inst.

Br. M. B. NEWELL will lecture in the evenings of February 25th, at Paine's Hollow, and 26th, at Newville.

ASA LOWELL, calling himself a Universal Perfectionist, has requested us to state that he will preach on the evenings of Friday, 5th inst., at Eatonville—6th, at Middleville—Sunday during the day at Newport, and at Poland in the evening—8th, at Coldbrook—9th, at Russia—10th, at Salisbury Corners—11th, Salisbury Centre—12th, Union meeting-house, Oppenheim—13th, Fort Plain—second Sunday during the day at Canajoharie—15th, St. Johnsville—16th, East Creek—17th, Little Falls—18th, Fort Herkimer—third Sunday during the day at Columbia, near Peter Warren's.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

INFIDELITY.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

Gloomy and dark as the depths of yon ocean,
 As we know not, and seek not to know,
 What is that which is cast on them with tremulous motion—
 A shadow of the silence below—

Is the soul of the penitent of error repented,
 Bequeathing to death each high wish of the soul;
 Reluctant to ash as the best of life's roses
 And bidding the waters of misery roll.

The sun-flower of hope gazes down the dark mirror,
 But sees not its image—and withers away;
 And the spring-rose of love casts its bright leaves in terror,
 And yields up its beautiful buds to decay!

The song-bird of pleasure an instant rejoices,
 Amid the wild cells of the rock-covered shore;
 But ere she sends back many sepulchre voices,
 And the song and the singer are heard of no more.

One smile, only, lightens this tomb of the spirit—
 One low wail of music, alone, cleaves the air;
 'Tis the grim smile of death, who his thousands inherits—
 'Tis the music which bursts from the heart of despair.

A SETTLED MINISTRY.

The following, we presume, constitute the "strong reason" for establishing a permanent pastorate to every congregation, instead of an itinerancy or an occasional change.

A. B. G.

The pastoral office is by divine appointment, a permanent office in every church; its duties are permanent; the necessities of the church and community are such as at all times to demand its exercise. Hence, the New Testament churches had their permanent pastors. "They ordained then elders in every city." And hence the explicit and careful instructions which are given respecting the qualifications and duties which pertain to this office, and the duty of the people in regard to it.

A church that has no settled minister, has no pastor. It may have a series of occasional supplies, or a succession of evangelists, missionaries, or travelling preachers, but the man that fills its pulpit is not its pastor. He has not the relations, and consequently has not the sympathies, nor the responsibilities and cares, which are peculiar to that office.

The benefits of a settled minister are very great. The relation is an enduring one both to minister and people. He dwells among them as a shepherd among his flock, whose voice they know. He is not a stranger held loosely to them by a temporary connexion; but has his home and his children's home among them.

He is acquainted with every family. He knows their history, their character, their circumstances, their joys, griefs, sicknesses. He is with them at their marriages, and at their funerals; and on many occasions of anxiety, of delicacy, of embarrassment and distress, such as the stranger, intermeddles not with, is their tried friend, counsellor and comforter.

He is the baptizer of their children; and with a concern inferior only to that of the parents, and often surpassing that, he watches over their advancing childhood and youth.

He is the judicious friend of education, and of all which pertains to the good of the community; in which he has the three-fold interest of a pastor, a citizen, and a father. He is identified with his people in all that concerns their welfare.

His home is the well known place of resort and entertainment for clergymen and other religious strangers who visit the place.

Being a permanent resident, he is more concerned for the result of his ministry, than he naturally would be, were his stay but temporary. He cannot, like those whose stay is short, light fires in his boldness or imprudence, and then go off by the light of them, and leave them to burn, or be quenched by others.

The settled pastor feels a growing interest in his flock. The longer he is with them, the more he labors and cares for them, the oftener he is called to sympathize with them, weeping with those that weep, and rejoicing with those that rejoice; and the more the experiences of their kindness towards himself, the deeper does his affectionate concern for them naturally become. I know of no affection more sacred and unquenchable than that of a long-settled pastor for his people.

The settled pastor is acquainted with the spiritual condition of his people, as a stranger cannot be, and knows what is needful for them, from time to time, in the way of instruction, reproof, or consolation. Directed by this knowledge, and compelled too by the permanency of his ministry and his unchanging auditory, he of necessity takes a wider compass in his preaching, and his hearers receive in the end a greater variety and amount of instruction than would, or perhaps could be given by a succession of transient preachers. The itinerant preacher, with an audience always new, needs but few discourses, in memory or manuscript, to answer his calls. He is not obliged to be very diversified in his ministrations, nor is it probable that he will be. He naturally selects a few topics, and those commonly which are the most exciting, and the most obvious and familiar; and with these begins and finishes his temporary work. Another follows, and then another, much in the same strain. The consequence is, that the people, though abundantly and fervidly exhorted upon a few topics, acquire but a defective knowledge of truth.

It is not so with the settled pastor. It depends on him, and he feels it to be his duty, as one set apart for the instruction of a particular people, to acquaint them with the whole counsel of God. They look to him chiefly for the bread of life, and to him the injunction comes emphatically and solemnly, "Take heed therefore unto yourselves and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God." The church cannot be fed as the pastor is required to feed them, they cannot be instructed generally and fully in the knowledge of religious truth and duty, in a few random discourses, however elaborately prepared or fervidly delivered.

While I honor the zeal, and I trust duly appreciate the useful labors of evangelists, and other itinerant preachers, I am clearly satisfied that an itinerant ministry can never be substituted for a settled one, without great detriment to the interests of religion. And this I think is a growing conviction in the land. It is a conviction not diminished, but rather increased, by our recent increased experience of the results and tendencies of itinerant labors.

It was formerly the practice of our churches to settle their ministers for life. The same is the practice now to some extent; but the times are given to change. The practice of dismissing a minister "for every cause," is one of the sins of the times. It is an evil to all concerned, but more to the people than to the minister. Its tendency is to unsettle the habits, and in various ways to diminish the prosperity of our churches. A very instance of dismissing one minister and settling another, causes some to be dissatisfied, if it do not produce division and defection. It has an effect, too, to multiply itching ears, and to induce a habit of curious and speculative hearing, rather than of sober profiting by the word. It will be found by observation, that those societies are most prosperous which are least addicted to a frequent change of ministers. — Boston Register.

AN INCIDENT EDITORIALY APPLIED.—Some thirty odd years ago, when we belonged to the age that delights in the cry of fire and the noise of the fireman's trumpet, we, like other youths, were fond of playing an engine, and on one occasion recollect a position in which we were once placed while directing the pipe. The spot at which we aimed appeared to us the proper one, but we were constantly annoyed by the cry of "play here," from one quarter—"play there," from another, and "play here," from a third. We soon found that each man formed his judgment from the actual position he occupied, and that we had a better ground for our judgment than either, as to the points on which the engine could be brought to bear with effect. Since we have become the editor of a newspaper, we have often thought of the old fire scene. "Play here," says one—"play there," says another—"play here," says a third. We believe our true course is now, as it was then, to judge for ourselves, as to the best course to be pursued, and to play in the direction in which, in our humble estimation, we shall be likely to do the most good. — United States Gazette.

COMPLIMENTARY.—An old clergyman, and rather eccentric withal, whose field of labor was a town in the interior of New-England, one Sunday, at the close of his services, gave notice to his congregation that in the course of the week, he expected to go on a mission—on a mission to the heathen. The members of his church were struck with alarm and sorrow at the sudden and unexpected announcement of the loss of their beloved pastor, and one of the deacons in great agitation exclaimed—"Why, my dear Sir, you have never told us one word of this before! What shall we do?" "Oh, Er. C—," said the parson, with the greatest sang froid, "I don't expect to go out of town!" — Bangor Commercial.

CALUMNY.—Calumniators are those who have neither good hearts nor good understandings. We ought not to think ill of any one till we have palpable proof; and even then we should not expose them to others.

We ought to attend to our own business, and not meddle with the affairs of others, unless we are applied to, to render a service. We should condemn no one unheard.

Look on slanderers as direct enemies to civil society; as persons without honor, honesty or humanity. Who ever entertains you with the faults of others, designs to serve you in a similar manner.

The great Zimmediam justly observes—"That there is always something great in that man against whom the world exclaims; at whom every one throws a stone, and on whose character all attempt to fix a thousand crimes without being able to prove one."

ANECDOTE OF DR. DWIGHT.—A young clergyman once called upon Dr. Dwight, and inquired respecting the best method of treating a very difficult and abstruse point in mental philosophy upon which he was preparing a sermon. "I cannot give you any information upon the subject," the Doctor replied. "I am not familiar with such topics. I leave them for young men."

MARRIAGES.

In Conesus, Livingston county, on the 18th ult., by Rev. Linus Paine, Mr. JOSEPH PHILIPS, to Miss EMILY L. ARMSTRONG, both of Conesus.

In South Oxford, December 13, by Rev. Nelson Doolittle, Mr. SIAS SHERBURNE, to Miss EUNICE BROWNE, adopted daughter of Luke Metcalf, Esq.

In Oxford, by the same, December 17th, Mr. SAMUEL I. GRAY, to Miss ELIZA SMITH.

Also, Mr. DAVID F. SMITH, to Miss RHODA GRAY, all of Green.

By the same, on the 13th ult., in Guilford, Mr. DANIEL P. CABLE, Merchant, to Miss SARAH ANN WINDSOR, both of Guilford.

On the 6th of January ult., by Rev. N. Stacy, LUTHER HATCH, Esq., of Cook county, Illinois, to Miss POLLY M. HOWE, daughter of Orrin Howe, Esq., of Lodi, Michigan.

In Deerfield, on the 28th ult., by R. Barlow, Esq., Mr. HOPSTILL BRADFORD, of Newport, to Miss ANN ELIZA COFFIN, of the former place.

In Clinton, January 28, by S. R. Smith, Mr. OLIVER CURTIS, of Hamilton, to Miss MINERVA FAIRCHILDS, of Augusta.

DEATHS.

In Cooperstown, on the 4th ult., Miss LOUISA ANN AUGUSTA, only daughter of Asa and Lydia Luce, in the 23d year of her age. Thus another is added to the list of those who have fallen victims to that most fatal disease, consumption. Her sickness was painful and protracted, yet not a murmur escaped her lips—her constant prayer was, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will but as Thou wilt." She possessed an intelligent mind, which she retained unto the last, and died in possession of that hope in immortality, which disrobed death of its sting, and the grave of its terrors. She has left her deeply afflicted parents and brother, and a numerous circle of friends, to mourn her early death.

In Hartwick, on the 16th ult., Mrs. MARY FIELD, wife of Nathan Field, in the 66th year of her age. Sister Field was an affectionate wife, a tender mother, and was universally esteemed by all who knew her. She early united with, and professed the faith of the Baptist church, and was still a member at the time of her death—but many years since, she came to the knowledge and professed the doctrine of "the restitution of all things," which faith enabled her to give the whole "heart's best gratitude" to God in life, and find confidence and resignation in death. She has left a husband, five children and a numerous circle of connexions and friends to mourn her departure. The writer of this, tendered the consolations of the Gospel to the mourning relatives, and a numerous congregation of deeply sympathizing friends, from Job xvii: 11.

EPISCOPALIANISM.....No. III.

CREEDS.

The creeds comprised at length in the Liturgy of the Episcopal church, require particular consideration. These are referred to by name in the thirty-nine articles.

"ART. VIII. Of the Creeds."

"The Nicene creed, and that which is commonly called the Apostles' creed, ought thoroughly to be received and believed; for they may be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture."

How well they can be sustained by Scripture, will appear in the sequel, after we have shown, as far as practicable, when and by whom they were composed. And as they by no means assert the same things, nor maintain the same doctrines, it is difficult to imagine how they can both be "proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture." It is sufficient to say, in this place, that whatever may be thought or understood respecting these creeds by the laity of the Episcopal church, her clergymen know that they are not what they are set forth to be in the aforesaid article. They well know, that what is called the Apostle's creed, was wholly unknown for several centuries; and that the nominal Nicene creed of the Liturgy, is really the creed of Constantinople, and that some of its particulars were not recognized by the fathers of the council of Nice.

But the church of England has three creeds. One of these, denominated the Athanasian creed, was dropped without remark, by the Convention of the Episcopal church which arranged the Book of Common Prayer for the United States. Yet this creed, which for absurdity of doctrine, blasphemy of expression, and damnable penalties, stands unrivalled among the remains of the dark ages—is permitted to be said or sung in the church of England!

And it is to be lamented that this source of edification is denied to the faithful of that communion in this country. Its omission reminds us of the remark of the duke of Hamilton, who, on being introduced to the pope, was told that it was customary to kiss the slipper of his holiness—but that, as he was an Englishman, a very low bow would be accepted. "Why," said the duke, "if we must have a farce, let us, by all means, have the whole of it!"—and he accordingly kissed the pope's toe. So, if the Episcopal church finds it necessary to have at least two creeds, why not guard its doctrines by retaining the third, and the most remarkable which was ever composed! Such a trio, one must think, would keep the opinions of almost any but Episcopalians from wandering!

Besides, by silently dropping the Athanasian creed from the Liturgy, the lovers of the marvellous—at least many of them—have been denied the pleasure of speculating upon the way and manner in which it found its way into the church. Concerning which, it has been shrewdly observed by a distinguished writer, that "no one knows how it got into the church, and God only could tell when it would ever get out." But perhaps it was the intention of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States, to rid the church of this creed as quietly as possible, in order to preserve a similarity between its insidious ingress and sudden egress. And the consequence is, that not one of a thousand of its present members, ever heard that the Athanasian creed was, only a few years since, a part of the Liturgy.

The creed ascribed to the apostles, and which holds so conspicuous a place in the Book of Common Prayer, and of course, in the services of the Episcopal church, reads thus:—

"I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; And in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost; born of the Virgin Mary; suffered under Pontius Pilate; was crucified, dead and buried: he descended into hell; the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God, the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost; the holy Catholic church; the communion of saints; the forgiveness of sins; the resurrection of the body; and the life everlasting. Amen."

Lord King, in his "History of the Apostles' Creed," after enumerating the particular parts which, by tradition, were ascribed to the several apostles, says, (p. 28, Elizabethtown ed., 1804,) "Now as to the truth of this tradition, I think it is altogether to be denied, and that for several reasons, as that it was nigh four hundred years after Christ, before the framing of the creed by the apostles was ever heard of; and even Rufinus, himself, one of the first reporters thereof, though in the beginning of his commentary he doth roundly assert it, yet in the midst thereof, he speaks of it doubtfully as if its authors were uncertain and unknown. Moreover, had the apostles been the real formers of the creed before their dispersion from Jerusalem, it cannot be imagined that St. Luke, in his history of their Acts, would have wholly omitted so considerable a fact as this," etc. Again, he says, (p. 33,) "As for the authors thereof, it cannot be denied but that they were several and many; the creed was neither the work of one man, nor of one day, but during a long tract of time passed successively through several hands, ere it arrived to its present perfection," etc.

On page 42, his lordship informs us, that "the repetition of the creed at every assembly was appointed in the Eastern church, by Timothy, archbishop of Constantinople, in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, who, after having governed the empire twenty-seven years, died anno 521." But on the very next page he gives us this singular information. "It must indeed be owned, that the creed appointed to be read in the church, both by Timothy, archbishop of Constantinople, and the third council of Toledo, was the Nicene, or Constantinopolitan creed," etc.

From this, it appears that no creed was constantly repeated every Sabbath, in the church, before almost the middle of the sixth century—and that, even then, it was not what is called "the Apostles' creed." So much for the formation, antiquity, and use of this symbol of Episcopacy!

The other creed designated in the 8th article, already quoted, is denominated the Nicene creed. By which it is to be inferred that the creed drawn up and adopted at the council of Nice, is intended. But whatever may have been intended—it is not the Nicene creed, nor was it fabricated until more than fifty years after the council of Nice. Several particulars not named—and probably not thought of by the fathers of that council—are contained in this creed. And it is probable, that because certain doctrines had now attained their maturity, and are there expressed in a manner unknown to the creed of Nice, it was preferred. And yet some of these doctrines are the identical ones, with the disbelief of which, a British writer reproaches the church of England. It reads thus:—

"I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible: And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten of his Father before all worlds: God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made; who for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate, by the Holy Ghost, of the Virgin Mary, and was made man, and was crucified also for us, under Pontius Pilate. He suffered and was buried, and the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father; and he shall come again with glory to judge both the quick and the dead; whose kingdom shall have no end. And I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life; who proceedeth from the Father and the Son; who with the Father and Son together, is worshipped and glorified; who spake by the prophets.—And I believe in one Catholic and Apostolic church; I acknowledge one Baptism for the remission of sins; and I look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. Amen."

Of this creed, the learned Cave says, "The reader will observe that this is one of the three famous creeds which our church has adopted into her solemn Liturgy, and which commonly passes under the name of the Nicene creed at this day. When, as 'tis plain, 'tis not the Nicene creed, (which we have represented in another place,) but an explanation of it, especially in the article about the Holy Ghost; and was composed (as the council of Chalcedon assures us) by this synod, at Constantinople." (Lives of the Fathers, fol. ed., Vit. Greg. Naz.)

This synod was convened by the emperor Theodosius, in A. D. 381, and the above creed is supposed to have been composed by Gregory Nyssen. Whereas, the council of Nice met in A. D. 325, and the creed then adopted was always ascribed to Hosius, bishop of Corduba.

But there are differences in the two creeds, of much greater importance than attaches to their respective dates. For we are much less interested in the time when they were composed, than in the doctrines which they assert. The creed of the Liturgy, not only contains the confession of belief in the Holy Ghost, but acknowledges that it is both "the Lord and Giver of life"—"proceedeth from the Father and the Son," and is with them "worshipped and glorified." Now there is not a word of all this in the creed adopted by the council of Nice. It seems not to have been known to the bishops and fathers of that council, that the Holy Spirit was either "the Lord and Giver of life," or that it was to be "worshipped and glorified," together with the Father and the Son.

Another circumstance deserving especial notice, is also fully explained by Cave, respecting the procession of the Holy Spirit. He says, "Tis obvious, likewise, that herein (the Nicene creed) is wanting what our creed asserts, concerning the Holy Ghost's proceeding both from the Father AND THE SON, this being added afterwards. The precise time when this so much controverted addition was made, is not easy to be adjusted. * * * It seems not to have gained any public place in the creed, 'till the time of pope Nicholas I., who entered upon that See, A. D. 858, and to have been discovered when the quarrel broke out between him and Photius, patriarch of Constantinople."

From this, and much more to the same import, it appears that a part, and a very important part of what is called the Nicene creed, so far from having been professed or asserted by the council of Nice, did not find a place in the standards of the church for more than five hundred years afterwards, so that if any saving importance—or even necessary truth attaches to the belief that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Son, as well as from the Father, the ministers and members of the apostolic church must have been in a sad state of ignorance nearly a thousand years! Nor is this all. The divine honors offered to the Spirit after it was decreed that the Holy Ghost must be “worshipped and glorified” together with the Father and Son, must have been withheld for many centuries. And the church must feel itself under lasting obligations to St. Basil and the two Gregories—Nyssen and Nazianzen—for their efforts in enabling the members of the Christian family, to know so much better than the apostles and martyrs, how many persons there really were in the Godhead, and how they were to be worshipped.

But independently of these facts—and in their very face—we are told in the 8th article of the church of England, that both the Nicene and the Apostles’ creed, “ought thoroughly to be received and believed, for they may be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture.”

Let the reader remark, then—that it is not now intended to argue the question of the truth of either of these creeds. The object is, to show that in their present form, they are utterly irreconcilable with each other—and consequently, that they cannot both be proven, or supported by the Scriptures. Nor is it possible to suppose, that any person can believe both these creeds at the same time; unless, indeed, it be also supposed, that some people can believe opposite and contradictory statements. And while we must admit that the faith of many persons is exceedingly flexible, it certainly implies an extraordinary degree of complaisance in the mind which can accommodate itself to subjects so very dissimilar.

The Apostles’ creed, after stating the belief in the Father Almighty, adds—“And in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord,” etc. The corresponding clause of the other creed, reads thus—“And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten of his Father before all worlds; God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father,” etc.

From this comparison of a single clause from each, it appears that the following particulars are asserted in one, which are neither named, nor so much as hinted at in the other creed.

1. The eternal Sonship of Christ—“begotten before all worlds,” and the manner of his production, and the nature of his being—“begotten, not made; being of one substance with the Father.” The mode of the production of Christ, and the period when he became a Son, as well as the sameness, or consubstantiality of his nature with the Father, were the great points at issue in what is called, the Arian controversy. That controversy led to the council of Nice; and as the Athanasians, or opposers of Arius prevailed, we can be at no loss for the use of those terms which stand forth in the above quotation.

But, surely, no man will contend that all this can be inferred from any part of the Apostles’ creed. And if no such thing can be inferred from it, how can it be supposed that the same things are maintained by both? And again—if the same things are not maintained by both, how can both “be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture”?

2. The absolute Godhead of Christ, is asserted in the so-called Nicene creed, in the clause—“God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God.” Nothing like this is found in that ascribed to the apostles. He is there styled, God’s “only Son, our Lord”—but no intimation is given that he was God in any sense. To suppose that the same things, were intended by the respective authors of these two creeds, is to presume greatly upon the perception of mankind. For it cannot, with the least show of reason, be argued, that any man could infer the Godhead of Christ from the one; or fail of doing so from the other.

Again. The Apostles’ creed merely asserts—“I believe in the Holy Ghost,” without any reference to its personality, deity or office—its derivation, or the honors to which it is entitled. On the contrary, as has already been shown, the other enumerates all these particulars in the most punctilious manner. “I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life; who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, who with the Father and Son together, is worshipped and glorified.”

No person can doubt, that it was the intention of the framers of this creed, to assert the deity of the Holy Spirit, its identity with the Father and the Son, and its claims to a participation in all the honors of divine worship. But it is impossible to suppose that all—or even any part of this, was intended in the Apostles’ creed. Certainly nothing that has the most remote relation to either of these particulars, is there expressed.

It appears, then, from the foregoing quotations, that, one of the Episcopal creeds maintains the eternal Sonship and Godhead of Jesus Christ, and the personality and deity of the Holy Spirit; and that the other is entirely silent respecting these very important subjects. Hence, it may be fairly presumed, that were these creeds used separately, by different congregations, their views would, in time, become very dissimilar—so much so, that the one would profess the doctrine of the Divine unity, and the other, that of the trinity. As affairs are now conducted, we are furnished with the very singular spectacle of a whole church, in all its members and ramifications, professing to believe both these creeds of opposite and irreconcilable sentiments. And thus, by a practical experiment in religion, endeavoring to demonstrate the unsoundness of the maxim, that it is impossible for a thing to exist, and yet not exist, at the same time.

But while both these creeds are thus acknowledged, either of them is permitted to be used by the members of the Episcopal church. From which it is to be inferred, that so long as both are professed, it is matter of indifference which is absolutely believed. And hence, again, that it is quite immaterial whether believers recognize one or three persons in the Godhead. But though that church sometimes winks at the Unitarianism of such communicants as never would have become members without such indulgence, still it means to be thought quite orthodox on this subject. And, indeed, the doxologies and supplications to the trinity, must be supposed an effectual barrier to the admission of any honest Unitarian. For one who can digest the prayers and doxologies of the Liturgy, to say nothing of the creed, could, and probably would swallow a camel!

With the evidence which has been adduced, of the palpable discrepancies of the creeds of the Episcopal church, it is surprising that both should be permitted to be used. But even their use, is not so extraordinary as the pious daring which asserts they can “be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture.” For certainly, no enlightened and sincere Christian, will presume, that the Bible can, by any just rules of interpretation, be made to support conflicting theories. And it will be admitted, that few things are more opposite than the individual unity, and the tripersonality of God—or the consideration of the Holy Spirit as a power or principle, and its absolute deity.

It cannot be thought that we presume too much, in saying that if the Scriptures teach “there is but one God even the Father,” they cannot teach that the Son and the Spirit are God in the same sense—much less, that they are the same God. And yet the creeds of the Episcopal church, collectively assert both the positive and the negative of this proposition; and the articles affirm that both can be proved by the Scriptures.

The state of religious knowledge at the period when the articles were drawn up and adopted, may be offered as some apology for their incongruities and absurdities. But when they are held up for the adoption and belief of Christians in the nineteenth century—bearing, as they do, all their ancient honors, they offer but a sorry compliment to an enlightened age. It is presuming that the world is either inattentive to its religious interests, or wholly incapable of reasoning on serious subjects. But it is neither—and the consequence is, that perceptible and prominent absurdities in the creeds of the church, drive some men into infidelity, and induce others, who are skeptical, to attach themselves to fashionable communions, where anything may be professed—or nothing believed. WHAT IS MAN?.....No. II.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

In a former article, I gave a brief outline of the powers and capacities of mankind. In answer to the above inquiry, I stated that, to the qualities which man possesses in common with the animal creation, God has superadded both moral and intellectual capacities—that these capacities are all that distinguish him from the brute—and that they form the relationship which unites him to higher beings and indicate his future existence in a happier world. From these considerations some profitable reflections may be adduced.

They should inspire us with a true and abiding sense of the dignity of our nature. Our principles of action should be as far elevated above the brute, as our capacities are loftier than theirs. To all created existence Deity has imparted a desire for enjoyment; and for every class of animals or beings, he has provided adequate means to gratify this desire. These means of enjoyment vary in accordance with the different capacities and propensities of the creatures for whom they are designed. And it may be remarked as an interesting truth pertaining to physiology, that as animal existence extends upward, through all the multiplied grades, from the most minute animalcule that floats in air or water, up to man, the capacities for enjoyment are multiplied and enlarged, and the means to impart it are increased. Every grade of beings have means of enjoyment peculiar to themselves; and if they make that proper use of those means, which nature dictates, they become sources of blessing—but if they disregard the injunctions of nature, and break over her restraints, unavoidable wretchedness ensues.

It is highly important that man should understand and heed the restrictions of his nature; for, of all beings, he is the most liable to disregard them, and to become involved in the consequent unhappiness. The human race possess qualities of a mixed character—they form a kind of connecting link between this world and another, more perfect and happy. With the lower orders of animals, man has bodily wants; and the supplying of these wants in that consistent, temperate manner pointed out by nature, will become a means of a certain degree of gratification. But he should be extremely cautious not to depend upon this gratification of the animal propensities, for that enjoyment which his nature craves. As I have before remarked, the Creator has imparted to mankind the high, moral and intellectual faculties; and to the exercise of these elevated powers must they look for that enjoyment which pertains to their class; for that true happiness which is proper to them, as man!

It must be very evident, that whoever disregards his high endowments, and depends for happiness solely upon the gratification of his passions, degrades himself to the level of the beast.

“No man e’er found a happy life by chance,
Or yawn’d it into being with a wish;
Or with the snout of grov’ling appetite,
E’er smelt it out, and grubb’d it from the dirt.”

He who believes, and acts upon the belief, that man’s greatest earthly enjoyment consists in satiating his animal propensities, loses entirely the benefit of the higher nature of the nobler gifts, which God has bestowed upon him. He might as well have been a brute, as to any real advantage his mental and moral powers have imparted to him. His enjoyments are of precisely the same nature as the brute’s; while the evils into which he is thus led, are tenfold greater than any suffered by the beast whose example he imitates. For the latter, obeying that instinct which nature has designed for its guard, is properly guided and restrained, so that we never discover a brute intemperate in any thing. But man, trampling upon his moral and intellectual powers, thus destroys all the guiding and controlling faculties he possesses, is left, as it were, blindfolded and without a conductor, and necessarily plunges into the very depths of intemperance, degradation and wretchedness. I have said that man thus degrades himself to the level of the brute; yea, he falls far below that level. The brute acts up to the standard of his nature—follows implicitly the dictates of instinct, the highest faculty he possesses. But the man fails of acting up to the standard of his nature, disregards and neglects the direction of his lofty powers, and absolutely does that, which the animal, instinct though it only has, would feel itself degraded to do, had it the capacity to realize that sensation.

I therefore repeat, a realization of the valuable facilities we possess, should inspire us with a just sense of the dignity of our nature—with that true pride which shall restrain us from going down to a communion in emotion and action, with the beast of the field. Shall man forget his holy parentage—shall he disregard those indwelling powers which crown him lord of this world, and, with the intellect of an angel, grovel with the brute? Forbid it Heaven—manhood forbid it! In seeking for happiness, we should never permit the passions to direct where it is to be found; for they unguided, will unavoidably lead us astray. The happiness of rational beings can only be obtained by the medium of the mind. The elevated powers which there preside, are the channels appointed by God, through which those pure enjoyments for which the soul pants, can only flow. Hence the necessity of looking in this direction for the happiness congenial to our natures. If we look to any other source—if we descend to the passions, and follow in the track of the brute, we at best can obtain but a fitful excitement, while degradation, disappointment and unhappiness unavoidably ensue.

BIBLE READING.....No. II.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

It seems, at first thought, an almost thankless task to attempt proposing to the young and ardent, and those in the prime of life and hope, the guidance and consolations of a book professedly most applicable to persons in opposite circumstances—the favorite of the aged, the decrepid, the unfortunate in every stage and walk of life. But let us reflect. Must we not all, at some period or other, be afflicted? become mourners? many of us at least old? Let the experience of many hundred generations answer. And then, where is our stay? Where are the precious promises for which the fainting spirit asks? Others may repeat them to us; but if we have never read them ourselves, their emphasis is lost. One would suppose, in looking over the pages of divine inspiration, that every person must necessarily, on the slightest investigation, become deeply interested in the nature of the important truths revealed; even, if from no other, from the consideration of self—for therein is every one concerned. Yet how ignorant—how culpably ignorant—are many, who boast an education, the very best our country can give, of the simplest Bible facts. Ignorant of the history of the apostles—yea, ignorant even of the names of the epistles which they wrote!

But a short time since, a young acquaintance of mine, in looking over the Philadelphia Discussion, came to a reference to "Phil.," and asked me what it was an abbreviation of. "Why, of Philippians," I replied. And (will it be believed?) he turned to the Old Testament for it! Only think of a young and talented graduate of a distinguished college, searching among the Chronicles for father Paul's letter to the Philippians! Should this meet his eye, I know he will forgive me; for I promised him, at the time, exposure—yea, even to his very name—in case of continued non-information.—

Though I am happy to learn and to state, that he has so far overcome his antipathy to his ancient school book, as to have studied it deeply, and even become a convert to its blessed doctrines. The indifference which gay young people generally manifest towards the Bible, arises, undoubtedly, in most cases, from a mistaken idea of its contents. They suppose it to be a gloomy revelation of gloomier doctrines, calculated to deprive them of every innocent enjoyment; and they dread to open its lids. But let them examine for themselves—not depend entirely upon pulpit sketches—for information, and they will obtain the knowledge which yieldeth peace. There is no book in the world, whose pages contain so much to interest and instruct. Here is the birthplace of lofty, soul-kindling poetry.—Here are the noblest examples of high and holy virtue—of devotion and unshaken trust in God. In a word, here is all that is grand, and beautiful, and holy—all that is necessary to make us, what our Creator intended us to be, good and happy beings—for we may here read ourselves, the world, and, more than all, the character and will of our almighty Father and Friend. Let young people, then, commence early to read the Bible, and they will soon love to read it—they will—it cannot be otherwise. Let them read it often and prayerfully, searching earnestly for its truths, and rejoicing in its promises—let it ever be their companion on the Sabbath, (for the habit of frittering away Sabbath hours in light reading, cannot be other than pernicious,) and I am convinced they will never regret the time spent in this interesting employment.—They will find a softening spirit at work among the sterner features of their hearts, moulding them nearer and nearer to the image of the dear Founder of their faith.

THE RAMBLER.....No. I.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

PROCRASTINATION.

There is scarcely any evil more pernicious to society, or more injurious to the interests and happiness of individuals, than PROCRASTINATION. It seems to afflict all classes, more or less. Like every other sin, however, every one is ready to frame excuses for its continuance. A few of these I design to notice, as a kind of preliminary to a series of articles for your periodical, sincerely hoping that I shall have no attacks myself, before I get through with my whole design.

1. We constantly endeavor to persuade ourselves that some better opportunity than the present, will occur. To-morrow, or the next week, or year, will bring more leisure. We wish to rest now, or to engage in some present amusement. We forget that indolence is as fatiguing as the hardest labor—that God gives us but a moment of time at once—that the past is irrecoverably gone, and that the future is not ours—the present only we can call our own. Such being our situation, delay is dangerous. We talk freely and confidently of the longevity and uncertainty of human life, yet act as if the present existence were never to end, and the next never to commence.

2. We complain of the shortness of time. Life, we say, even if prolonged to three or fourscore years, is but a dream; it is but a step, as it were, from the cradle to the grave. Grant all that has ever been said on this trite subject, and a stronger argument for industry cannot be presented. As life is short, there is the more necessity for devoting the allotted time to some useful purpose. If we knew that we had but an hour longer to live, our time ought to be devoted to the promotion of some good object. We complain of the rapidity of time, yet we waste numberless hours in frivolous pursuits. Besides: against whom do we murmur? It is against that Being in whose hand is the destiny of worlds, as well as of individuals. Had infinite wisdom seen fit, we might have been made immortal at once. The issues of life and death are with God. Instead, then, of wasting time in fruitless complaints, let us arrest the moments as they pass, and make each subservient to some noble end.

The above remarks have led me on to state with distinctness the object that I have more immediately in view. I intend, as health and opportunity will permit, to send you a few articles on various subjects, and for convenience shall adopt the general title of THE RAMBLER.

The following proposals come from a highly respectable source—a brother in the ministry, whose well known talents are abundantly competent to the task he assigns himself—and we bespeak for them a favorable consideration. The only apprehension we feel about it is, that it will make its appearance too late in the day to meet promptly the wants of the denomination, if the publisher waits till "others have done publishing," as we learn from the last "Union" that Mr. B. B. Mussey, of Boston has just issued proposals for publishing another new hymn book, to be entitled the "Universalist Psalmody," and edited by Rev. H. Ballou, 2d. It is to be forthcoming as early as possible, and put "as low as any other book of equal size and quality."—Eds. Mag. and Adv.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HYMN BOOK, EXTRAORDINARY.

It is a notorious and lamentable circumstance, that the great Universalist public is altogether destitute of a suitable and standard hymn book. Not a society of that numerous and growing denomination, has probably at this time, more than half a dozen different kinds—and very few private members more than twice that number. Of course, it is extremely difficult to sustain singing—that delightful part of public worship, in congregations utterly destitute of singers, for want of suitable books. And, besides, the exorbitant prices of hymn books—so entirely beyond all endurance—has rendered it expedient as well as desirable, to relieve the denomination from this oppressive burden, by the addition of another as nearly equal as can well be estimated. And in this way, to secure the much-needed and entire uniformity, by so multiplying editions as that no two individuals shall possess similar copies, unless they procure the whole.

For this purpose, we would by all means recommend to societies and private Christians to purchase as early as practicable, Rely's Hymns—the old hymn book published in the name of the General Convention of Universalists, especially for its poetry—Belknap's edition, and those of Pickering, Ballou and Turner, and Streeter's—not forgetting the several forthcoming new editions by sundry brethren. All of which may be safely recommended, as most of them have been already pretty generally used. But in doing this, we design to give a specimen of our own disinterestedness; as we intend so soon as all others have had their day, to publish one of the very best selections, in an immensely superior style, cheaper than any four of those already in being put together, and adapted to all times, places and persons.

With a view to this, we shall continue with the utmost patience, both to buy, and to use, any and every edition that has been, or may hereafter be issued from the press—provided always, that their number and high price do not put it beyond our power, in order that we may select all the longest and duldest productions of the hymning family for our standard work.

CONDITIONS.—The work shall be published, as early as possible after others have done publishing; on fine dark blue paper, medium sexessimo, and printed with nonpareil type, for the accommodation of the aged and persons with weak eyes—the whole set to music from the latest manuals for concerts of praise, and afforded at—any price that we can get, and the people will pay.

N. B. As the above proposed edition will be, from its type and form, too cumbersome for convenient use when travelling—we shall publish a neat pocket edition of diminished size, and at the lowest price, for special friends, and others who are yet able to read without spectacles.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.....PART I.

III. TRANSLATION OF PSALM xxxvii: 37—"Observe the finished (or complete) man, and let the equitable (or upright) detain your attentive consideration, for, to that man, the fruit of his conduct is peace."

The writer of this psalm seems to have been puzzled and perplexed by the seeming greater prosperity and splendor of the unjust and the evil-doer, than that which is allotted, by the arrangements of God's government or providence, to the most resolute conformity to the dictates of justice, rectitude, conscience and God. In the progress of the psalm, we have the thoughts of the writer, while endeavoring to resolve the difficulties connected with a superficial and prima facie observation of the condition of the doers of what is wrong, and the doers of what is right. Of all the remarks which are made upon the subject, this verse contains that which, to me, is the most impressive and instructive. It directs my thoughts away from the outward appearances, to the state of mind, in the contrasted characters. It directs my attention not to the gaiety, and glee, and grandeur of life; in which, as well as in laughter, "the heart full of sorrowful"—but to the "inner man of the heart," where conscience sits supreme, dispensing her awards of calm satisfaction, or of retributive regret and remorse. It reminds me of a lesson which my reflections have oft taught me:—that more than upon any one external condition—yea, more than upon all external circumstances put together—does happiness depend upon the state of the mind. It enforces upon my consideration, the native and essential happiness which there is in moral worth, and the like native and essential wretchedness which there is in moral depravity. At the bidding of the psalmist, I observe him who has been careful to subdue every evil propensity—to render himself complete and of finished virtue, and in him I seem to behold "the soul's calm sunshine," a felt and gladdening satisfaction, in opposition to the pungent agony and discomfort, the bitter self-disapprobation of the deficient in virtue and character. I watch him in his solitary and his social moments, and instead of unhappy peevishness, and disquietude, and discomfort, I behold a placid and cheerful countenance, a calmness and contentment, a serenity and a peacefulness which, to me, speak more unequivocally of happiness and enjoyment, than the most noisy mirth or the most outrageous hilarity. At the bidding of the psalmist, I allow my thoughts to be detained upon this character; and I become more and more convinced, that in the exercise of the virtues—of justice, rectitude and benevolence—there is, indeed, the very "oil of gladness"; that there is a sweetness and a pleasure in the consciousness of doing what we ought; that virtue's "ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace"—that, of a truth,

"One self-approving hour, whole years outweighs
Of stupid starers, or of loud huzzas."

The subjoined lines contain a solution of the cause of the perplexity, which has been not unfrequently felt, upon comparing the outward condition and appearances of the doers of what is right, and the doers of what is wrong.

"Never man was truly blest,
But it composed and gave him such a cast
As folly might mistake for want of joy:—
A cast unlike the triumph of the proud,
A modest aspect, and a smile at heart."

May you, my dear friend, continue to enjoy this "smile at heart." May you continue ever to know the delight of the sweet music of an approving conscience. Compared with the sublimity and serenity of conscious rectitude, who would name or accept, as an alternative, the treasures, or the power, or the pomp of the world?

IV. TRANSLATION OF PSALM xxxvii: 11—

"The mildly-dispositioned are the true enjoyers of this world; Yea, they do greatly delight in the abundance of peace."

The sense or meaning of this verse, as I understand it, may be thus expressed in the form of a paraphrase:—For want of reflection upon the lessons which our own and others' experience might enforce upon us, men are very liable to mistake the nature and the sources of happiness. For want of such reflection I have often felt envious of the seeming greater prosperity and enjoyment of the evil-doer. In the estimate which I made of his comfort and happiness, reflection teaches me that I was much mistaken. When I come to ask myself, from what sources I have, myself, derived my most pure and satisfactory delights, I feel, that when "envious of the wicked," I supposed him in possession of sources of enjoyment, which could not be his. No! the pleasures of their "corn and wine" (Ps. iv: 7)—their physical comforts, in the most abundant profusion, cannot yield such enjoyment as arises from "the light of thy countenance, O my God," (Ps. iv: 6,) the approving voice and smile of thy vicegerent and monitor within the soul. I have found that, with affections not attuned to love of God and love of man, I enjoyed but little, if any, real satisfaction and pleasure from all that wealth could purchase; whereas, when imbued with a mild and gentle disposition—with filial gratitude and fraternal good will—I could, even in the absence of all physical comforts, educe enjoyment from any events, any circumstances: I could feel as if I wished for no more than the continuance of such a spirit—I could feel as if earth could furnish nothing so exquisite. And I verily believe that, to the true enjoyment of this world, no possession is so essentially necessary, as that of a meek and quiet spirit. Within the bosoms where this dwelleth, there are "rivers of pleasure and joys for evermore." Such as have this spirit do luxuriate in such an abundance of heavenlike serenity and peace, that riches, and all that riches can command, can add but little to the sum of it; while poverty and destitution can detract from it but little, and can never take it away.

Such, it appears to me, was the sentiment of the psalmist. Such the sentiment of Him who knew human nature best, for he knew "what was in man." (Matt. v: 5.)

In conformity to the genius of Hebrew poetry, there is an analogy and exaltation of the sense in the second line of the stanza. In the first line, the meek, or gentle, are said simply, to possess or enjoy this world; but in the second line, they are represented as delightfully luxuriating in the abundance, not of "corn and wine," but of peace which this world can neither give nor take away. The treasures of this world the evil-doer may possess; (we may not say enjoy;) but peace he can never have, for "there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." If the distinction between the contrasted characters is not sufficiently marked in the first line, there is a bold line of demarcation drawn in the second.

LETTER NO. IV.

To Rev. J. Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus."
Phil. ii: 5.

DEAR SIR—I shall now take in review a small portion of your communication; and if I hold up to your view the errors involved in your writings so as to present a haggard aspect, you must not censure me; for such as the animal of your own production is, I intend to exhibit it. After stating the views of your church, you state:—

"3. We are to distinguish between this depravity, and guilt. A parent, by his intemperance and profligacy, may squander away his property, ruin his character, and contract diseases which become hereditary in his family—in consequence of which he entails poverty, infamy and disease upon his unfortunate posterity; and although this indeed is their misfortune, yet it is not their crime; they had no control over the affair. This is the natural effect of the physical constitution of nature; and because the Creator has connected these things, as cause and effect, no one thinks of charging the Creator with injustice. So, in consequence of the moral constitution of our nature, when our first parents sinned, all their unfortunate posterity were involved in the consequences of the transgression—that is, the sin of Adam, in its effects was, imputed to his posterity, according to the declaration of St. Paul—"For by one man's disobedience many were made sinners." Rom. v: 19."

In this strange kind of reasoning, you exhibit the prevalent error among Limitarians, of associating and confounding the physical constitution of man with his moral nature or character—or, in other words, of viewing man in his practical life in the flesh, the same in relative state towards his God as in his spiritual relation. They are no more alike than light and darkness, or good and evil. You also exhibit that wonderful discernment many pretend to have, qualifying them to draw the distinction between "depravity and guilt." You undoubtedly intend to have "depravity and guilt" considered as evils of the intellect or spirit. If they were, it would require more than the popular wonderful discernment to distinguish between them. Depravity belongs exclusively to the man "which is of the earth, earthy"—the outward man in which exists the law of sin; whilst guilt pertains to the intellectual man and is wholly dependant upon intention.

I will admit that there are many intemperate parents who entail upon their posterity "poverty, infamy and disease." But as between those children and their Creator, are they condemned in their moral character for what their parents have done? Are they condemned for that which they have not perpetrated? Is their poverty an evil in the sight of God? Is the disease which they inherited anything for which God condemns them? Does not their infamy spring from the false pride of the world, which ever loves glittering wealth, contrary to the teaching of the Gospel? I think so. I speak of that which was entailed. When those children begin to move in the world for themselves, their own acts may morally condemn, or commend them. And, indeed, on this you and I agree; for you say, alluding to what was entailed, "it is not their crime: they had no personal existence, therefore could have no control over the affair." A very good reason this, and I wish you would remember it. I will apply it as between Adam and his posterity—his transgression "is not their crime: they had no personal existence, therefore could have no control over the affair." How many, then, think you, were made liable to eternal death as a penalty by that which was no crime in them? I think, not many, Br. Keyes.

After speaking of the sins of parents entailing physical evils on children, (which you admit is no crime in them,) as for analogy, you say, speaking of our moral nature, "when our first parents sinned all their unfortunate posterity were involved in the consequences of the transgression; that is, the sin of Adam was imputed, in its effects, to his posterity." Your reasoning is bad, because there is no analogy between our physical constitution, and our moral nature; but did they bear an analogy, your deductions are entirely variant from the same premises. Besides, your deduction is at war with the Gospel, which declares all shall be punished according to the deeds done, etc. But it is sufficient to say, Adam's posterity "could have no control over the affair," therefore the sin was not imputed to them. The words of St. Paul, which you quote, are no proof of your position, which will plainly appear by varying them and making them read as they ought, in order to bear your construction—"for by one man's disobedience all were made sinners." The word many is an unhappy word for you. It is peculiarly unfortunate, when you desire to prove by that passage, that all Adam's posterity transgressed in him; that St. Paul should have used the contracted and limited word many. It will be equally difficult for you to prove those words of the apostle had a confined reference to the transgression of Adam. I shall not, however, deny but that he made such reference; if so, and if he intended to show that "many were made sinners," he immediately furnishes an equal, co-extensive remedy or restoration; for he adds, "so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." The word many is as broad in one application as the other. If you had only thought to have added the latter part of the verse to your quotation, it would have saved me some writing. Perhaps it was not convenient for you so to do; for then it would have required in its connexion the 20th verse, which is in these words:—"Moreover, the law entered that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." So, taking all together, it was more than was convenient for your purposes—it would not show what you attempted to show.

You then proceed—"4. As all men were included in Adam, when he transgressed, had no mediator been provided for them, they would not have been personally punished, by having positive pains and penalties inflicted upon them; but they would have been punished in Adam, their first representative. According to the threatened penalty, he would have died a temporal, as well as a spiritual and eternal death; and they would have died in him without ever enjoying a personal existence—therefore their punishment would not have been positive, but only negative." Thus says Elder Keyes. This reasoning is carnal indeed—a strange mass of ideas! I can hardly imagine how "all men" could be punished in Adam centuries before they were born—neither can I conceive how they could have died without first having lived. Can you, Sir, imagine how you could have been punished, by your father having received a flogging ten or fifteen years before your birth—or I will say, by your great grandfather's being flogged a hundred years prior to your birth? Or can you imagine how you could have died in your great grandfather, a century before you had existence? I will acknowledge the incapacity of my imagination on this branch of the subject. It will do no harm to notice that, in this part of your communication, you have offered no proof for your positions—not even an article from the "Methodist Episcopal church."

I shall notice soon your gratuitous introduction and use of the "eternal death" in your letter.

AMICUS.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Again a pile of letters has accumulated before us, from which we select a few extracts (all we have room for) interesting to us, and probably so to many of our readers. We publish, also, a few extracts which we hope will be interesting and useful to our agents, or those subscribers who may design acting as such.

The first extracts are from an agent in Stafford, Genesee county. After promising not only to get subscribers, but also to collect the payments in advance, he says:—

"I remember reading an anecdote of a certain clergyman who made a practice of borrowing a five dollar note from one of his neighbors, as often as he went to a certain place to deliver his message, and of returning the same note on his return. This led the neighbor to question the preacher's motives for such strange conduct, when the reverend gentleman replied that he could preach better with five dollars in his pocket than he could without! I wish this fact could be impressed on the minds of all who are fond of either good writing or good preaching—that there is some difference, if not one half, whether those who preach or write have any money in pocket!"

Another extract from this letter, and I will dismiss it. It is the proof (often repeated) that Universalism is the cure, as Partialism is the cause, of the infidelity of hundreds. After stating that he was bred a Calvinistic Baptist—that, as he grew up, his feelings revolted at the cruelty, as his reason did at the absurdities of his creed, which he really believed, as he had been taught, was the doctrine of the Bible—he says:—

"This infused doubts into my mind; for I had not then learned that the gift of God was eternal life, and that salvation from sin and its consequences depended upon our actions, and that the wicked must receive for all that they do, for there is no way to escape the just punishment of our transgressions. I therefore found myself plunged into unbelief and infidelity. I asked for light, of popular ministers and people, and received darkness in return. May God forgive my hardness of feelings towards my fellow-men, whilst driven to skepticism by those who ought to have been teachers in Israel—God forgive them, also, for their not intended perversion of the sacred Oracles, and their mistaken notions of the wisdom and goodness of the Being they worship! Under these feelings of hardness, I commenced taking the paper which is now in your hands for publication. May the Lord give you that strength of mind which has ornamented its columns in former years—which has been influential in removing the doubts of my mind and restoring me to that faith in Christianity which I had been driven from by the opposers of that hope which is now like 'an anchor to my soul, both sure and steadfast.' [Amen and amen!] Blessed be God, I now can call all men my brothers, and can recommend them to Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, as one that 'has tasted death for every man,' and 'gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time.' A. K."

The following is from a subscriber in Turin, Lewis county, who has been deprived of the use of his legs for about two years, by sickness.

"I have read the Magazine for six years, and it tastes sweeter and sweeter; and if I could have a number to feast upon every evening, I believe I could live upon half the food I now do. Turin is principally under the dominion of Protestant Rome, though there are some liberal men here who have not the mark of the beast, and if I am permitted to get away from this place, (abounding in intoxicated, 'experience,') where I have been confined by sickness, (but have now nearly regained my health,) I think I shall be able to gain one or more new subscribers, ere this year is past. I'll try. W. H. G."

Our friend in Massilon, Ohio, must have the bump of perseverance—he is not to be put off by the answer of "call again." He says:—

"I have been endeavoring, for some time, to procure you more subscribers, but always got for answer, 'I will see you again.' To-day I started out with a determination not to take such an answer, and succeeded in adding three (or you may say four) names to your list—for one informed me he had ordered you to discontinue, but I persuaded him he 'could not keep house without it,' and he allows me to re-order it. * * * Thus, you see, our package bids fair to be eight; (instead of mine, only, as was the case for several years;) and I have the promise of two more in the Spring, if they conclude to remain here. * * * The glorious cause of God's impartial grace is slowly gaining ground here; and if we had but an able preacher, in two years we would outnumber any other denomination in the place. I wish you to inform our preachers who may pass this way, that they must not pass by without calling. They will find friends in Massilon, who will always be happy to entertain them. A. B."

Our prompt and active agent in Chicago, Ill., sends us a handsome addition to a list already gratifying, and informs us that that place of yesterday, as it were, contains about four thousand inhabitants. He says:—

"I am in hopes you will send us some one who will help put down superstition. We have some Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Roman Catholics—but there are more liberal men here than of any other class. Now is the time to spread the truth. S. G. T."

From Fort Plain, Br. Countryman, our active agent there, has sent us upwards of thirty names, additional to a large list, and a promise of more. Who will not say, "the Magazine and Advocate is sold to the Dutch?" But what is highly gratifying to us, as well as evidence of good old German exactness and economy, is, they will all pay within the time for advance payment.

The following is a per contra statement, not only as respects success in procuring subscribers for our paper, but as regards the state of our cause. Too numerous are the places where such a state of things exists—but we do not despair. Christ must reign, eventually, and triumph over superstition and unbelief.

"Whiteford, Monroe county, Mich., January 3, 1836.

"Messrs. Editors—Knowing from experience that your interesting paper is a 'feast of fat things' to the hungry mind, and well calculated to exhilarate the drooping spirits of the desponding, and being anxious to 'communicate good'; I have used my best endeavors, and taken much pains since I have been in this place, to persuade some of the people to subscribe for the Magazine and Advocate, but all to no purpose!

"I find that the people in this vicinity, in searching after truth, have settled down on the two extremes, and are perfectly satisfied, without any further investigation, that their own peculiar views are right! The advocates of endless misery pray for the salvation of all men, but abuse, ridicule and despise those who believe that their prayers will, 'in the dispensation of the fulness of times,' be answered! thereby virtually acknowledging that they do not pray in faith—or, in other words, that they are hypocrites. On the other hand, those that could not conscientiously subscribe to Partialist views, in consequence of their inconsistency and absurdity, have settled down on the other extreme, and deny all revelation, and advocate the doctrine that death is an eternal sleep! So, you see, that I am threatened with the torments of an endless hell on one side, and eternal sleep on the other. But amidst all this bigotry and skepticism, I find great consolation in the perusal of the Magazine and Advocate, and am fully persuaded that 'truth is great and will prevail.' Respectfully yours, etc., J. N. P."

Our beloved Br. and agent, the Postmaster at Sheshequin, Pa., accounts for his long silence in a letter from which I extract as follows. He is mistaken, though, as to the number of communications on hand—the "Dutch churn" is never called in requisition, a very small drawer will hold them all—that is, all the good ones—as to the others, we put them into the "iron chest!" As to the course to be pursued, or tone to be observed, in addressing or speaking of our opposers, I differ, perhaps, a little from Br. K., as to the number of Pharisees, fanatics and hypocrites among them—I cannot believe they are quite as numerous as he believes they are—and, even if they were, better let ninety-nine guilty escape than injure one innocent. This is (sometimes) my rule—he must act on his own, however—and he will. Let him write away—"variety is the spice of life."

"Sheshequin, January 14, 1836.

"Br. Grosh—I have had so many irons in the fire, the past year, that I have not been able to write a word for your paper in that time. But I perceive you have plenty of scribbles for your paper—and I have no doubt a Dutch churn full of manuscripts on hand, the most of the time—better written than I could write. If I can discover that the writers of your paper are catching the ennui, I will try to set them at "catching a Tartar"—so that the readers of your paper shall not be lulled to sleep for the want of a little excitement. You know, well enough, that I can neither creep nor crawl to Pharisees, fanatics and hypocrites. The plain truth should be told, hit who it may. If I could believe one out of five of the self-styled Orthodox were honest in their professions, I should have a different view of the subject. But the sin of ignorance should not be credited to more than one out of five, who are so strenuously supporting the cause of satan's kingdom. The other four know better, and are working for the devil more for the sake of the 'spoils,' than for the support of any principle they could, themselves, call good, if they were but honest. The devil fees his lawyers liberally, and this makes his 'mare go,' at least. I will venture to say, that if our order were in a situation to give salaries to preachers, only five per cent. higher than the Partialist priests now get, we should have no lack of preachers, nor of wolves in sheep's clothing. It is fortunate for us, I believe, that we are, as a denomination, so poor; for when a priest leaves the ranks of Partialism, and unites himself with us, we have every reason to believe that he is an honest man. And more—we have good reason to believe he possesses talents, and is capable of judging between right and wrong, or he would not leave a good fat salary (or a chance to get one) to enter into the ranks of poverty, with two to one in favor of being hissed at, kicked at, and spit upon. I think, therefore, that we should highly appreciate men coming among us of this description—and none the less so, because, like ‘angel’s visits, they are few, and long between.’ But enough. Yours truly, J. K.”

The following excellent remarks on the tendency of protracted meetings are from an excellent brother in Norway, Herkimer county.

“This community is more given to zeal than knowledge. A protracted meeting of nearly six weeks continuance, raged here not long since, attended with its usual effects—producing its consequent intolerance in society—sweeping as with the besom of destruction, the high behests of pure religion into the vortex of fanaticism, and not only opening the way, but actually McAdamising the road to skepticism. This leads me to exclaim in the language of another, Oh! if religion were only known as she is in truth, and could men see her divested of sectarian deformities, and moving in that majestic simplicity and loveliness which her divine Author willed that she should wear, there are multitudes, who, instead of shrinking from her presence, would ever welcome her approach, and love to worship among her devoted votaries.

N. F.”

Br. N. Doolittle, of Oxford, Chenango county, writes us the following cheering information, under date of the 25th ult. D. S.

“Our cause moves forward slowly in this place, but I think it goes surely. Our building committee have contracted for the building of our house the ensuing season, for twenty-five hundred dollars. The house is to be built of wood, with a steeple of suitable proportions—dimensions, forty by fifty-five feet. The contractor is now collecting the materials and says he will have it so far completed that we can hold our Association in it, in case we are not able to procure either of the other houses.

“Oxford is a place where Orthodoxy—reputed Orthodoxy would reign triumphant, and gladly concentrate all her powers to crush the vine of universal grace and goodness—that plant of God’s own planting—but I think all her machinations in this part of the heritage of God will in due time be defeated.”

REASONS.....NO. IV.

FOR REJECTING THE DOCTRINE OF ENDLESS MISERY.

“Produce your cause, saith the Lord, bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob.” Isaiah xli: 21.

Secondly. The doctrine of endless misery is absolutely pernicious in every point of view. This will appear by considering

1. That it is pernicious in the extreme to the sufferers of such misery. This will be conceded on all hands. For we have seen in the preceding number that it could do them no possible good—that they were beyond the reach of any good—that it must be to them unmingled and illimitable evil. Hence, it can need no argument to prove it pernicious in the extreme to this class of beings.

2. That it must be pernicious in its influence on the happiness of saints and angels. This must be obvious, if it be admitted that saints and angels in glory are permitted to see and know the miseries of the damned in hell, and that they are what saints and angels should be. It is true, if they are to be transformed into fiends, and the popular notion of the feelings and source of enjoyment with fiends be true, that they might derive a demonic pleasure from such a prospect. But it could never promote, but must inevitably invade and mar the joy of all holy and good beings—of all who in the least partook of the charities of the Gospel, or resembled the merciful Jesus who wept over the approaching miseries of Jerusalem, and mingled his tears of compassionate sympathy with a weeping Martha and Mary.

3. It is pernicious in its example and moral influence. We are aware that some have contended for the truth of the doctrine on the ground of its alleged salutary influence—that it had a tendency to restrain vice and encourage and strengthen virtue; and was therefore necessary to be inculcated; and if so, it was a strong argument in favor of its truth. We might have noticed and refuted this pretended argument under a former head, (viz. the uselessness of the doctrine,) but we choose to consider it under this head, for the reason that we sincerely regard the doctrine not merely in the negative character of useless, but as being positively and extremely pernicious in its bearing on virtue and vice.

There is probably no great evil either physical or moral, but what has been, and may be overruled for good—but what often produces indirectly some benefit or advantage to individuals or communities. And we are not disposed to deny that in some cases of extreme ignorance, alienation, obstinacy and hardness, the doctrine of interminable misery and the fear of an endless hell may have restrained individuals of this character from overt acts of wickedness, and so far as outward conduct was concerned, kept them in the path of virtue. For without this supposition we cannot account for the fact that God has permitted the doctrine to prevail for fourteen or fifteen centuries past. As it has prevailed that length of time we conclude the reason of its being permitted will be found Matt. xix: 8; Mark x: 5; and Heb. vii: 18, 19, and viii: 6-13. The semi-barbarism, degeneracy and corruption of the world; its incapacity to appreciate higher and holier principles and motives form the only plausible ground by which we can account for God’s “suffering it to be so.” But the “weakness and the unprofitableness” of the doctrine, even with reference to such an object, are becoming more and more apparent in this enlightened age; and for this reason we are confident there will be a “disannulling” of it finally throughout all Christendom, and the world. It must appear obvious also, we think, that where the fear of an endless hell, as the sole motive, has restrained degenerate and hardened individuals from overt acts of wickedness, it has by no means implanted in their hearts the love of virtue, nor weaned them from the love of vice—it was no virtue in them—corruption still ranked in their hearts—their outward acts were not the willing obedience of the child, but the servile and unwilling service of the slave, driven to outward obedience by the lash, while his heart inwardly loathes the path of duty.

Moreover, if in a few instances it has restrained the servile and depraved from openly acting out the evil propensities of their hearts, we are confident that the cases are far more numerous where it has alienated from God the affections and confidence of his children, and estranged them still farther from the path of virtue, by surrounding it with gloomy images and associations, and impressing them with the idea that virtue is not sufficiently attractive to be the rewarder of its own pursuit, and that vice has many attractions and charms of itself, or such awful terrors would never have been employed to drive men from its paths. Besides, the mind not only shudders at the thought, but revolts from the belief of such a penalty—the transgressor becomes skeptical respecting its infliction, and rather than admit that such a threatening will be executed, he doubts the authority that denounces it, and ultimately comes to reject all religious instruction and admonition—revelation itself is discarded, and the victim of a false theory, engendering such unworthy views of the divine Being, and degrading fears of his wrath, rushes thence into universal skepticism, on the subject of revelation and religion in general. The erroneous belief that the Bible teaches the doctrine of endless misery, has driven hundreds who have never examined that precious volume but superficially, on to the Scylla of despair, or the Charybdis of infidelity. And no small portion of the latter class we are confident, became so mainly from this source. Hence, one of the pernicious effects of the doctrine is, the infidelity it occasions.

We have said that the threatening of endless misery is not generally credited by sinners against whom it is denounced. It is so with sinners generally so far as they themselves are concerned. They do not feel conscious of having deserved so dreadful a doom. They believe their sins are limited and finite, and they cannot therefore bring their minds to believe they really deserve an endless and infinite punishment. The penalty being altogether disproportionate to the crime, they flatter themselves they shall escape without enduring it: the same as culprits in England, where so many offences are deemed capital and subject to the penalty of death, expect to escape, and generally do escape nearly all punishment, and that for the very reason the penalty is so severe. And so it is with human nature generally. You threaten a child with cutting off his head if he accidentally breaks a tumbler, or commits some trivial offence, and he will not believe you, for the very reason that the penalty is altogether disproportionate to the deed. But threaten him with a moderate degree of punishment, or any amount, within the bounds of reason, propriety or justice, and he will believe you: and the threatening will have, with him, altogether more weight and influence than if it were unreasonably and unjustly severe. Therefore, so far as the threatening of punishment is calculated to exert an influence in restraining sinners from transgression, that of a limited and just punishment will be found salutary, but that of an unlimited, unjust and infinite punishment cannot but be pernicious.

Moreover the doctrine of endless torment tends to paralyze the affections, and deaden the sympathies of humanity—by being often held up to view in glowing colors, it produces a morbid insensibility to human sufferings. It begets also a vindictive and malignant spirit, so far as it has any influence, and by holding up the character of God for imitation, at the same time representing him as burning with indignation against his children, filled with vindictive fury and unappeasable wrath, it fosters the spirit of persecution and cruelty; and if it was not the very torch that kindled, it surely has been the fuel that fed all the fires of persecution that have desolated the earth, since the establishment of Christianity. It is at war with the mild and forgiving spirit of Jesus, with the whole tenor of his life and example, and with every precept of his holy word. The moral principle growing out of it must necessarily be pernicious—the doctrine cannot with safety, be carried out in the practices and common walks of life. Its spirit is that of unmingled malignity, and is therefore at war with all the holier and better feelings of the human heart, and with the prayers of all saints and good beings on earth and in heaven.

D. S.

PERVERSION.

In the sermon delivered at the dedication of the Union meeting-house at Newville, while speaking of the character and perfections of the divine Being, we took occasion to quote the language of the apostle John, “God is love,” and then remarked that love, or benevolence was the nature and very essence of the Divinity—that all his other attributes were but modifications of the principle of divine love—that God was nowhere called in the Bible justice or truth, in the abstract, nor by the name of any other attribute he possessed: but he was emphatically and repeatedly called love. At the close of the meeting one of the congregation—an opposer of Universalism of course—remarked to a by-stander, though not in our presence, that it was no wonder the preacher denied the justice and truth of God, for he was obliged to do that to get along with his doctrine—that as he preached that God was a God of love, but not a God of justice, or truth, he might by that course make his doctrine appear very plausible!

That an illiterate, ignorant and superficial hearer, listening under the influence of deep rooted prejudice, should have so misapprehended or perverted our language as to put such a construction on it, was not very surprising; but we must confess that we were, beyond measure, surprised to learn, the week following, that the Rev. Mr. Swackhammer, the Lutheran clergyman who was present during the whole of the services, who made the concluding prayer after our sermon, and manifested, throughout, so much charity and brotherly love, so ardent a desire that every thing might be conducted in the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace—and who, by-the-by, stood in need of as much charity and indulgence in regard to any criticisms upon the composition of his own sermon as any clergyman we have lately heard—that this same Mr. Swackhammer, preached in that house on the Sabbath following, a most violent philippic, full of bitter invective against our dedication sermon, most grossly misrepresenting our language and arguments; and among other perversions, introduced and tried to maintain that very gross one which we have mentioned above, about the love, justice and truth of God! as though we had denied the two latter in order to maintain the former! We sincerely hope our information respecting the course he pursued may prove to be an exaggeration—or not in all respects correct. But if correct—and our informant is a respectable and candid man—Mr. S. cannot be guiltless in thus perverting and misrepresenting our sermon. It cannot with him be the sin of ignorance, as possibly it might have been in the individual who first perverted our language in the manner above mentioned. Or if it was the sin of ignorance in Mr. S., the Lord have mercy on that unfortunate people who sit under the ministry of such a pastor!

To us it appears absolutely impossible that any man of discernment, intelligence or even common sense, could have misunderstood that part of our discourse relating to the subject now noticed. For we distinctly argued the existence of all perfections in God—of every amiable and glorious attribute—showed the perfect harmony of all the divine attributes—that they were not arrayed in hostility against each other—that God was one, undivided and indivisible being, possessing infinite wisdom, almighty power, unbounded goodness, everlasting mercy, justice, truth and righteousness: but though possessed of all these attributes in infinity, he was not called by the name of any one of these principles in the abstract. But he was called by the name of love, which showed that the inspired writers delighted to contemplate him clothed in the beautiful and attractive garb of infinite affection—even the boundless and changeless love of an almighty Father. If Mr. S. wishes to attack this principle, let him attack it in an open, fair and manly manner—and let him attack those to their faces, too, who hold it; but let him not, behind a person's back, basely misrepresent his arguments and pervert his language, and trench himself behind the prejudices of the people, to bear him out in vilely caricaturing the truth. If Mr. S. is guilty of what we have been informed he is, we neither desire nor ask an apology from him personally; but we think the people have a right to demand an apology for the gross insult offered to their understanding. We shall, however, be very happy to learn from any respectable source, that he is not guilty of so ungentlemanly and unchristian conduct. D. S.

UNIVERSALISM TROUBLESOME.

So says a correspondent and subscriber. Nor does he merely say it, but he proves it. This is his statement. He lives in Lyons, in this State. His wife was a member of the Baptist church for many years. His neighbor was a subscriber to our paper. He, himself, loved to borrow and read the paper, believing in its general doctrines. Here are the characters of the drama. Now mark the judgment that fell on our correspondent for borrowing and reading our "wicked" paper.

His wife frequently begged of him to desist reading it—and earnestly prayed that, at least, he would not read it in her and her children's hearing. The first solicitation he disregarded, but complied with the second. After a time, he occasionally got her consent to read aloud some particular article in the paper. Then followed her request for him to read to her such particularly "good" articles as he might chance to find. At last she became a more constant reader of the paper, than even her husband, and was quite impatient for its arrival. Trouble—trouble followed. Her minister—her brethren and sisters called on her and warned her of her danger. Told her not to be led away by Universalists, the enemies of souls. But she would not draw back. She read the Scriptures, and compared their teachings with Calvinism on the one hand and Universalism on the other. The result must be known to all. She disavowed all belief in endless misery and sin. Oh, horrible, horrible doctrine! to believe God is good to all, and that all will eventually be made holy and happy!

She was cited to appear before the church. The day came. Attended by her husband, she appeared and declared her belief in all that was taught by the Scriptures, and handed them a written statement of her views. This statement was the Bible Creed, published in the first volume of this paper—also in Br. Skinner's Letters to Aikin and Lansing. It consists of not a word save quotations from the Bible. The preacher read it—folded it up—and declared that they could "not fellowship this, it is universal doctrine in full!" So she was cast out for believing in the exact words of God, and Jesus, and the apostles.

Having given this statement, our friend adds—"Now, Sirs, I am satisfied that I have troubled you as much as your paper has troubled me; and, if you please, we will call it even, as I like to settle up all accounts every new year." Agreed. I wish we could run up a similar account, to be settled as well as this one is, (for our friend pays in advance, also,) with every Universalist who has a Partialist wife, in the world. A. B. G.

ATHANASIAN CREED.

Some laughable anecdotes were revived in my mind on reading the strictures of Verax, in Episcopalianism, number 3, on this creed.

Its damnable expressions induced an eminent English divine of the established church, to read it as in duty bound, with manifest reluctance. He compromised with his conscience by prefacing its reading with—"Next in order follows the creed of St. Athanasius—thank God, it is not my creed, neither need it be yours!"

As Verax says, it is to be "either read or sung." One clergyman of the established church omitted doing either. His parishioners finding their entreaties to be of none effect on the parson, complained to the bishop, whose orders were issued accordingly. I suppose the church service seemed as dreary to the congregation, as Br. Crow says his sermons did to a lady in the West. She liked all the services very well, but said she, "How queer it sounds to hear a sermon without any hell in it!" Those accustomed to the high seasoning of St. Athanasius cannot relish any spiritual food without it. Hence, the disobedient clergyman was ordered to read the creed in due order. On the proper occasion for its introduction, having duly instructed his clerk before hand, he said, "next followeth the creed of St. Athanasius, which may be either read or sung, and by the blessing of God we will sing it. Clerk, mind your lits!" They then rattled it off to some jolly fox hunting tune, with great glee, to the scandal of the congregation—but as there was no remedy in this case, it is said the congregation never after insisted on having that saint's creed repeated in the services. A. B. G.

The memoir of the late Rev. J. Freeman, Skinner's Letters to Aikin and Lansing, the Prize Tales published in last volume of this paper, now in pamphlet form, and sundry other Universalist works, can be had at Buffalo, either of Br. B. Caryl, Br. R. Tomlinson, or at Mr. Russell's Book-store.

Br. T. J. Whitecomb, number 30, Ferry-street, Schenectady, keeps constantly on hand a general assortment of Universalist books.

PRIZE POEM.

Written for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

THE GOSPEL JUBILEE.

By Mrs. Z. PORTER, Henderson, N. Y.

Hark! hear the glad tramp of the Gospel resounding,
Throughout the broad realms of humanity's sphere;
Redemption, salvation and free grace abounding—
Intelligent beings, awake and give ear!
The heralds, those servants of God, are inviting
The guests to the feast which is ready and free;
Beauteous their feet on the mount, and delighting
The tidings they bring of the great Jubilee.

Ho! all ye who hunger and thirst after righteousness—
Ye who are weary with sorrow and care—
Come to this mountain, the refuge of blessedness,
Spread is the feast, and the Master is there.
Here's wine on the lees, and fat things full of marrow,
No price is demanded, the fare is all free;
Come, shout hallelujah, for banished is sorrow;
We'll joy in our rest, 'tis the blessed Jubilee.

The children redeemed with songs are returning,
As doves to their windows, they're journeying home;
They've beauty for ashes, and joy for their mourning;
The spirit hath spoken, the bride hath said, Come.
Oh, come to mount Zion! oh, come without bidding!
With praise and thanksgiving, come, bow the glad knee;
The voice is to all, there's no fear of intruding;
Then haste, all as one, to the grand Jubilee.

Here's glory immortal and life everlasting,
No ills to afflict, and no fears to annoy;
Infinite love you'll forever be tasting,
While praising and singing with hearts full of joy.
The soft hand of love shall wipe tears from all faces,
All sorrow and sighing forever shall flee;
Transgression be finished, and sin leave no traces,
For holiness reigns in the blessed Jubilee.

And here, in this mountain, our God will demolish
The veil that hath blinded the nations so long;
The face of the covering, that curse he'll abolish;
He's faithful who's promised, he's mighty and strong.
Oh, come and refresh in salvation's pure river!
Here's grace for mankind, an unlimited sea:
Love, glory and honor, ascribe to the Giver,
And strike the loved notes of a blessed Jubilee!

The rebuke of his house he will take off forever,
Accomplish the vict'ry o'er death and the grave;
And he who controlled them shall rule no more ever;
Then trust him—oh, trust him who's promised to save!
Shout, shout, O ye heavens! break forth into singing,
Ye mountains, and forests, and every tree!
The day from on high in its glory is springing,
And ushering in peace and a rich Jubilee.

All wisdom, and blessing, and might, and dominion,
Be unto the Lamb, and Jehovah the Lord!
A ransomed world shall unite in communion,
Forever and ever rejoice in his word!
The uttermost parts of the earth shall adore him,
They'll glorify him in the isles of the sea:
All nations shall come and shall bow down before him,
All holy and blessed, through a vast Jubilee!

ETERNITY.

The following view of eternity is from the eloquent Saurin, in an attempt to describe the process of his mind, in endeavoring to form an idea of its duration:

"I avail myself" says he, "of whatever I can conceive most long and durable. I heap imagination on imagination, conjecture on conjecture. First, I consider those long lives, which all wish, and few obtain. I observe those old men, who live for four or five generations, and who alone make the history of an age: I do more; I turn to ancient chronicles, I go back to the patriarchal age, and consider life as extending through a thousand years; and I say to myself, all this is not eternity—all this is but a point compared with eternity. Having represented to myself real objects, I form ideas of imaginary ones. I go from our age to the time of publishing the Gospel, from thence to the publication of the law—from the law to the flood—from the flood to the creation—I join this epoch to the present time, and imagine Adam still living. Had Adam lived till now, had he lived in misery, had he passed all his time in fire on a rack, what idea must we form of his condition? At what price would we agree to expose ourselves to misery so great? What imperial glory would appear glorious were it to be followed by so much woe? Yet this is not eternity, all this is nothing compared with eternity! I go farther still. I proceed from imagination to imagination—from one supposition to another. I take the greatest number of years that can be imagined. I form of all these one fixed number, and stay my imagination. After this, I suppose God to create a world like this which we inhabit; I suppose him creating it by forming one atom after another, and employing in the production of each atom the time fixed in my calculation just now mentioned. What numberless ages would the creation of such a world, in such a manner, require? Then, I suppose the Creator to arrange these atoms, and to pursue the same plan in arranging them as in creating them. What numberless ages would such an arrangement require! Finally, I suppose him to dissolve and annihilate the whole, and observe the same method in this desolation, as he observed in the creation and disposition of the whole. What an immense duration would be consumed. Yet this is not eternity! All this is but a speck compared to eternity!"

The only comment we have to offer upon this picture, is to ask the reader to pause and reflect how short is human life. The breadth of a single hair compared with the distance from earth to the fixed stars, is broader than the ocean, when seen in connexion with that vast disparity which obtains between life and eternity. Human life, what is it compared with eternity? It is less than the width of a razor's edge in comparison of the immeasurable regions of space that stretch as far beyond the orbit of the Georgium Sidus, as from the sun to the resting place of its remotest ray. It is impossible then, that a God of infinite wisdom could suspend the immortal interests of eternity on such a brittle thread! Nay, it is not. The perilous bridge of Mahomed is safe when compared with such a course. One question more and we have done. Is it possible, that man, for what he could do in this speck of life, should justly deserve suffering through all these wasteless periods, and even then have just as long to suffer as if he had not begun? It cannot be—mercy forbids—justice forbids—and even cruelty itself, though it were dark as Erebus, would relent ere these ages should have passed, and pluck the victim from the prison of torment. Avaunt, thee! fell devil! and cease thy impious railings. Close thy fiendish lips, and no more blaspheme the name of God, by breathing out lies and slanders concerning his mercy or justice! The man who believes thy perjured lies may well say as did our author, mentioned above:—"I find in the thought, a mortal poison that diffuses itself through every period of my life, rendering food insipid, pleasure disgusting, and life itself a cruel bitter. I cease to wonder that the fear of hell hath made some mad and others melancholy."

CHINESE INHABITANTS OF BOATS.

The river opposite to the town (Canton) is almost covered with boats of various sizes and descriptions, in the principal part of which the owners, who are of the poorer class, reside. Thousands are born, brought up and die in these boats, having no more communication with the shore than necessity compels. These boats are covered over in the after part with a kind of bamboo matting, sufficiently strong and water proof to keep out the rain, and of length sufficient to allow them to lie down unexposed to sight. These poor creatures, from being confined in so small a place—accustomed to squat upon their hams and crawl about the boat—are generally very awkward in their motions when on their feet. Their male children are taught the art of swimming as soon as they know the use of their legs, until which time they wear a calabash suspended round their necks, to buoy them up in case of their falling overboard.—MS Account of the Chinese.

CHINESE WOMEN.

Corpulency is deemed a beauty in men, but a blemish in women. The women have usually a peculiarly arched eye-brow, as much the effect of art as nature—a very unmeaning face, and among the higher classes, exceedingly small feet, from the tight pressure, during infancy and childhood of small wooden shoes. This custom originated (as described in Chinese history) several centuries back, when a large body of females rose against, and endeavored to overthrow the government. To prevent the recurrence of such an event, the use of wooden shoes was enforced on all female infants, so small as to disable them, without great pain to make any use of their feet. This custom has now become so familiar from long usage, that a small foot is reckoned one of the greatest attractions a Chinese female can possess.—Id.

MARRIAGES.

In Wolcott, December 21, 1835, by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. GILBERT P. DENNISON, of Palmyra, to Miss ELIZABETH E. ANDREWS, of Sedus.

In Hannibal, December 20, by the same, Mr. GILES BARRASS, to Miss PHOEBE WINCHELL, both of that town.

In Butler, January 28, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. ALGERNON S. MUNSEL, to Miss MARY ANN MERRELL, both of that town.

In Clinton, January 30, by W. H. Hubbard, Esq., Mr. HORACE PECK, of Clarendon, Orleans county, to Mrs.

ADELINE WOOD, daughter of Inos Nichols, Esq., of the former place.

In New-Berlin, December 21, by Rev. Walter Bullard, Mr. VARNUM C. JAMES, to Miss RHODA BATES, all of that place.

In this city on the 3d inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. HARRISON HOLDRIDGE, to Miss OLIVE MUNCY, both of Schuyler.

In Butternuts, Otsego county, on the 4th inst., by Rev. Mr. Wheeler, Mr. NATHANIEL STEVENSON, of Hobart, Delaware county, to Miss ESTHER HOLCOMB, of the former place.

In Tecumseh, M. T., January 1st, 1836, by Rev. J. Lockwood, Mr. ELKANAH PARKER, to Mrs. RUTH HODGE.

DEATHS.

In Westmoreland, January 23, of a cancer in the breast, Mrs. ELIZABETH ALLEN, consort of Mr. J. P. Allen. Mrs. A. had never attached herself to any society of Christians, but she was a woman of piety and devotion, and so lived that she was beloved and esteemed by all who knew her. While many around her were making long and loud harangues and empty professions of Christianity, she, by her kindness and hospitality to the sick, benevolence to the poor, and readiness to relieve the distressed, enjoyed all that satisfaction which flows from a life of virtue and beneficence.

Formerly her prejudices were very strong against Universalism—but they never controlled, but were always controlled by, a superior goodness of heart, of which she was naturally possessed. Being of an amiable disposition and an affable turn of mind, she would converse on the subject in a calm and dispassionate manner with her husband and others—this, together with the intense, and almost unremitted sufferings which she had been compelled to endure for some months, together with the happy effects of Universalism, witnessed in her family, at last brought her to a knowledge of its heavenly truths, as the only doctrine that honored God and happyfied man. Here, then, we have an instance of one, who instead of renouncing Universalism in her last sickness, was brought to rejoice in its truths and enjoy its sweet and reconciling influence to the will of God, in sickness, and most of all, in the hour of death. May her virtues in life—her patience in sickness, and her resignation, tend more and more to convince her family and friends of the necessity of becoming and remaining acquainted with God as their Father—for thereby good shall come unto them, and peace and happiness remain with them. D. B.

In Potsdam, St. Lawrence county, on the 16th of October last, Mr. JONATHAN B. PIERCE, aged 29, in the full belief of the final holiness and happiness of a universe. Br. P. formerly resided in this place, and while here, formed the resolution of entering the ministry of reconciliation, but a long continued course of ill health which succeeded, finally caused him to abandon the project. He was a sound and powerful reasoner—a bold, manly, consistent and able advocate of God's unchanging and boundless love—a kind and tender husband, a firm friend, a zealous Christian and an honest man. G. C.

Blissfield, M. T., January 12, 1836.

In Remsen, Oneida county, on January 17, Mrs. SARAH RAWSON, aged 63 years. Though a member of no religious society, she lived and acted in the full belief of the life-giving principles of the Gospel, and died deeply lamented by all who knew her.

In Williamsville, Erie county, on the 3d ult., Mr. OZIEL SMITH, aged 51 years. Mr. Smith was an early resident of that county, and much esteemed by all who knew him. On the Tuesday after his death, his remains were committed to the silent tomb in the presence of a large concourse of people, to whom were set forth the consolations of the Gospel.

UNIVERSALISM, A SYSTEM OF PERFECT MORALITY.

By Rev. W. E. MANLEY, of Clinton.

In looking around upon the world, we discover a great variety of religious sentiments, and an equal variety of arguments brought forward to sustain them. Among the arguments adduced to prove the most popular systems of religious faith that obtain in community, at the present day, there is one common to them all. This is, their beneficial moral tendency. Every sect claims for its doctrines the best moral influence of any in existence, and attempts to maintain them on this ground.—From this circumstance, the argument here named, possesses a claim to the earliest attention of every inquirer after truth. The following remarks on this subject, are submitted to the perusal, the charity, and the judgment of the reader.

The following inquiries will engage our particular attention:—

I. What motive, or principle of action, will naturally induce the best moral conduct?

II. What religious opinions are best adapted to inspire such motive?

Having obtained a satisfactory answer to these inquiries, we shall briefly delineate the character of the man who lives up to the religious opinions we are to name, and is duly influenced by the motive they are calculated to inspire.

I. We are to inquire, What motive, or principle of action, will naturally induce the best moral conduct?

The Scriptures will answer this inquiry to the satisfaction, both of the Christian and the philosopher. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Matt. xxii: 37-40. Supreme love to God and impartial love to mankind, are here made the basis of all genuine obedience to the divine law. They are regarded as the source whence all true morality naturally and necessarily flows. The doctrine here advanced, recommends itself, not only to the heart of every Christian, but to the reason of every enlightened infidel.

It has been contended by some philosophers, that selfishness is the most powerful motive that can actuate the human mind.

This may be so; but if this motive is the most powerful, it is not the most beneficial; for it must be evident that the selfish man will go but a little way towards attaining a standard of perfect moral obedience. The shortsightedness of man is seldom able to discover the intimate connexion, which the Creator has established between one's own happiness, and that of those around him; and hence, the man who is influenced by a motive of exclusive selfishness, to secure the former, will often perform actions inconsistent with the latter. Nor will it do to say, that the laws of civil society will prevent this infringement upon each other's rights; for these laws are very imperfect, and frequently fail to protect the rights of all on whom they are imposed. That law which God has written upon every heart, and which is more general in its application, and more minute in its discriminations, than any human law can be, must supply this defect. This law condemns the exclusive and selfish spirit.

From these remarks it must not be inferred, that self-love is to be excluded from the minds of men, in order that they become moral or good. Self-love is natural to man; and it is right and useful that it should be exercised; but it should not be allowed to predominate over that which we are required to exercise towards our neighbor. The command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," implies the existence of self-love, and virtually enjoins its exercise. Respecting the extent to which it may be exercised, it may be safely said, that there is no danger of exercising it too much, provided we observe the injunction, to exercise equal love to those around us. If any one wishes to know how broad in extent his neighborly love is to be, he can consult the language of our Saviour, in reference to the man who fell among thieves, while on his way from Jerusalem to Jericho. Our Saviour's narrative, relating to the case of this unfortunate man, teaches us that the love which we are to exercise towards our neighbor, is to enlarge and expand, without restraint, till it has embraced in its wide and ample range, all our brethren of the human family.

II. What religious opinions are best adapted to produce supreme love to God, and impartial and universal love among mankind?

There are two particulars embraced in this question, which, for the sake of order, we will notice separately.

1. Supreme love to God. What religious belief will induce supreme love to God? In answering this question, I apprehend there can be no difference of opinion. To love God, we must believe that he is good—that he desires the happiness of his creatures. To love God supremely, we must believe that he is infinitely good—that he desires our greatest happiness.

A desire for the happiness of his creatures, is what mankind universally regard as constituting the goodness of God. This arises from the fact, that all mankind, naturally, in a greater or lesser degree, possess both love to themselves, and love to each other; leading them to desire their own happiness, severally, and their mutual happiness.

The law of God was not given to create the principle of love in the human heart, but to regulate it and direct it to proper objects.

So generally is this principle exercised in a certain degree, and so generally are mankind impressed with the sense that it is right and proper that they should exercise it, that they have set up their happiness, as it were by general consent, as the laudable and proper object of universal pursuit. The conformity of any being to this object is regarded, by all enlightened nations, as the legitimate criterion of its moral excellence; and our love and regard is tendered to it accordingly. In other words, we love a being in proportion to its supposed disposition to promote our happiness.—The correctness of these remarks I presume will not be called in question; and being correct, they evince the truth of the proposition that, to love God supremely, we must believe that he desires the greatest happiness of his creatures.

We will here speak of the justice of God. We speak of it in connexion with goodness, because we believe it to be but a modification of the same principle.

Rewards and punishments, administered by the hand of divine Justice, and to which that attribute is appropriately applied, are dictated by goodness, and made an efficient means of promoting the happiness of God's moral subjects. Goodness and justice in God, are such attributes as take the name of goodness and justice among men. They exist together, and act in perfect harmony. We cannot believe a being to be good, without believing him to be just. In common conversation, no one sees any impropriety in the statement, that a certain man is good and just; but in the statement that a man is good but not just, or just but not good, the impropriety is obvious to every one.

The necessity of believing that these attributes, when ascribed to God, exist and act in harmony—not only to avoid the absurdity of supposing that he is divided against himself, but also to inspire in the heart that love which the divine law requires—will be evident by a moment's reflection.

If we address to a fellow-man, the doctrine that God is infinitely good—that our existence, with all the faculties which we possess, both mental and physical; together with all the temporal and spiritual blessings which are dispensed to us with unsparing liberality; come from Him, we present him with a doctrine that, by its powerful energies, is at once calculated to call forth the warmest affections of his soul toward the Author of his being and the bountiful Giver of the blessings he enjoys. But if, in addition to this, we say to him that, in connexion with goodness, the Deity possesses a justice, in the exercise of which, in case we disobey, he will inflict upon us, or upon an innocent substitute, an amount of misery at which mercy recoils, we at once check the warm glow of love and gratitude that was rising from his heart, and materially weaken, if not wholly destroy, all love for the divine Being. It is necessary, therefore, that we believe, with the apostle, that the stripes inflicted by justice are dictated by goodness, and designed for our profit. This belief gives to the love produced by a consideration of the goodness of God, its full strength and power.

But while we make justice a modification of goodness, and limit its demands within the bounds which goodness prescribes, we by no means nullify these demands. They are allowed to remain in full force. The chastisements which justice requires, are regarded as certain and unavoidable, and the rewards it bestows, tendered with equal faithfulness.

This doctrine appeals to the self-love common to man, while that of the unlimited goodness of God, appeals to the native benevolence of the human mind. And as self-love is but a modification of that principle of universal and impartial love which we are required to exercise towards all mankind, embracing one's self among the rest; so is justice but a modification of that principle of infinite benevolence in the Deity, which extends its friendly embrace to all mankind. Thus the adaptation of the goodness and justice of God, as we have defined those attributes, to the moral nature of man, is made evident to the most superficial observer. This adaptation is destroyed, if we take any other view of the subject, but the one we have advanced.

2. Impartial and universal love to mankind.—That mankind naturally possess a degree of love towards each other, has before been stated, and is made obvious by the most superficial observation of human nature. But this love is not properly proportioned. We do not love our neighbor as ourselves. This we ought to do, as will be manifest after we have stated the religious opinion which we regard as necessary to induce this love.

We say, then, that to love our neighbor, we must believe that he is good. And to love him as ourselves, we must believe him to be as good as ourselves. It may be supposed, that this opinion destroys all distinction between the moral characters of men. Be it so. We can take no other view of the subject. No belief can produce brotherly love among men, that does not recognize them as brethren. This statement is so evident, that I can admit no sentiment inconsistent with it.

But a little reflection will convince any one, that the distinction alluded to is not destroyed by the view we take of the subject. There is a palpable difference between the natures of men, and characters of men: and while we would level all distinctions relating to the former, those that relate to the latter should be allowed to remain as broad as the difference in human actions requires. We are to love mankind for what they are, and not for what they do—for the excellency of their natures, and not for the morality of their characters. And as we are all members of a common family, embraced in the paternity of a common Father, we should “love as brethren,” notwithstanding the difference in our moral characters.

As truth always appears more lovely and beautiful when contrasted with error, let us suppose a case, numerous examples of which are found among men. An individual looks upon his neighbor as totally corrupt—possessing a nature that altogether indisposes him to think a good thought, speak a good word, or perform a good act, and on the other hand inclining him to all evil, and that continually. Can this man love his neighbor? To suppose that he can, is to ascribe to him a degree of depravity, equal to that which he believes distinguishes his neighbor. He believes that, by the sovereign energies of God's spirit, he, himself, has been totally changed—his corrupt nature taken away, and one of purity substituted in its place; while his neighbor is still “in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity.” With this belief, can he love his neighbor as himself? The law of his nature forbids it.

Besides; admitting it possible for him to love his neighbor, under such circumstances, this love could be of no possible benefit. The opinion he entertains, takes away all motive for endeavoring to reform him, and furnishes him with the strongest motive to keep out of the reach of his power and influence. It were arrogance to think of purifying the corrupt fountain whence all this impurity flows, and folly to attempt the purification of the stream while the fountain remains corrupt.—Besides, to attempt this, would be at the greatest hazard, however pure our motive. To approach such a mass of impurity, would be extremely dangerous. To keep at the greatest distance from such a man, and act only a defensive part, is the dictate of wisdom.

The advantages arising from the religious opinions, which I have supposed necessary to inspire that love to God and man which the divine law requires, may be farther illustrated, by noticing some more of the traits of human nature.

We have said that man possesses self-love; and that the justice of God, presenting to him adequate rewards and punishments, appeals to this principle of his nature with the most beneficial effect. We have said, too, that man has, naturally, a principle of general benevolence implanted in his heart; and that the infinite goodness of the Deity, applying itself to this principle, calls forth love to Him: and that the doctrine of equality in the natural and intrinsic excellence of men, is calculated to equalize and regulate the native benevolence of the human mind.

We shall now proceed to show, that the views we have advanced have other important bearings; that they apply themselves to other traits in human nature, with a like beneficial effect.

Man is an imitative being. It is a common and true remark, that we are creatures of imitation. The child imitates his parent. The man imitates his fellow-man. And every man strives to imitate those whom he regards as his superiors. This principle of human nature also leads every believer in the existence of a God, to imitate the Divinity he worships.

This, too, may arise partly from that innate sense of right, which the Creator has enstamped upon every mind. Whatever the Deity does, we suppose must be right, though our judgment, free from the trammels of a creed, condemn it as wrong. The worshippers of Heathen divinities justify themselves in the indulgence of the basest passions, and the practice of the most revolting cruelty; because their mythology teaches them that their gods have set them the example.

The principle of imitation is one of the most excellent traits of human nature, but it needs to be regulated by knowledge. This principle is recognized by the apostle, when he says, “Be ye followers [imitators] of God, as dear children.” The God he adored was one that could be imitated with propriety. He was a God of boundless benevolence, and a standard of perfect purity. Even his chastisements were designed for the profit of his creatures, that they might be partakers of his holiness.

To believe in such a God—a God who cherishes infinite regard for the creatures he has formed, and is employing the wisest means for the promotion of their happiness, inspires in the mind of every reflecting man, a spirit of noble emulation; and calls forth his exertions to be like God—to love what He loves, and to seek the happiness of those whom He blesses. The impartial bestowment of the ordinary blessings of life upon the evil and the good, the just and the unjust; while it convinces him of the impartiality of God's love, proves to him also, that the only way to manifest the spirit of his God, is by complying with the injunction of our Saviour, “Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you. Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect.”

But it is in vain to call upon a man to exercise universal and impartial benevolence, as long as he believes that such a principle is not to be found among the attributes of the Deity. And to believe that God is, in the least degree, malignant—that any of his creatures are the objects of his wrath, is calculated to limit the exercise of benevolence in man—to foster a spirit of partiality and pride in those who regard themselves as the objects of his love; and a spirit of malignity and cruelty towards those whom they suppose to be the objects of his wrath.

I make this statement, because it seems to follow from the principle of imitation of which we are speaking, the existence of which none will question. But were I to appeal to the history of the religious world, we should there see this conclusion abundantly sustained. For it is not to be denied, that the moral and religious character of the different nations of the earth, has corresponded, in a great degree, with that of the different divinities worshipped.

The pre-eminence of Christianity over the religious systems of Paganism, consists in the superior excellency of the character which it ascribes to the Deity, and the superior morality and more expansive benevolence, it is thus calculated to produce among mankind.

Before I conclude my remarks on this part of our subject, I will name another characteristic of human nature, so analogous to the former, that it may be regarded as the result of the same principle.

It is assimilation. It is a fact, that our views, characters and feelings, correspond in general with those of the persons with whom we most associate; not only from the principle of voluntary imitation, but also from that of involuntary assimilation. It is because “like produces like,” whether it be at the dictation of the will, or in opposition to its dictates.

In connexion with this fact, it should be remembered, that while man is capable of exercising a spirit of kindness and general benevolence, he is also, by a perversion of his nature, capable of being partial, angry and revengeful. And these opposite feelings have their appropriate stimulus, by which they are called into exercise. A man accustomed to scenes of cruelty, will become more or less cruel, and vice versa. And so it is with every passion of his heart. These scenes may be real or imaginary. They may be acted out in real life, or presented to the mind by a religious creed. In either case, the result is similar.

We say, then, that a belief that exhibits before the mind a God of unlimited goodness—delighting in the happiness of his creatures, and guiding all the affairs of the universe to the accomplishment of their greatest good, presents the appropriate stimulus, to call forth the exercise of love and good will in the greatest perfection. The opposite belief is adapted to produce the opposite effect. And the feelings they respectively inspire, will increase in strength and intensity, according to the frequency with which they are exercised. In connexion with this remark, it will be recollected that a man's religious system is generally predominant in his mind. The fewer, therefore, the malignant spots on the picture which this system presents to his mental vision, the less familiar will he be with scenes of cruelty and revenge, and the more tender the feelings of his heart.

If these remarks be true, and we think they will not be called in question, it follows conclusively, that that system of religious faith has the best moral tendency, which ascribes to God no malignity, but infinite benevolence—to man, no natural deformity, but equal intrinsic excellence—to the divine administration, no positive evil, but the greatest possible good.

III. In describing the character of the man who should live up to this system of faith, the limits assigned me, require that I should be brief. A mere outline or synopsis, which the reader may enlarge and fill up at his leisure, is all that must be expected.

We may state in general terms, what has been implied in the remarks already made, that such a man, loving God supremely, will seek to perform his will, and loving his neighbor as himself, will strive to promote his greatest happiness.

His love to God, while it leads him to avoid all profanity and impiety, and to observe in all respects, the requirements of the divine law, (which he knows must be founded on a principle of love,) is manifested also in his submission to God's will, his patience under affliction, and his resignation in the hour of death.

His love to mankind will induce him to seek out every opportunity to do them good. In whatever condition he may be placed, or in whatever part of the world he may sojourn, he still finds himself under the watchful eye and guardian care of his sovereign Father, and surrounded by those to whom, though they may differ from him in complexion or character, he feels himself bound by the strong and indissoluble tie of brotherhood; and to whom he regards it his duty to tender the offices of kindness.

And whatever the relationship he sustains, he is careful to perform the duties thence arising. Is he a husband? Towards the companion of his bosom he cherishes a becoming regard, and unites his exertions with hers, to promote their mutual bliss. Is he a father? In imitation of his great Father in heaven, he exhibits before his children such conduct as is calculated to inspire them with a love of virtue; and adopts for their regulation, such rules as will best secure their obedience and happiness. He seldom resorts to chastisements; and when he does, it is only to effect their ultimate good. If he is exalted to places of honor and trust, and allowed to wield the sceptre of his country, he carries along with him the principles that regulated his conduct in the private walks of life. He raises his voice against every encroachment upon the liberties of the people, and proclaims aloud, in language that reaches every subject of his government, “ALL MEN ARE BORN FREE AND EQUAL.” The laws he is instrumental in making, are founded upon the divine law; and the penalties annexed, designed to “yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby.”

Were the religious system by which we have supposed this man to be exercised, universally to prevail, and to exert its legitimate influence upon the heart, it would unite mankind together as a band of brothers. It would make warm-hearted companions—exemplary parents—dutiful children—faithful rulers—obedient subjects, and a happy world.

FANCY.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

Some men dream, but it is generally a drowsy business. Some have visions, but they are generally visionary. I have taken the liberty to fancy a little, and if my ideas should be a little fanciful, I hope the reader will not blame me, though he may, if he please, blame my fancy.

I fancied that I renounced Universalism, and became a thorough-going Partialist preacher. I soon felt a very great anxiety for the salvation of "precious immortal souls." I saw myriads of them rushing to ruin, and felt that if something were not speedily done for them, they would FALL INTO THE HANDS OF GOD; and then I knew they would be beyond the reach of mercy! Reader, this was a surprising flight for my fancy; to suppose that precious immortal souls would be ruined eternally, and tormented without mercy, if they fall into the hands of their own most merciful Creator! So high a flight had nearly sprained her wings!

I fancied that I was greatly troubled with Universalism. It was ruining its tens of thousands. I sought for something to stay its progress and pestilential influence. I found a mighty weapon. Here it is:—"Universalism will do to live by, but will not do to die by." This I repeated loud and often; and I taught it to all my flock, and they repeated it after me just as a parrot repeats his phrases, because their teacher said so before them. However, it was very generally believed, and had a wonderful effect upon the weak and ignorant.

But I fancied that I was fairly brought to test its truth. A neighbor, to whom I had often repeated it in the most sanctimonious manner, was brought to the very gates of death. He had proved that the doctrine was good to live by; for human eyes could discover no spot upon his character. He sent for me. I hurried to his bedside. I found him in great mental agony. Pray, what can be the matter, said I. "Parson F.," he replied, "I am about to die, and I am confident I shall not be tormented a moment after I am dead." I tried to soothe him, by assuring him, that though he might not be tormented, it was likely many of his friends would be, and I entreated him to be calm. "No, no," he said, "there is no comfort for me; they will all be saved, every one of them." I begged him to be consoled, and as the last crumb of comfort to be had, I told him his enemies would all be eternally damned. "That will never do," he exclaimed, "they will all be eternally happy, as sure as God is good." Not another drop of comfort could I furnish my poor Universalist neighbor, and he died in despair! Thus proving, that "Universalism will not do to die by." I returned home, repeating all the way in my mind, "Universalism will do to live by, but will not do to die by." What an awful thing it is to think of—one cannot be eternally miserable himself, nor can he have the satisfaction of seeing any one else tormented without mercy and without end!

Reader, my fancy fled; and I soberly thought, that if I ever, in reality, became a Partialist, I would not be such a fool as to repeat that foolish old saying.

HYMN BOOK, EXTRAORDINARY.

Messrs. EDITORS—I delight to encourage all the great improvements, and to foster the genius of the master spirits, and to aid in supplying the wants of the refined and judicious, of our age and country. I was very much delighted to read, in your last paper, that Philo intended to combine all the excellent things of all our numerous and excellent hymn books into one most grand and excellent work. It is a design which will immortalize the age in which his mighty mind conceived it!

To encourage him to proceed in his most praiseworthy and arduous labors, I will show the necessity and demand for such a work. Br. Price, of the Union, says, that some Editor "down East" says, that their societies use four or five different kinds of hymn books. No doubt it is because those now in use are too deficient in taste, poetry and order to suit these learned and refined people—and are so high priced that these wealthy societies, even, cannot purchase them! Why, brethren, the society to which I belong, not many miles from your city, wealthy, numerous, learned and refined, (at least you would suppose we knew something, if you only saw how many institutions of learning we have around us!) are compelled to use Pickering's collection, as a "make-shift," all others being so deficient in poetic taste and talent, and so badly arranged, and withal so dear that we cannot afford to buy them. We could not procure Rely's, or we might have preferred it until we could get one to suit us—in fact, we had a difficulty in getting as many of Pickering's as we wanted; I believe our preacher had to send to Boston for some. Now our society is not alone in this business. Others, as learned, as wealthy, as refined and as numerous as ours, are compelled to use Ballou and Turner's, others Watts', others the Methodist collection, and so on—there being none other collection that will answer our purpose. How pleased, then, was I, to see Philo's proposals—for I knew that these several wealthy, refined, spirited and learned societies would take, in all, at least TWENTY copies! And, in fact, if his book carefully combines the spirit of Watts, and the arrangement of Belknap, etc.; and is very large and very good; (the poetry must be at least nearly equal to the ancient metrical version of Sternhold and Hopkins;) and is put very low by the dozen; I believe one society, alone, may start a subscription to buy a whole dozen, (which will accommodate their forty-three singers,) and probably the other three or four large societies I have named, may unite and take two whole dozens more!!!

Pray, Messrs. Editors, do communicate these very cheering facts to Philo, and assure him of my sanguine hope that this very extraordinary stretch of liberality and encouragement on the part of our most wealthy, numerous, learned and refined societies in Central New-York, will induce him to "go ahead" and make his fortune. 1. 3. 5.

INTEMPERANCE.

"It is related by an eminent author, in his travels, that in some places in Germany, they executed certain capital offenders in a very extraordinary manner. There was an engine shaped like a handsome lady, which the criminal saluted, and afterwards retired. He returns again to salute the fatal machine—the figure opens its hands, and cuts him through the heart." Thus it is with that "ugly hag," Intemperance. She, in order to decoy the unwary and inexperienced, decks herself in beautiful attire, and puts on the appearance of much "good humor;" and, alas! thousands become enamored, receive her embraces, and ere they are aware, are pierced to death. "Knowest thou not that the dead are there? that her guests are in the depths of hell?" "Who hath wo? who hath sorrow? who hath contention? who hath wounds without cause?" Ah! the intemperate. "They that tarry long at the wine, and go to seek mixed wine."

A BASE SLANDER.

The story in the fourth number, current volume, under this caption, concerning Rev. Hosea Ballou, is an improvement on an old one that has been in circulation for many years. The name used in the original was Mr. —, of —. This new edition reminds me of a conversation I held with a Baptist preacher, a few months since. His arguments against Universalism were summed up in the following argumentative story.

"Mr. Le Fevre, of Troy, went back into the country to preach. After closing his discourse, he notified his hearers, that he would call and preach with them again, were it agreeable to their wishes. No one making any reply, Mr. Le Fevre insisted on being informed whether his services would be wanted in future. An old gray-headed gentleman arose, and notified the preacher that if his doctrine were true, they did not need him; and if false, they did not want him." The gratification of the Rev. Baptist gentleman was somewhat diminished, on being told that his story was valuable only for its antiquity; and that the original one did not give the name and residence of the Universalist preacher, for the plain reason, that they were never known!

These kind of anecdotes are often related. Those who venture to improve them, by adding the name of a Universalist preacher, do not realize how easily falsehoods are detected. W.

CONVERSION IN THE MINISTRY.

Br. SKINNER—About seven years ago, I became intimately acquainted with a Christian preacher, with whom I spent many happy hours in conversation on the doctrines of the Gospel. After he moved from this place, we conversed by letter. In his two last letters he informs me that he now believes in a universal salvation, and is striving, as much as in him lies, for the spread of the pure Gospel, spoken by all God's holy prophets, and delivered to the saints. He was once a Methodist preacher. His name is REUBEN FARLEY—his postoffice is Greenwich, Huron county, Ohio. It is a new country, (not so new, though, but that the enemy, Partialism, is there already,) and he desires the Magazine and Advocate. J. S.

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

The following important question is taken from the "Christian Spectator," an Orthodox periodical, published "down East." W. R.

"God has power to make all men holy and happy; and we know from the Bible, that he is a perfectly benevolent being, and willeth not the death of the sinner. Why, then, is it not fairly presumable, that, though he may for a while suffer sin to exist, he will finally make all men holy and happy; and fill the universe with perfect and boundless blessedness? This seems desirable; and if God can do it, and still leave his creatures free and accountable, and can do it in such a way as to make himself loved and honored by it, on the part of all his creatures, throughout eternity; why is there not reason to think he will do it—and reason, therefore, for explaining the Bible accordingly?"

INFLUENCE OF PREJUDICE.

To show how far prejudice will influence the mind; let me relate an anecdote; which has at least one recommendation—it is true. Some few years since, an individual died in the county of Orleans; and, for want of a more convenient place, the funeral was attended in the upper room of a dwelling house. It was known that a Universalist clergyman had been selected for the occasion, and at an early hour the room was filled to overflowing. Among those who came late, and were compelled to stay below, where they could hear, but not see, was a deacon of the Baptist church. He came in after the services had commenced—took his stand at the stairway—listened for a time to the prayer, and with evident signs of dissatisfaction, left the room. At the outer door, an individual addressed him:—"Deacon, what is the matter? How did you like the prayer?"—"Matter!" said he, "matter enough—prayer! did you call that prayer? It was abominable! blasphemous! such a man should be silenced by law!" Poor, prejudiced man! His own minister was praying—he had heard him a hundred times—but prejudice had sealed his ears and locked up his understanding!

The Universalist clergyman had seen and knew the Baptist preacher, and invited him to make the prayer, which he did—and the poor deacon, when informed of the fact, was mute with mortification and astonishment. K. T.

WHAT IS MAN?.....No. III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

In this concluding article, I would call the attention of the reader to some additional influences, which should be made to accrue from a realization of the ennobling faculties that God has bestowed upon us.

In the first place, it should cause us properly to exercise our mental powers upon every consistent subject. The mental faculties rank among the highest of the gifts of a beneficent Providence. Of all other qualifications, these the most eminently exalt us above the animal creation. The brute cannot reason—he has no judgment to decide—he is unable to compare statements and draw conclusions. Instinct and fear are his only guiding powers. Now it is highly important that men should never overlook the above distinction between the two grades of being—animal and intellectual—and that, in deciding upon subjects of importance, they should not disregard their own high powers and adopt the low standard of the brute. When a matter of a nature purely speculative, is brought to our notice, shall we decide upon its reception or rejection by the influence of fear, rather than that of reason? If so, for what purpose, pray, were our mental powers bestowed upon us? In what respect are our condition and enjoyments better than the beasts? or why are we any more likely to arrive at truth than they? The exercise of the mental powers upon every important topic, is man's proud prerogative by the gift of God; and no considerations should induce us to forego this invaluable privilege. Reason is the bright polar star which leads to the abode of truth. Strike that star from the radiant galaxy of man's loftiest capabilities, and he becomes involved in the murky gloom of midnight—a wretched wanderer amid the darkness of ignorance and moral death! It is, therefore, clear as sunlight, that the individual who permits fear to usurp the throne of reason, and compels the sceptre to pass from the sway of judgment to the trembling hand of apprehension, abuses the highest gifts of his Maker, degrades himself and his race, and becomes a pliant tool for the service of every deceiving and crafty demagogue.

"Are there (still more amazing!) who resist
The rising thought? who smother, in its birth,
The glorious truth? who struggle to be brutes?
Who through this bosom-barrier burst their way,
And, with reversed ambition, strive to sink?
Who labor downwards through th' opposing powers
Of instinct, reason and the world against them,
To dismal hopes, and shelter in the shock
Of endless night? night darker than the grave's!"

And what shall we say of those systems of religion, which would induce us thus to abase reason and judgment?—those systems which, instead of inviting us to confide in the elevated powers which Deity has mercifully bestowed upon us, would induce us to distrust them as false sentinels, ready to lead us to destruction?—those systems which, to accomplish their purposes, unhesitatingly and incessantly appeal to the most low and servile passions of the body—which call upon us to trample under foot our heaven-born intellect, and bow the bright image of God within us, before the dark demon of fear? Reader, what shall we say of these systems? We will justly execrate them as the debasing enemies of man, and the despoilers of earthly enjoyment; but, at the same time, cheerfully will we cast the broad mantle of charity over the failings of those who have been their deceived victims.

From the brief remarks we have made upon the constitution and powers of human nature, it becomes evidently our duty and interest to improve the advantages God has imparted to us. As every true enjoyment, proper to us as rational beings, must be received through the faculties of the mind, how highly important is it that we duly cultivate and enlarge these moral and intellectual powers! They are fountains of enjoyment; and if we permit them not to be choked by the rubbish of passion and ignorance, they will become pure, perenniel springs, pouring streams of happiness into the soul. Let them, then, be looked to properly—let them be improved to the extent of our opportunity and time. We should call to our assistance the history of nations and the history of mind—the lights of science and art—the teachings of nature's laws, and the voice of inspiration. In a well cultivated intellect we have a treasure far more to be prized than the gold of Ophir or Golconda's glittering gems. In this enlightened age, and in this land of books, all possess the means for the acquisition of an amount of knowledge which will surpass value. At least there is one book open for the perusal of all, and the teachings of which all can understand—it is the Book of Nature. Behold its fair and ample pages spread out for our instruction and delight. Release the mind from low and base desires—cast off every restraining fetter of passion—and let it go out to a survey of creation's beauties—let it soar aloft in its native elasticity and strength. Ten thousand wonders in nature's fabric, invite our research, and are ready to bless us with invaluable information. The earth and its surrounding elements, and the laws which pertain to them, are unending fields of investigation, in which the intellect can stray and feast upon the amazing perfection, the nice adaptation of causes to the designed ends, which every where meets the view. The starry firmament with its unnumbered hosts of glowing orbs, nightly calls upon man to permit his thoughts to arise to their contemplation. Give them wings, and they will soar through yon trackless ether, and drink in knowledge from the very Fount of Wisdom—they will arise "from nature to nature's God," and with a fulness of joy will acknowledge and bow in reverence, before the Great and Good—the First Cause—the eternal I AM!

ADVANTAGES OF WRITING.

"We doubt whether a man ever brings his faculties to bear with their whole force on a subject, until he writes upon it for the instruction or gratification of others. To place it clearly before others, he feels the necessity of viewing it more vividly himself. By attempting to raise his thoughts, and fix them in an enduring form, he finds them vague and unsatisfactory, to a degree which he did not suspect, and toils for a precision and harmony of views, of which he never before felt the need."

Channing.

In my introductory remarks, inserted in a former number, I endeavored to show the folly of procrastination. I spoke freely of the various excuses offered for inaction. To show my sincerity, I have resolved to begin at the right place—at home. I discover that I have suffered many days and hours to pass, that might have been usefully employed. It is idle to expect to correct the faults of others, while we are guilty ourselves.

But where shall I begin? I will endeavor to supply the wants of others, and promote my own intellectual and moral wants at the same time. This I can accomplish by assisting my brethren engaged in the publication of periodicals. It seems not to be generally realized, if understood, that virtue brings a greater good to the individual than to any other person in the world. So with vice, in a contrary way. It injures the guilty more than it does society: inasmuch as the loss of character is by far the greatest loss any one can meet with. But I am moralizing, where I did not at first intend it. My great object was to show the immense advantages of writing, and to that end, I have selected a motto from one of the ablest divines of our day.

1. By communicating our thoughts through the press, we may do much towards the advancement of our cause. New truths may be presented, or those more common, placed in a new light. The morality of Universalism may be shown: its influence, as felt by experience, and seen by observation. Our periodicals may, by the contributions of talented writers, take a more elevated stand than they have ever yet done. In point of intellect, we are behind no denomination in Christendom. Let each one, then, let his light shine before men, that they, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father who is in heaven.

2. For the encouragement of all, it should be borne in mind, that individual interest is promoted by every attempt to communicate thoughts in a written form. The mind becomes enlarged; and bright and glowing thoughts present themselves. The mind becomes systematic. Its energies are more fully developed. Ideas, which had darted as meteors, are arrested, and gradually shine with a sunlike splendor. The intellect gathers new strength: it finds new modes of expression. It becomes more and more fitted for action. Thus, the individual advances his highest interests, and promotes the happiness of society.

Such are a few of the advantages of writing. More might be presented, but this number has now reached its assigned limits.

CORRECT VIEWS CONCERNING GOD.

BY REV. R. TOMLINSON.

There is nothing, perhaps, pertaining to Christian duty, more important than that we form correct opinions concerning its Author; for if the religion of an individual has any influence over him, it will be in exact accordance with his views concerning God's character. "If men have gross and false conceptions of God, their religion will be absurd and superstitious. If men fancy God to be a revengeful being, armed with infinite power, who takes delight in the misery and crime of his creatures, and is ready to take all advantages against them; they may fear him, but they will also hate him,—and they will most likely be such toward one another, as they suppose God is toward them; for all religion doth naturally incline men to imitate him whom they worship." These remarks are proved true in the history of the Pharisees of our Saviour's time; and are no less verified in the experience of many of our own day. Supposing God to be partial, they are partial—supposing him to be revengeful, they are so—thinking that he hath prepared a portion of the human family for misery, they make the selection and doom them to the torture.

These things ought not so to be; therefore, reader, think worthily of God and his character, and "be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect." Love the world for God hath loved it. Do good to men, for he hath done the same. Thus will you evince that your conceptions of God are correct, and you will find the attendant blessing.

BRIEF DIALOGUE.

TWO CHANCES TO ONE.

Limitarian. I advise you as a friend, Mr. Universalist, to renounce your system of faith, and embrace ours: for you must acknowledge that we (Limitarians) stand two chances to your one for salvation.

Universalist. I must confess my head is too weak to discover wherein it would be good policy for me to renounce a system of faith, which is in accordance with the most fervent desires of my heart, and which I sincerely believe to be true; and embrace one which is revolting to every feeling of humanity, and which I really believe to be false; unless it were, to render myself more popular in the eyes of the world; and really, I should consider that but a poor compensation for becoming a voluntary slave to the whims of popular prejudices, by leaving my Father's house where there is bread enough and to spare, and feeding on the husks of Partialism and hypocrisy. Neither am I disposed to admit that your system affords any better chance, or any more chances for salvation, than ours—

L. Don't be too hasty, friend, I think I can convince you that we really stand the best chance for salvation; and if so, you ought certainly to adopt the most prudent course. The argument which I deem conclusive proof of this, I will illustrate by a figure. We will suppose, on a certain stream of water, there are two dams, and will imagine a person floating down the river on some kind of vessel that threatened to try their strength; he would certainly stand a better chance of being rescued by starting above both dams, than depending alone on the lower one. Just so with the two systems of faith. The upper dam we will denominate the Unitarian, and the lower one the Universalist dam. The sinner is hastening down the current of time, loaded with his own and Adam's sins.—Our dam may possibly save him; but if it does give way, he is just as safe as before; for yours is still below, and as that catches every thing, he would still be saved, unless that also should fail; in which case there would be no other hope; he must inevitably be swept down the current of time into the awful gulf of unending woe. Thus you see how much more prudent it would be to first try the efficacy of our system, than to place your whole dependence on your own.

U. I have heard the same argument, illustrated by the same figure, before.

L. Well, what do you think of it?

U. What do I think of it! Why I think it is a fair representation of your faith, or rather want of faith. It shows that you have not confidence enough in the promises of Jehovah to risk your final destiny in his hands; and would fain establish some temporary system of your own; or, in other words, build a dam of your own (taking good care to get above the Universalist's dam); thus, for fear of not gaining admittance, by the door, into the sheepfold, you would seek to climb up some other way. Indeed, I have long suspected that you placed much more confidence in the unlimited promises of Jehovah, than in your own man-made creed; yet, being a little doubtful, you thought it prudent to hold on to the latter. But, allow me to tell you plainly, that you must pursue some different course to persuade a Universalist, who understandingly and heartily believes the doctrine he professes, to renounce his faith. His trust is in "the living God, who is the Saviour of all men." To that God, and to him alone, he looks and trusts for salvation; and all these measures of expediency, held out to destroy his hope or weaken his faith, pass by him like the idle wind. He knows in whom he trusts; and all the sophistry that a combined priesthood can invent, will not shake him. Therefore, if you wish to destroy the faith of a Universalist, you must either convince him that the Bible is a mere fabrication, or, that God was not in earnest when he made the promises on which he founds his hope.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Br. GROSH—In looking over the 37th number of the sixth volume of the Magazine and Advocate, I find in an article headed, "Quincy, Mass.," in reference to the conduct of a certain divine, over your signature, the following laconic remarks:—"The Rev. gentleman (!) may as well pack his trunk, take a seat in the stage, and be off to the valley of the Mississippi." Now, Br. Grosh, what in the world have we done, that you wish to send to our delightful, though much abused valley, more of those missionary characters, who being rejected, and of no more use in their begging institutions at home, are sent among us, the more effectually to carry on their nefarious plans! For in all probability, his friends would have taken the hint quite soon enough, without your assistance, and the valley has been a depository for such missionary characters quite too long. Its industrious, and no less intelligent inhabitants, begin duly to appreciate their conduct, and they possess moral courage sufficient, not only to think but to act for themselves.

Henderson, Ill., December 20, 1835.

A. R. G.

I cry you mercy, Br. Gardner—but, really, it was not in wrath at your valley, but in pity to the pitiful retailer of pitiful falsehoods that I gave that pitiful advice—for I well knew (but did not just happen to think of it—being a dutchman, and therefore possessed of more "hind-thought" than forethought) that your western folks are generally more independent than our long-settled people here: and therefore not very likely long and quietly to suffer such a worker of iniquity among them. PRESBYTERIAN VICTORY.

Br. GROSH—During my stay in Remsen, while journeying North, I had the pleasure of delivering three discourses to good congregations, who listened with lively interest to the word spoken. Our meeting was attended throughout the day, by HUGH PRICE, a Presbyterian clergyman, who has been convicted of forgery and seduction. For the first named offence, he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment, but after suffering one year at Auburn, he was pardoned by the Governor. At the close of the afternoon sermon, Mr. Price arose and expressed a desire to enter into a controversy with me, on the difference between us in religious faith. Having been apprised of his character, I paid no attention to his remarks, but proceeded to close the meeting in the ordinary manner.

At the close of the evening lecture, I observed that I was willing to engage in a discussion with any clergyman of the place, who bore a respectable character; and that I should prefer the following day for the debate, if any was held, as the evening was already considerably advanced. Mr. Price arose again, and remarked, in substance, "I do not know whether the gentleman considers me a respectable opponent, but if he does, I should be pleased to meet him in debate." I then repeated that I would engage with no person except one of good standing, and immediately closed the meeting. At this, Mr. Price requested the privilege of making a reply to my discourse. I observed that he might reply, if the people were willing to hear him; but that I should make no rejoinder. He commenced his review, and as I was unwilling to debate with a man of his character, I left the house, in company with a number of others, knowing that something would be expected from me if I remained. A part of the congregation took their seats, and were addressed two hours by Mr. P. Some of his brethren, I am told, claim a victory; but let this be as it may, I can assure them that I covet not a victory obtained by such disputants; for a cause that cannot be supported without them, should, and must, shortly sink to rise no more.

SCRIPTURAL INTERPRETER.

INTRODUCTORY.

Under this head I design publishing brief explanations of many passages of the New Testament, which are commonly supposed to teach the doctrine of endless sin and misery. Of course, I cannot expect to render my articles interesting to well-instructed Universalists, or biblical scholars, for whom they are not intended. I write for new inquirers after truth—for those who are beginning to ask the way to Zion. And even for such I cannot write fully, nor argue each point at length. I will furnish hints to awaken their attention—give them a clue for after reflection, and point out in what common works they may find fuller information if they need it. Thus will I rather guide and assist them on their way, than carry them to the object of their search.

I have said I would point out to them in what common works they may find fuller information on the various subjects of which I shall briefly treat. Those books shall be neither numerous, voluminous nor costly. The following is a list of the principal ones, though others may occasionally be named or referred to. The Bible, Ballou's Treatise on Atonement, Notes on the Parables; Ballou's First Inquiry, Second Inquiry, Essays, Reply to Professor Stuart, Letters to Stuart; Whittemore on the Parables; Smith on Divine Government; Paige's Selections from eminent Commentators; Winchester's Dialogues; Streeter's Familiar Conversations; Ely and Thomas' (or Philadelphia) Discussion; Skinner's Letters to Aikin and Lansing. Here are fifteen volumes—of which several treat of the same subjects, hence, only a majority will be necessary. The cost of the whole fifteen will be less than twelve dollars—but little more than nine dollars, exclusive of a Bible, which every Universalist family has already, and of Ballou on the Parables, which can be dispensed with if Whittemore's treatise is owned. Nor are these works scarce. If the inquirer is unable to purchase them, he will find the principal part of them in the libraries of his Universalist neighbors—all of them in nearly every Universalist preacher's library—and certainly every one should be owned and circulated in every Universalist society or neighborhood.* If this were now the case wherever there are Universalists, these articles would consist of but little more than references. Brethren, can you not wake up, purchase books, increase your stores of knowledge, and lend liberally to those who are anxious for more light?

One other work, more voluminous, I shall frequently refer to, which I have not placed in the above list. There are but few copies of its first volumes to be purchased any where—yet nearly all our old subscribers have retained and can lend them. I mean the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate. I dislike to republish what it has already contained on these subjects—especially what has been published in it in later years, and particularly long and labored arguments. The reader will therefore excuse the omission of such, and examine as directed.

Though I shall generally take up the passages in the same order in which they occur in the Scriptures, yet requests for explanations of any particular passages will be attended to immediately, however they may interfere with this order. This is mentioned now, in order that inquirers may not be discouraged from applying for information on any particular passage which they have some good reason to desire an explanation of.

Lastly—Though my explanations will, in general, be very brief, and consist only of the strongest reasons which occur to my mind at the time of writing, yet if not clear or full enough, I will take up any text a second time, if requested, and give a more detailed explanation of any phrase or subject involved in it, that may be pointed out. Will all our readers who are really anxious to understand the Scriptures, and know what they do teach, please to remember this? I wish to have every deficiency and obscurity frankly and explicitly pointed out—for how else can I hope to succeed in instructing?

Having thus, like the man in Knickerbocker's History of New-York, taken a two mile run to jump over a hill, and being safely arrived at its foot, I will sit down and rest myself and then leisurely walk over it! In other words, having beat up my way to the task in hand, I will begin it in another number. A. B. G.

* Br. Thomas, of Philadelphia, proposes that the following works in addition to the above, should be owned and circulated by every Universalist circle or society—Ballou's xxvi Lectures, xxv Select Sermons, xi Sermons and ix Sermons, (glorious reading at society meetings for worship, when they have no living preacher present!) Examination of future Retribution, and Letters on Divine Revelation; Universalist Expositor, 3 vols.; Life of Murray; Streeter's News from three Worlds, Mirror of Fanaticism; Hell Torments Overthrown; Memoir of Freeman; Ancient and Modern Histories of Universalism; Pickering on Divine Revelation; Tyler's Six Sermons; Convention Sermons, and a few others—to which I would add as many periodicals as they can afford to take for filing.

The plan Br. T. proposes is, that in every place where there are eight or ten believers, they should unite and procure the above collection. Ten persons at three dollars each would be sufficient to buy all those particularly named—or twenty persons at one dollar and fifty cents each—a very small sum. But this sum can be lessened, or the stock of books be enlarged. Nearly every Universalist has one or more volumes of Universalist books. Let each one add these to the joint stock so long as it shall be continued. Then let the money be contributed and the lacking volumes purchased.

Any or all of the foregoing lists, with many other valuable Universalist works, may be obtained from almost any of our publishers of periodicals, and from many of our country ministering brethren. At all events, our preachers will see that their congregations and friends are thus supplied, if they will but unite and furnish the funds. A. B. G.

REASONS.....NO. V.

FOR REJECTING THE DOCTRINE OF ENDLESS MISERY.

"Produce your cause, saith the Lord, bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob." Isaiah xli: 21.

As a weighty and very important reason for rejecting the doctrine of endless misery, we observe,

Thirdly, That it is in the highest degree dishonorable to God. It supposes, 1. That he could not prevent so dreadful a catastrophe, in which case he must be a weak and puny being, wholly unworthy the name of Deity; or, 2. That having the power, he would not prevent it, and is therefore a malignant and pitiless monster. If he knew this result when he created man, he must have been actuated by infinite malevolence. If he did not know it, and yet it be true, he was both foolish and wicked—foolish, as being ignorant of the issue of his own undertaking; and wicked, as creating sentient and immortal beings at an infinite hazard, a hazard incurring the possibility of their being infinite and endless losers by their existence. So that whatever view we take of it, the doctrine certainly reflects great dishonor on the divine character.

Fourthly, The doctrine stands directly opposed to the benevolence of God. If God be benevolent at all, he is infinitely so; he possesses no attribute in part. Now all nature declares; and the whole tenor of revelation confirms her testimony, that God is infinitely, universally, and unchangeably good—good unto all, making his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sending his rain on the just and on the unjust—kind to the unthankful and the evil—that his name and very nature is love, or benevolence. And if so, endless misery could never have entered into his original design; and if that goodness be unchangeable, it could never have entered into his design at any subsequent period after the creation. For known unto God were all his works from the beginning. If, therefore, any portion of God's intellectual offspring be rendered endlessly miserable, it must be in contravention of the original and uniform design of infinite benevolence; or rather it must preclude the possibility of that attribute belonging to the Deity. The infinite and changeless benevolence of the Deity can never be reconciled with the doctrine of endless misery. The two propositions are at eternal war with each other, and the triumph of one is the certain defeat of the other. If a God of infinite benevolence would make his own offspring endlessly miserable, then by parity of reasoning, a God of infinite malignity would make his own offspring endlessly happy, and the malignant being would be preferred to the benevolent being, for the obvious reason, that his character, as proved by his acts, would be preferable or better. But who does not see that this would be confounding all sense and language—calling bitter sweet and sweet bitter, putting darkness for light and light for darkness?

Fifthly, The doctrine is opposed to the mercy of God. The same reasons which prove the doctrine incompatible with the goodness of God, also prove it incompatible with his mercy. His mercy is as infinite, universal and changeless as his goodness. For we not only read that the Lord is good unto all, but also that his tender mercies are over all his works. As the goodness of God would prompt him to bestow existence for the purpose of conferring happiness, and to withhold it when he knew that evil instead of good—misery instead of happiness—would be the result, or mostly predominate through that existence; so the mercy of God would prompt him to remove the casual evils of existence and incidental sources of misery, in all cases where good would not be the final result of those temporary and incidental evils. It is true that "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every one whom he receiveth." But it is equally true that he "chastens for their profit, that they may be partakers of his holiness;" and that he "will not contend forever, nor be always wroth, lest the spirit should fail before him and the souls he has made." (Isa. lvii: 16.) "For the Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." (Lam. iii: 31-33.) Goodness bestows unmerited blessings; mercy relieves from actual sufferings. The Lord is "a God full of compassion and gracious; long suffering and plenteous in mercy and truth." (Ps. lxxvi: 15.) And lest this compassion and mercy should be supposed to militate against the righteousness of God, the Psalmist adds, Ps. cxii: 4, that "he is gracious and full of compassion, and righteous."

Is there any mercy in endless misery, or in the infliction of merciless torture on a portion of mankind to all eternity? Or can the unmerciful punishment of a part of mankind through the unending ages of eternity be reconciled with the infinite mercy of God, which is said to be "over all his works," and to "endure forever"? Let the reader judge.

Sixthly, It is opposed to the wisdom of God. As we have seen that this doctrine is opposed to the honor, benevolence and mercy of God, we may reasonably conclude that the divine Being would not knowingly admit into his plan anything that would tarnish his honor, or come in collision with either of those darling attributes; and hence, that if endless misery should befall a part of the creatures of God, it must be a result, undesigned, or not embraced in his original intention; and thereby prove that he was not infinite in wisdom. For infinite wisdom can never be frustrated in its designs, nor misjudge of the result of the operation of causes and means which it calls into requisition. We must, therefore, 1, impeach the divine wisdom, by supposing that it was imperfect and fallible; or 2, in order to maintain the perfection of that, must impeach the honor, the benevolence, and the mercy of God; or 3, reject the doctrine of endless misery as utterly irreconcilable with the wisdom and other perfections of the divine Being.

Seventhly, The doctrine is opposed to the power of God. Having seen how diametrically the doctrine stands opposed to the other and the darling attributes of God, we certainly have a right to conclude—and this conclusion is in fact irresistible—that if he could prevent so dreadful a catastrophe, a catastrophe involving directly his own character and all his most glorious perfections, as well as the eternal destiny of his own offspring, he surely would have done it. If, therefore, endless misery shall prove true, it must be for want of power in God to prevent it. But as we have no right or authority to limit the Holy One of Israel—as God is the Almighty, doing all his pleasure in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?—as there is no power but that which is of God, and the powers that be are ordained of God, it is the height of absurdity to suppose that any power in heaven, earth or hell, or any being or cause in the universe, can possibly defeat the divine purposes, overthrow his counsels, or successfully resist the potency of his omnific arm. If it be said by way of objection to this argument, that although no physical power or force can resist the power of God, yet the innate and moral depravity of man is such—his alienation from God in connexion with his freedom of volition—that he will eternally withstand the divine will, and successfully resist its power and efficacy to all eternity: we would ask in turn, Is not God as much the governor of the moral as of the physical world? Is the power of man's moral depravity stronger than the infinite moral power of God? Does not he turn the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned? Does he not say his people shall be willing in the day of his power? Did he not subdue the hard and malignant heart of the murderous Saul of Tarsus, and the haughty but beastly heart of a Nebuchadnezzar? Who then shall set limits to the moral omnipotence of the infinite Jehovah, and say to the great Governor of the universe, "Thus far shalt thou go, but no farther"? As surely, then, as God is omnipotent, and possesses the moral attributes ascribed to him in nature and revelation, just so surely is the doctrine of endless misery false. D. S.

COBB'S SERIES OF SCHOOL BOOKS.

We have lately been favored by the agent for this section of country, Mr. Sweet, with an examination of "Cobb's series of school books, consisting of a spelling, reading, and arithmetical course." The following is a list of the books with a statement of their particular and respective objects.

The First Book, or introduction to the Spelling Book, designed for the use of small children, containing the alphabet, and easy words of one, two and three syllables.

The Spelling Book, containing the rudiments of the English language, arranged in catechetical order; an organization of the alphabet; a greater number of spelling lessons than are generally inserted in spelling books; many useful tables; and the proper names in the New Testament. Designed to teach the orthography and orthoepy of J. Walker.

The Exp. sitor, or sequel to the Spelling Book, containing about twelve thousand of the most common words of the language, accurately spelled, pronounced, divided, accented and explained; with concise principles of pronunciation, rules of accentuation, etc.

After the spelling, next comes the reading course, consisting of

The Juvenile Reader, No. 1; containing interesting moral and instructive reading lessons, composed of easy words of one and two syllables.

The Juvenile Reader, No. 2. Similar to No. 1, but composed of words of one, two and three syllables.

The Juvenile Reader, No. 3; containing interesting historical, moral and instructive lessons, composed of words of a greater number of syllables.

The Sequel to the Juvenile Readers; comprising a selection of lessons in prose and poetry from highly esteemed American and English writers; designed for the use of higher classes in schools and academies, and to impress the minds of youth with sentiments of virtue and religion.

The North American Reader, a duodecimo volume of 500 pages, containing a great variety of pieces in prose and poetry, from highly esteemed and popular authors. Also, observations on good reading; the Declaration of Independence; the Constitution of the United States, etc., designed for the use of the highest classes in schools and academies.

The Arithmetical course consists of three small books, the first designed for quite small children, containing the tables, etc.; the second containing the simple rules of arithmetic; and the third, containing the compound rules and all that is necessary of every other rule, for practical purposes and the transaction of business, etc.

We have but slightly examined the arithmetical course, and therefore are not prepared to say much upon it, except that the arrangement seems a natural and easy one, and adapted to the advancing state of the young pupils' acquisitions.

Respecting the spelling and reading courses, however, we can speak with more assurance. They are decidedly the best works of the kind that we have seen, with one exception; and this, with many, would be a recommendation—we mean the orthography of Walker. For ourselves, we prefer that of Webster, as being a shorter and more direct way to the object. We dislike the using of more letters in the spelling of words than are absolutely necessary. Bating this exception, the courses are admirably adapted to the object to be attained—the simplification of the mode of instructing children, and the graduation of the respective lessons and succeeding parts of instruction to the growing capacities and opening intellects of the pupil. The author, Mr. Lyman Cobb, of New York, has evinced much industry and patient research, much good taste and sound judgment, and a practical and thorough acquaintance with school teaching and the education of children, in the selection and arrangement of words, lessons, and matter in general. We think his spelling and reading courses will tend greatly to facilitate the instruction of children and youth, and be a vast improvement in our common schools wherever adopted.

The following tribute of affection is from the pen of Br. A. C. Thomas, of Philadelphia, and co-Editor of the Universalist Union. It is not copied because I deem it merited, but because I believe it sincere, and gladly reciprocate all the affection, and esteem, and good wishes it breathes. Should I never be enabled of God to render any other service to mankind, I will always feel grateful that he made me an humble instrument in bringing so able a laborer into the service of the Gospel. For my own honor, it is enough—but as a service of gratitude to God for my own conversion from darkness to light, that, and all other labors I can perform, are but adding to my obligations instead of decreasing them, and filling my soul to overflowing fulness of gratitude and joy for all the mercies of our heavenly Father. To God, then, be all the honor and glory—to man, the benefits—more than sufficient for me, is the joy. A. B. GROSH.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

This valuable evangelical paper is now published by Grosh and Hutchinson, proprietors, and is edited by Aaron B. Grosh, Dolphus Skinner and Stephen R. Smith, whom I choose to denominate "three persons in one purpose." The first number of volume vii. appeared on the 2d ult. The typographical execution of the sheet is very pleasing to the eye of a printer; and what is still better, the articles are well written, instructive and interesting. Most sincerely do I desire that the Magazine and Advocate may continue to prosper abundantly—for besides its elevated character as a herald of good tidings of great joy, and its utility in the Gospel cause, which is the cause of God and humanity—one of its present proprietors, Br. AARON B. GROSH, is, and has been, for more than ten years, a special friend and bosom companion of the undersigned. By him I was first directed to the scriptural testimonies of eternal blessedness for the whole human race. At that time, we were both teaching school in Marietta, Pa. After much discussion and examination, we realized a union of faith in the record which God hath given of his Son. Together we faced, and together we encountered, and together we overcame, the persecution which was consequent of the open avowal and defence of our religious views. By him I was encouraged to turn my attention to the ministry of reconciliation, which I entered in December, 1828. Some months thereafter, [June, 1829,] he commenced speaking publicly in the name of the Lord; and oft have we stood side by side, humbly endeavoring to show forth the goodness and salvation of our God. It is natural, therefore, that I should specially desire his prosperity in the labor of love. The UNION is, of course, uppermost in my thoughts, in the list of religious papers—but next in order is the Magazine and Advocate, for the reasons above named. May the proprietors be blessed with a large increase of paying subscribers; a goodly number of good correspondents; punctual agents; and the benediction of Heaven. A. C. T.

Br. Thomas has been appointed a General Agent for the Magazine and Advocate; and will attend to any business entrusted to him, in relation to the establishment. Residence, 132 Chestnut-street, Philadelphia—next door to the United States Bank. The Editors of the Magazine and Advocate, and the Editors of the Universalist Union, will reciprocally act as each others' agents.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—H. L. J., who has sent us the third letter without paying his postage, is informed that his articles are too illegibly written to allow their publication—that the article on Slander is at least borrowed by him, and that we suspect the article on E. K. Avery to be original in the same way!

Br. J. S., who sent us a poetic article from Lockport, is respectfully informed that it would occupy at least two columns of our paper in our smallest type, thus exceeding by far the limits to which we are compelled to confine such articles.

PRIZE TALES.

Under this head an Editor at the East, a professed believer that the Bible teaches the doctrine of universal salvation from sin and death, objects to the character of Mr. Clayton, in the Blind Widow and her Family, because "he is made to talk to John [Surrey] very like a thorough-going Orthodox"—i. e., Partialist. "He is represented (continues the Editor) as addressing John Surrey as follows: God 'will lay in thy sickening bosom the fiery coilings of that worm which dieth not,' and 'knowest thou not, that peace shall visit thee no more, day nor night, forever!'" In speaking of the denouement of the tale, he says, "Her husband now agrees with her [Clayton with Marian] in religious tenets, although he had talked before so much like an Orthodox and no change of his views is once mentioned."

Does our Br. consider the phrases, "worm which dieth not," and "peace shall visit thee no more, day nor night, forever," as expressing a misery of absolutely endless duration? If so, he must give up, either, his faith in final and universal salvation, or his belief in the Bible; for Isaiah (lxvi: 24) says, "their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched." Jesus, in speaking of the same place, (or Mark in explaining his saying, x: 43-50,) said, "where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." John the Revelator (xiv: 11) says, "And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever, and they have no rest, day nor night, who worship the beast," etc. These are certainly much stronger expressions than those put into the mouth of the People's Lawyer, in the Prize Tale; yet we know they do not teach the doctrine of endless misery—this brother could easily show they do not. Why has he not dealt consistently, then, in judging the character of Clayton? Will our criticising brother say of Isaiah, and Jesus, and Mark, and John the Revelator, that the Bible "makes them talk very like a thorough-going Orthodox"—i. e., Partialist? Will he say "they now agree with us in religious tenets, although they had before talked so much like an Orthodox, and no change of their views is once mentioned"? NO! he knows better—but in criticising on our Prize Tale, he—but his own conscience will tell him the rest! He talk of sectarianism, forsooth! Why, it is satan rebuking sin! A. B. G.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

This interesting monthly magazine for January, came to hand some two or three weeks since; but from the numerous avocations which have occupied our time, we have been unable to notice it till now. This number is the commencement of a new volume, and like its predecessors for more than a year past, is filled with most interesting and valuable matter. Among the numerous and talented writers in this magazine, there will of course, and must of necessity be a great variety of style and manner; this too will be necessary to please the many and different tastes of the readers. Some of the productions are light and humorous, others are weighty and grave. Among the interesting articles, of the present number, we have been peculiarly gratified with "The Prospects of the Age," by Rev. Orville Dewey. The author is a powerful, bold, and thrilling writer. Periodicity of Diseases—the Drama—Thoughts on Insanity—My Country—Ollapodiana, etc., etc., are generally good and instructive. Some beautiful specimens of poetry, combining harmony of numbers, with chaste and touching sentiment, or just and cutting satire, are found in The Warm Wind of Winter—The Price of Glory—Soliloquy of Cromwell—The Lapse of Years—The Young Greek Boy—Fall of the Leaf—Reading of the Will, etc. The editorial notices are in their usual spirited, independent and elevated style. Taking the number for all in all, we think few, if any, of its predecessors have surpassed it, and that, being the commencement of a new volume, it will not fail of enlarging the circulation of the Knickerbocker, and rewarding the labor and pains of the enterprising publishers. D. S.

HYMN BOOK.

Br. R. Streeter informs us that his "Pocket Hymn Book, in neat plain binding, lettered," will be sold hereafter at "thirty dollars per hundred—four dollars per dozen." Morocco binding, as before noticed. It is to be hoped that this reduction, though late, may save others the expense and labor of furnishing another Hymn Book to meet the demand for a cheaper Hymn Book than Streeter's was. A. B. G.

NEW AGENTS.

J. Sage, P. M., Huntington, (O.)—L. H. Duke, P. M., Johnstown, (O.)—J. L. Wells, Hoosick Falls—Charles Standart, Huron, (O.)—William Lincoln, Virgil—Samuel Thompson, Stockton, are authorized to act as agents for this paper.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. BULLARD at Hartwick—Br. WHITNEY at Cedarville—Br. M. B. NEWELL at Middleville—Br. Sias at Denmark, and at Carthage in the evening—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. BODEN at Sharon—Br. BRITTON at Adams—Br. TOWNSEND at South Bristol, (see notice below,)—Br. WAGGONER at Paine's Hollow, at 10 A. M., Mohawk, 2 P. POETRY.

From the Register and Observer.

A THOUGHT ON ETERNITY.

Oh! that some angel's garb were mine!
That I might fly from clime to clime
A messenger of love:
Then would I rend the "sil'ry veil,"
And listen to the wondrous tale
Of starry worlds above.

Then like the peerless orb of day
Forever onward in its way,
I would my course pursue;
I'd wend my flight o'er cherubs' domes,
And strike the path where pleasure roams,
And friendship's bonds renew.

For there, perchance, in friendly mirth,
I'll meet some blessed friend from earth,
Arrayed in heavenly light—
And there, in some celestial bower,
We'll spend in joy the passing hour,
Enraptured at the sight.

And Jesus, too, in accents fair,
Will meet me as I wander there,
And whisper words of love;
He'll lead me o'er some mountain green,
And bid me feel a calm serene
In some celestial grove.

And there, in tones angelic sweet,
He will the varied worlds repeat
Which meet my wandering eye;
He'll bid me mark the happy seat,
Where cherubs and where seraphs meet,
In songs that never die.

Then give me faith that angels wear—
And I will mount on pinions fair,
To gain that blissful shore;
I'll soar above those starry spheres;
And spend fore'er unnumbered years,
In joys unknown before.

PARODY.

There are few readers of the English writers that have not been charmed with the ease, beauty, pathos and truth of the little sonnet in Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield.

"When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds, too late, that men betray;
What charm can soothe her melancholy?
What art can wash her guilt away?"

"The only art her guilt to cover,
To hide her shame from every eye,
To give repentance to her lover,
And wring his bosom, is—to die."

The following parody on it is evidently from a lesser poet, but will be pronounced excellent of its kind and beautiful in its place. It is said to be a copy of a silk dyer's sign.

"When lovely woman tilts her saucer,
And finds, too late, that tea will stain,
What ever made a woman crosser?
What art can wash all white again?"

"The only art the stain to cover,
To hide the spot from every eye,
To wear an unsold dress above her,
Of proper color, is—to DYE."

THE SUN AND THE ICICLE.

Lotan was a Jew, living in captivity. His nation was scattered abroad to the four winds of heaven, and he and his family were exiled from their sunny home on the banks of the Jordan, to the cold snows of the North. Poverty and persecution pursued them still. Man as well as nature was unkind.

Lotan mourned as one without hope. Love softened but could not un rivet his shackles. Day by day the iron entered his heart deeper and deeper.

One bright morning in November, Lotan sat in sadness and grief by his fireside. The eastern heavens were "fretted with the golden fire" of the rising sun. And the icy forests flashed and quivered with a thousand tremulous rays of silver light. A bird, beguiled by the pomp and tranquillity of the morning, sat in the garden hedge and swelled her little throat with a hymn to the Almighty, and waked the echoes of nature's solitude, and filled the chambers of the human bosom with glad harmony. But Lotan brooded over his exile and was exceeding sorrowful. The splendor and glorious majesty of the rising king of day communicated no delight. The silent sympathy of Adah, his wife, and the happy prattle of his children, soothed not his chafed spirit.

He thought of his home in the Holy Land. He remembered the cave in the hill side where his father and mother slept with their fathers. Oh bitter, bitter exile from those dear scenes of his youthful love!

Lotan repined, and forgot his blessings enjoyed and preserved, in the recollection of his blessings lost. An unholly wish struggled in the depths of his heart, and came into being, like a bubble shooting up from the dark sea. He breathed a silent curse against his enemies, and his countenance darkened with the mingling lines of wrath and grief.

But his eye caught a slender icicle pendant from the low roof, and glistering pure and keenly in the sunbeam. An image of our happy home in the far East, mused the exile. So bright were the joyful hopes that clustered around our little circle, so pure was our love, so calm was the heaven of that blessed home. "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

The day advanced and the sun poured forth an atmosphere of light, and warmth, and love. When suddenly the icicle was loosened from its frail hold, and was dashed in pieces on the icy pavement beneath the window.

A tear started to Lotan's eye, and his wild thoughts were stilled. I will mourn no more, said he. The little icicle teaches me wisdom, submission. It has perished, but not without cause. The universal sun, that fills the world with beauty and gladness, has destroyed it. What carries life to millions, causes death to one. I will weep no more. My home is overwhelmed in the convulsions of the world, and we are cast on this desolate coast, shipwrecked in the world-storm. But the Judge of all the earth does right. His winds and lightnings wreck the lone vessel, but they give fresh life and elasticity to the all-surrounding air. The dark world will be enlightened by the children of God, banished from their Holy Home and wandering in exile. "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice, let the multitude of isles be glad thereof."

And Lotan bowed himself in prayer, and when he arose the wrath and the sorrow had departed, and his eye was calm, and he looked on his wife and little ones, and his heart yearned towards them.—Register and Observer.

TO THE AFFLICTED.—Go, ye sons and daughters of affliction, to the word of God for consolation; there you will find joy for mourning and the spirit of praise for heaviness. Drink of the spirit of him who in the season of his extreme suffering uttered the language of true reconciliation. "Not my will, but thine O Lord be done." Be exhorted, therefore, to apply to this powerful and all-sufficient source for comfort, and with joy shall ye draw water out of the well of salvation!

"Shall mortal man be more just than God? shall a man be more pure than his Maker?"

MARRIAGES.

At Oneida Springs, on the 8th inst., by Rev. Mr. Kingsley, Mr. JOSEPH B. EDGARTON, of Shirley, Mass., to Miss SUSAN HOBBS, of New-York city.

On the 2d inst., by Rev. W. E. Manley, of Clinton, Mr. TRUMAN B. SHUT, to Miss CAROLINE PATTERSON, both of Westmoreland.

In De Ruyter, on the 26th ult., by Rev. E. Gage, Mr. SAMUEL S. SHEPPARD, to Miss EMILY MARTIN, both of Washington county, in this State.

DEATHS.

In McLean, on February 1st, Mr. BACHELOR, formerly of Massachusetts. His sickness, though protracted, was borne with resignation to the Divine will, and a firm reliance on the universality of the promises. Just before his death he assured me of the joys of his faith and the increased energy of his hope as death drew near. May the virtues of the father not be forgotten by the children, who, while God exists, cannot be fatherless. The funeral services were attended by G. SANDERSON.

In Ellsburg, January 31, JACOB EMMERSON, aged 40 years. As he lived, he died—a firm believer in the restoring grace of God to all and upon all, without partiality. In the death of Br. Emmerson, a bereaved family have suffered the loss of a dutiful son, a beloved brother, an affectionate husband, a provident father—community, a worthy citizen, and the neighborhood, an obliging neighbor. According to his request, the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning circle of relatives and neighbors, by the writer.

We parted from this afflicted family, but on the 3d inst. we were again called on to sympathize with them in the loss of an infant son, aged twenty months. May these afflictions be sanctified for the good of all concerned.

In Camden, on December 3, 1835, after a lingering sickness of many months, Mrs. HANNAH BYINGTON, consort of Mr. Daniel Byington, aged 63. Distinguished through life by her modest deportment, her unobtrusive moral worth, her domestic virtues, and her industrious, economical and exemplary habits, she died as she had lived, happy, composed, uncomplaining at the protracted sufferings she endured, and perfectly resigned to the will of God. Though educated in a different faith, she had for many years been a firm and unwavering believer in the impartial grace of God and the glorious "restitution of all things which he has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." She not only believed but adorned this faith, and found it the best of all doctrines to live by, and still better to die by. Her memory will long, and gratefully, and affectionately be cherished by her surviving husband, children, and a numerous circle of kindred, neighbors and friends. At her request the writer delivered her funeral sermon. It being impracticable for him to attend at the time of the burial, an appointment was subsequently made, and a sermon delivered in the Methodist church in Camden on the 10th inst., from Isaiah xxv: C-8. D. S.

In the village of Sanquoit, town of Paris, on the 3d inst., very suddenly, after a short illness, Mrs. EELINDA KNIGHT, wife of William Knight, aged 33 years. By this dispensation of Providence, an affectionate husband has been deprived of the society of a beloved wife, and five young children of a tender and affectionate mother. Yet there is consolation in the reflection, that the deceased died in full reliance upon the Christian hope that she will meet them in that brighter world, where friends no more are separated, and where "every tear is wiped from every eye."

In Westmoreland, February 2d, Mrs. URANA PECK, consort of Mr. William Peck, aged 29 years. She fell a victim to the consumption, after lingering through its hopes and fears for about one year—during which, she saw her only child suddenly removed by death.

Mrs. P. was educated a Baptist, and it is not known that she ever changed her views, as she never expressed an opinion respecting the ultimate destiny of mankind. She was a Christian both in principle and practice, and was sustained with comfort in her sorrows, patience under sufferings, and hope in death. She selected a text for her funeral, Acts vii: 59, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."—Communicated.

In Lisle, Broome county, on the 25th ult., Mrs. ARABELLA LEWIS, aged 87 years. Though for many years a member of the Baptist communion, and an exemplary Christian, she had long expressed a strong desire for the salvation of all, and declared she would be the happiest person in the world could she but believe it. Thus, without meaning to reflect upon the opinions of others, it was proved that the righteous soul is not satisfied until it can see that a ransomed world will, eventually, return to our Father in heaven.

The funeral was attended on the 27th, and the consolations of divine truth tendered to the mourning relatives by the writer, from Luke xxiv: 6. C. S. B.

In Virgil, in December last, GEORGE, son of Jehiel and Phina Stowel, aged 4 years. The funeral was attended by Rev. A. G. Clark, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered by him from John xiv: 1. C. S. B.

At Spencer's Basin, Monroe county, on the 27th ult., of the pulmonary complaint, Mr. ASA BUEL, in the 47th year of his age. Br. Buel was a firm and unwavering believer in the purposes and promises of God, "who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." He left a wife and many friends to mourn his loss. May the blessings of the Gospel of life and salvation be their everlasting portion here and hereafter, world without end.

In Albany, on the 15th ult., of consumption, Mrs. ANN KITTLES, consort of Adam Kittles.

In Middleville, on the 31st ult., Capt. SETH BAKER, a soldier of the Revolution, in the 81st year of his age.

EDUCATION.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Much has been said and written upon the subject of education; but still its importance does not appear to be so fully realized, by the majority of the people, as its incomparable value would seem to demand. As American freemen, we justly prize our republican form of government, and the numerous blessings which flow therefrom; and we are naturally desirous to perpetuate our high privileges to the remotest posterity. But upon what depends the stability of our institutions and government? Not, primarily, upon the union of these States, or the prevalence of republican principles, or the election of this or that man, or set of men, to office; but entirely upon the general knowledge and information of the great mass of the people—for this, indeed, is the true source of republicanism, and of the spirit of union. Ours is, emphatically, a government of the people—they are the source of all laws, and give character to our institutions. Now, in the same proportion as the people become enlightened and moral, will they be cautious to select for their representatives and rulers, men of tried wisdom and purity; and vice versa. Hence, the enactment of pure, wholesome, enlightened laws, and a realization of the necessity of preserving inviolate our Union, depends exclusively upon the knowledge of the people, or their ability to appreciate the advantages which accrue from these sources.

The enemies of republicanism vauntingly predict the approaching dissolution of our present form of government. They point to the downfall of the republics of Greece, Rome, and modern France; and to the anarchy which reigns in South America, as unerring indications that man is not capable of governing himself, and that, ere long, these United States will be compelled to adopt a monarchical government to avoid the same fate. But the inquiry arises—what caused the overthrow of the republics above named? I answer, The IGNORANCE of the PEOPLE!—the prevalence of wealth without knowledge and virtue! From the darkness of their minds, they were incapable of appreciating the value of freedom, and were therefore willing to exchange a government founded upon their inalienable rights, for the gaudy trappings of royalty; or to participate in the renown of some ambitious slayer of his race. Similar remarks will apply to the Mexican States and those upon the Southern continent. The great mass of the people are ignorant—are unenlightened in regard to their rights, and the true nature and principles of self-government. While this ignorance remains, they will continue a prey to wild anarchy—they will continue the tools and victims of aspiring and corrupt demagogues. And how shall we prevent our beloved Union from sharing the same fate? The answer is self-evident—enlighten the People! ENLIGHTEN THE PEOPLE! Let knowledge, as streams of water, flow throughout the wide extent of our country, and a rich and abundant harvest of virtue and fraternal affection will be the fruit thereof.

While these truths are extremely evident, there is a most lamentable want of regard to them, exhibited by our legislators and law-makers. I am convinced, that a careful examination of the doings of our representative bodies, will show, that by far the greater proportion of their "acts," are the devising of schemes, and granting of monopolies and privileges to enrich the people—as though this were the great primary object of legislation—while the instruction of the people, is a matter of minor importance—as though wealth was the sole source of earthly happiness, and should be the end and aim of all national and individual pursuit! But of what avail is wealth, without knowledge to make a proper use of it? Riches and ignorance are infinitely more liable to plunge an individual or a nation into degradation and wretchedness, than poverty with knowledge. The rise and fall of the ancient republics, fully exemplify this position.—Let the minds of the people be well enlightened, and though poor, they will cherish and protect our free institutions in their purity, and live united and happy. But heap wealth upon them, while their minds are in chains of ignorance and darkness, and they will become ripe in corruption, and fall an easy prey to anarchy or despotism. It is, therefore, evident, that so far as the above noticed principles of legislation are in operation, they should be reversed. The primary design of our legislative bodies, should be the devising of means to instruct the people in all practical and useful information; while assistance in the accumulation of riches, should be an object of secondary consideration. The first question which the representative asks of himself, should not be, How shall I assist my constituents in becoming wealthy? but, How shall I aid them in the acquisition of useful knowledge, and the diffusion of it among their children?

Is it inquired, what measures can be adopted to educate and enlighten all the people? I answer, Let a national system of education be adopted—let schools of uninterrupted duration be established in every town, and hamlet, and neighborhood, throughout the Union—let liberal salaries be paid instructors, that men of the first talent and acquirements may devote their entire lives to the profession of teaching—let every child be thoroughly instructed in all the useful branches of science—and let judiciously selected libraries of valuable and morally entertaining books be established and supported in every school district, that the leisure hours of the youth may be profitably employed. Were a system of this character to be adopted and thoroughly practiced by government, in one generation, our land would present a spectacle calculated to fill the heart of the philanthropist with rejoicing—a nation of usefully educated people—elevated as far above the other nations of the earth in point of morality and knowledge, as in civil and religious liberty!

The funds to sustain a national system of education could unquestionably be easily procured. Our national treasury is about to be filled with millions of surplus revenue; and, already, numerous projects are agitated for its application. But what more beneficial use, I would inquire, could this money be applied to, than the education of the people? "It should be applied to fortifications," says one; "to internal improvements," says another. But let the great body of American freemen become duly educated and enlightened—let them become aware of the true nature of their rights, and of the real character and value of their privileges, and this nation will be safer, and will bid more fair to perpetuate her free institutions to posterity, than were our country surrounded by a triple row of fortifications, frowning with serried lines of bayonets. For we shall thus be protected against the encroachments of enemies, far more to be dreaded than any foreign foe—viz., ignorance and her progeny, corruption, profligacy, and internal commotion. As for internal improvement, I know of none more needed than the improvement of the minds of the people. Let light and knowledge irradiate their understandings, and their love of country will rest upon a firmer foundation than merely, that it is their birth-place, or affords advantages in acquiring wealth—(this love of country is possessed by the most degraded serf that bows beneath the despotic yoke of Russia)—it will be a love for the institutions of our country—a love for the purity, the equality, and justice which prevails throughout her borders! It is needless to remark, that a people of this enlightened character would be far more likely to maintain in pristine vigor that invaluable bond of union, and in its purity that Constitution, which are the fruits of the toil and bloodshed of our forefathers.

I repeat, then, the education of all the people of this wide extended government, should be the first object with all our legislators; and to accomplish which, a sufficient amount of the wealth of the nation should be permanently dedicated. For, beyond all question, upon a general and thorough diffusion of useful knowledge, of moral and practical instruction, depends the existence of this government and Union, and the perpetuity of our free institutions.

I have, Messrs. Editors, suggested these crude thoughts, in hope they may be improved by some abler and more experienced pen.

THE DIFFERENCE.....No. I.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

Were the controversy between Universalism and Partialism confined to subjects of minor importance, we might not, perhaps, justify ourselves in dissenting from them. But when we find ourselves dissenting and differing from them in several vitally important tenets, involving the present peace and religious welfare of thousands, and looking forward to a difference incalculable and immortal, our justification for rallying under another flag is fully sustained. We feel that our situation is widely different from that of dissenters in general. We feel that we should be justified in writing "REFORMATION" upon our banner. Let us notice the contrariety of our views in relation to faith.

I shall speak of faith as it is popularly felt and understood. I shall speak now of faith itself, what it is, and what it is to have it.

With most Partialists, faith consists in believing in their own individual salvation in a future state. While in what they call an unconverted state, they esteem themselves unbelievers, and expect to be eternally miserable hereafter, if they should be so unfortunate as to die without passing through a certain process, which they dignify by calling it conversion.

But in order to test and illustrate more fully their ideas of faith, we will take an example from a regularly bred Partialist family. We will suppose ourselves conversant with an individual thereof, before the change, above alluded to, takes place. Inquire, is he a believer? "No." But does he not believe in the authenticity of the Bible. "O, yes." And by particular inquiry, you would find him believing, without doubt, all the enormous absurdities of a popular creed, and yet he calls himself an unbeliever!

Converse with this same individual after he has passed through an excitement—been convicted—anxious—trembling—feeling himself lost—being alarmed, and thinking that God could have no mercy on so wicked a wretch—a season of intense agony—then a prayer—then a ray of hope, that he will possibly fare a little better—then a little flattering and soothing from the superintending clergyman—then conversion, with the broad daylight of salvation shining upon him—converse with him then, and see what he believes in addition to what he believed before. He now considers himself a believer, and entitled to all the immunities and privileges of that character; and this constitutes the sum total of all that distinguishes him from what he was before, so far as faith is concerned. Not one additional idea has been added to his intellect, nor has the least improvement been effected in his creed, except so far as he views the subject of his own personal salvation differently: So I feel authorized to say, that in a popular sense, the Partialists consider themselves believers, or possessed of faith, when they expect to be saved from hell in a future state; and they consider themselves unbelievers or backsliders, while they believe themselves exposed to the torments of an endless hell in a future state.

How, then, does our faith differ from theirs?—“Much, every way.” Faith with us, is synonymous with belief and confidence. In the first place, faith depends entirely upon evidence contemplated by the understanding. It is then, the direct result of evidence or testimony. In the second place, it is the result of knowledge. To illustrate—Suppose I know the character and circumstances of a man to be so good as to justify me in trusting him to the amount of five hundred dollars, for the term of one year. My faith in this man's obligation would be the result of my knowledge of him; or, if you please, you may call it the result of the evidence I have that he will fulfil his obligation; which evidence is the knowledge of his character and circumstances.

Such a faith is rational, reasonable. It presupposes the truth of the matter believed, before it is believed. Whereas the salvation of the Partialist is not true till he believes it; and his liability to future torment is made false, so soon as he believes in his salvation.

Again—the Partialist supposes that the disposition of God towards him has changed upon his believing. Away with such a faith, which teaches that the immutable God is acted upon and affected by the caprices of mortal man! We believe no such things. Our salvation, and the immortal bliss of our race, was true before we ever heard the “joyful sound”—as true as it is now, or ever can be. The truth is not changed by our faith, but our faith was changed by having the truth made known to us.

Nor do we vainly imagine that our Creator is improved by our belief. We might have been ignorant of his goodness, but good he was, and good he is, and good he ever will be, let us believe or disbelieve as we may.

With us, faith is the substance, the subsistence, the foundation of things HOPED for; not FEARED; the evidence, the earnest, the assurance we have of things not seen—the confidence we feel in the veracity and faithfulness of our God, that ALL we hope for will be realized.

BRIEF DIALOGUES.....NO. I.

BY REV. GEORGE SANDERSON.

DEMONOLOGY.

My neighbor, who is a Partialist, and withal a candid one, has frequently elicited opportunities to converse with me on the distinguishing points of difference between his and my faith. Like thousands of others, his impressions relative to Universalism, were produced by the scandalizing method with which the ignorant and uncharitable among our opposers are in the habit of assailing us. He had perused none of our publications; nor did he suppose they breathed a spirit any different from what he heard represented. But his attention was directed to the subject of Universalism, by the conversion of several individuals to its cheering faith; individuals too, with whom he was acquainted; whose characters he admired, and whose talents he did not question. He concluded that it was too difficult to deceive these men, and therefore Universalism must be misunderstood by him.

He had determined, at any rate, to ascertain the real views of Universalists, and their reasons for them, and against his own faith.

I had, on one occasion, given him my views of the divine character. He was surprised to find that I believed so fully in the existence of God, and especially that, in the abstract, there was no difference in our opinions on this subject.

What seemed to him next in importance, was, the existence of a personal devil; and he expected to be as happily disappointed on this subject, as on the other. I at once plainly denied the existence of his satanic majesty, when, as if horror-struck, (for he was a very pious man!) he exclaimed—

Partialist. What! do you not believe there is a devil?

Universalist. Yes.

P. I am right glad to find that I misunderstood you.

U. You are not so much mistaken as you imagine.

P. Pray, what is the difference between us? You are not, I hope, wanting in faith on this subject?

U. O, no—the want of faith, I apprehend, is in you—you believe in but one devil, I, in many.

P. Wo be to me, if that's the truth! for I find it as much as I can do to resist the temptations of one.

U. You see, then, in your own case, a practical proof, that your faith has not the power which Universalism has. Your faith only enables you, with difficulty, to contend successfully with one devil; mine, with many.

P. True. But it appears so strange—so unaccountable, that I should never before have heard, that there were more devils than one! Surely I have read the Scriptures; it cannot be that I have read them in vain.

U. My statement appears to you somewhat inexplicable. But I'll give you my reasons for—

P. No, no—give me Scripture; reason is too carnal, too erring, for things so “sacred and divine.”

U. Well, then, “to the law and testimony”—but allow me to answer your demand with a scriptural question: How many devils had Mary Magdalene? Luke viii: 2.

P. Umph!—w-h-y—seven, I suppose.

U. Well, then, there must be seven devils, at least, or she could not have been troubled by them.

P. Let me see—there is a way that our minister understood this, but—

U. It is too much the case, that people suffer their ministers to understand the Bible for them; you perceive how you have been misled.

P. O, no, not misled. I read the Bible, and understand it—I think.

U. The whole of it? and believe it?

P. Surely, with all my heart.

U. Let me try you. You recollect having read, Luke viii: 30, where the man afflicted with devils, assured Jesus that his name was legion; because of the number of devils that beset him. Now the number of a full legion is said to be about six thousand.

P. Six thousand devils! no marvel, if my poor soul is lost!

U. But do you believe it? and with your whole heart? which you say is the way you believe the Scriptures.

P. I verily believe it is to be understood.

U. Why then do you limit your creed to one devil? You take your minister and popular prejudice for a guide; hence the Scriptures confound you.

P. There is a mistake somewhere; but as there are so many who believe as I do on this point, it is not possible that we are all wrong.

U. Then you have no mind of your own on which you can rely. You do not recollect, “that no other foundation can any man lay than that which is laid, Christ.” Such security as you seek, is fatal to the cause of truth. Suppose you were among the Mahomedans, and they should tell you that, because so many believe in Mahomed, it is not possible they all can be wrong—would it, in your estimation, justify them?

P. I am satisfied you are correct on this point; but still I cannot solve the difficulty which your statement concerning so many devils, presents. Pray, who are these devils? they are spirits, surely.

U. If spirits can be seen with the fleshly eye, then at least some of them are spirits.

P. What! do you presume to say that the devil has been seen with human eyes?

U. Certainly. Jesus said to his disciples, “I have chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil.” So I conclude one of them has been seen on the earth.

P. You misconstrue the language of Jesus. Judas was not the real devil; he was a child of the devil.

U. As to that, I know nothing about it. But it appears that the devil has a family, which if they inherit their father's disposition and character, must, according to your own story, make more than one devil! But we'll not jest about this matter; you are serious, and so am I. The truth is, we differ, in the first place, as to the meaning of the term devil. I very well understand your meaning, but you do not mine. The difficulty with you is, in supposing that this phrase has but one signification.

P. As the difference between us is in the meaning of the word devil, I presume if I had said satan, there would have been no misunderstanding; for surely satan is a personal evil being.

U. You allude to Peter now.

P. What, St. Peter?

U. Did not Jesus say to him, “get thee behind me, satan”?

Here my neighbor left me; but with the assurance that he would again call and converse further with me on the subject of demonology.

THE RAMBLER.....No. III.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

FORGIVENESS.

“And when ye stand praying, forgive.”—Jesus Christ.

There is no duty in the Christian religion that holds a more conspicuous place, than forgiveness. It was constantly presented by the great Founder of Christianity; and from his peculiar situation, he was constantly called on to practice the benign precepts which he taught.

The great object which the writer has now in view is, to show the vast importance of exercising a spirit of forgiveness.

1. We cannot overcome evil with evil. This never was done. As well might we expect to reverse the stars in their courses: or to extinguish flames by the addition of fuel. Evil must be destroyed by its opposite. Such is the law of God's moral empire. Should the Father of spirits make any being miserable forever, he would violate one of his own laws. God, to be a perfect pattern of holiness, must act strictly according to those laws which he enjoins upon his offspring—which leads us to our second particular: a consideration of the commands relative to this duty.

2. Our motto is very forcible on this point. It is also connected with another duty, and shows where forgiveness is to be brought in. When we stand praying, “forgive our debts as we forgive our debtors,” we are then to manifest as much forgiveness to others, as we ask for ourselves. Another command given on this subject, is very plain. “Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use and persecute you.” Were these directions perseveringly followed, virtue and piety would soon become triumphant. “Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.” Here, again, the duty is enjoined, and the reason for its practice. It would seem, from this excellent passage, that God has already extended forgiveness to man. Indeed, this must be admitted, for if God waits for us first to forgive, we become an example to him, and not he to us. This leads me to remark, further,

3. We cannot be happy unless we do forgive those who have injured us. The angry man always inflicts more pain on himself than on any one else. God has ordained, that anger and happiness shall not dwell in the same individual. And if this passion dwells in Jehovah, he must be the most wretched being in the universe. We may rest assured, therefore, that something else is meant, where anger is ascribed to God, in the Scriptures, than that he is possessed of human passions. The Lord of the universe is perfect in all his attributes, and unchangeable in all his ways. Let us strive to be governed according to the principles of his government, and we may be certain that in loving him, we love the great, the good and the infinite.

HOME.

BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

How many delightful associations and tender recollections centre in that little word, HOME! The heart of that man must be cold, indeed, which does not dwell sometimes with pleasure, and even rapture, on the home of his childhood. The traveller who is gratifying his taste for science, and love of adventure on distant shores—his society courted by those whose superior talents have rendered their names dear to every lover of genius—derives his greatest happiness from anticipating his return home; when, seated by the happy fireside, or social board, he will recount to a few admiring friends, his "hair-breadth 'scapes," the wonders he has seen, and the attentions he has received. This, undoubtedly, is the feeling which caused the full heart of Goldsmith, seated amid "Alpine solitudes," to travel to the homestead of his youth, occupied by a brother's family, and imagine the joys that centred there—and that, in later days, led him to pour out the anguish of disappointed expectations, in the sweetest strains that mortal poesy ever breathed.

"In all my wanderings round this world of care—
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
I still had hopes, my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close
And keep the flame from wasting by repose:
I still had hopes, (for pride attends us still,) Amidst the swains to show my book-learned skill—
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt and all I saw;
And, as a hare whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence, at first, he flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Home to return—and DIE AT HOME, at last."

But in this world of uncertainty and disappointment, our fondest hopes are often blasted. After an absence of a few years, on returning to our native home, what changes may have been wrought, where we had hoped to find all happy and cheerful as when last we saw them! The hand of death has been there; one whose joyous tones were music to our ears, is missed from the social circle; sickness may have paled the cheek of one whom we left in the bloom of health—or, worse than all, the waywardness of another, who in youth had given promise of virtue and integrity, has caused sadness to be depicted in the countenances of those we love most dear!

If, when our career in life is prosperous and happy, the mind dwells with pleasure on the home and friends we have left, how much more vivid will be the recollection when sickness and disease overtake us! Who, then, can supply the place of an anxious mother, a tender wife, or an affectionate sister? Let us be surrounded with every comfort, and blest with every attention in the power of strangers to bestow—still—still, we are not at home.

In whatever situation we may be placed, let us remember that we are all travellers, destined to the same universal home; and that, in that home we shall meet with no disappointment. There we shall see the friends we have parted with on earth, never to lose sight of them again. Sin and sorrow can never enter that happy place. Let us, then, whether in prosperity, or assailed by sickness and sorrow, always keep in mind the home which God, in his infinite goodness, has prepared for all his children; and may we view death, not as an enemy, but rather as a friend who will introduce us into this blessed abode, where we shall be made partakers of those joys, which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered the heart of man to conceive."

GOOD EXAMPLE.

BY REV. J. E. HOLMES.

"Sound speech that cannot be condemned; that he, that is of the contrary part, may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." Titus ii: 8.

This exhortation of the apostle seems to have been peculiarly appropriate to those whom he addressed, and to all the believers in the Messiah and professors of Christianity, of his time. The language of the text seems to have been directed to Titus, to be by him impressed upon the minds of others. "Young men, likewise, exhort to be sober minded," verse 6.

The importance of the exhortation, will be seen in the fact, that the early believers were not only diligently watched, but were also evilly spoken of, by those who were of a contrary part. They were accused of being "pestilent fellows," "teaching that they might do evil that good might come;" and "turning the world upside down." It became necessary, under these circumstances, that they should use great circumspection, in order that those who accused them should be easily confounded, by being unable to substantiate their charges. The accusers might thus be put to shame, when they found they could point to no single act or speech that was wicked, in those of whom they spoke evil, and thus be made to see the wickedness of their own dispositions, and the depravity of their own minds.

According to the conception of the apostle, there would result another good effect from the believers using "sound speech." Those who spoke of them as evil, would, when they saw their good works, and particularly when they heard their good words—kind, forgiving words—"be led to glorify God in the day of visitation." 1 Peter ii: 12. This is the good effect that, according to the apostle, would result, in the early ages of Christianity, from the good example of those who professed the "faith, that works by love and purifies the heart."

In view of these facts, it becomes necessary for us to inquire, how far this language and these injunctions are applicable to us, as a body, and as individuals. We believe in the system of Christianity, and believe also that Jesus Christ was not only a teacher of the purest morals, but that he is also the brightest example of moral excellence, which it is possible to contemplate. We believe, also, that the apostle was guided in his writings, in his declarations, and his admonitions, by the spirit of divine truth; and that we are morally bound to follow the precepts contained in the Scriptures.—That is, every Universalist believes these positions. We know, also, that our conversation and actions are watched with the closest attention, and that we are spoken of as evildoers, by those who believe contrary to us—that we are accused of almost every species of sin, amidst the dark catalogue of human errors. Hence, the exhortation of the text has peculiar applicability to us. It is, in fact, addressed to us, though not as immediately, yet as properly as to the early believers. We are expressly required to use "sound speech, that cannot be condemned"—that cannot be justly quoted to injure the cause of the Gospel of universal grace—speech, that will not give those of a contrary part an opportunity to say of us, with justice, that we are immoral and profane.

On this subject it is necessary for us to exercise peculiar care, for several weighty reasons. 1. Because it may be that we have been heretofore indifferent in this respect, and have given those, who delight in it, the opportunity justly to speak evil of us. 2. As brethren of a common faith, we are bound to do all in our power to promote the welfare of each other. 3. Because the world has shown too much willingness to affix a stigma upon us, and we all know that with a body, as with an individual, a suspicion of want of integrity, though groundless, is difficult to be removed. The world has said that we are licentious, and pertinaciously adheres to the allegation; and it needs a moral argument—the pure and upright walk and godly conversation of every individual who professes to rejoice in the hope of a glorious and happy immortality—to remove this objection, and put those who use it, to shame.

It is not sufficient that we are able to point to examples of good, moral, religious men of our order. It is necessary that every professor of the doctrine we believe, should be so. It is not sufficient to compare ourselves with our neighbors of a contrary part, and tell them to pluck the beam out of their own eye. It will furnish no excuse for iniquity, because we discover it among those who speak evil of us. Neither will it avail to say, that, as a body, we are as moral as other orders. It is necessary for each individual to exhibit such moral actions, that an enlightened conscience will find nothing to condemn. We should not compare ourselves among ourselves, and be satisfied with that; but cautiously compare ourselves with the standard of Christ. This would remove the objection, so often, and I fear so effectually urged upon many minds, to the prejudice of our glorious faith. It would put those to shame who use it, when they were challenged to point to an example of immorality among us, and could find none.

It may be considered of the first importance that we use "sound speech," for then sound acts will most naturally follow. For if "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," and we exercise a judicious control over our speech, there will be little difficulty in exhibiting corresponding acts. Our duty will be performed, only by carefully instilling into the mind, that correct train of thought, those pure moral feelings, that spirit of grateful devotion to God, which will prompt us to think and speak of him with reverence, and of our fellow-men with a benevolent and forgiving spirit. A deep sense of gratitude to God, and love to man, will exercise a purifying influence over our thoughts; and the transcript of those thoughts, as it appears in speech, will be sound—not to be condemned. By this means, then, we will not only put to silence those who speak evil of us, but will "cause them to glorify God in the day of visitation."

IMPORTANT THOUGHT.

"God being infinitely good in his own nature, it is impossible for us to think him better than he is; and, therefore, every false notion we entertain of his goodness, must detract from it, and so much as we detract from his goodness, so much we detract from the principal reason and motive of our loving him." Reader, should we not do well to think him all goodness, that we might have no other motive or reason, but to love him supremely and continually? T.

JUSTICE AND SALVATION.

The Bible says that God "is a just God and a Saviour." To suit the views of our Partialist brethren, who contend that, if God is just, he cannot save, or if he saves, he cannot be just, according as circumstances may require, it should read, "He is not a just God, but a Saviour," or, "He is not a Saviour, but a just God." ANECDOTE.

"Farewell," said a bigoted blue light, as he gave the parting hand to a relative, who was a preacher of Universalism—"Farewell; I hope we may meet again in this world, for I have no hopes of meeting you in heaven." "Farewell," replied the Universalist, calmly, I hope to meet you in heaven; and if I do, I shall expect, of course, to see every body else there."

TALENTED PREACHERS.

Gentlemen Editors—An article appeared in number five, current volume of Magazine and Advocate, under this head, and signed "Puff;" in which the writer complains that he cannot understand certain calls for preachers, which are to the following effect:—"Wanted, talented, young, judicious, good, and true preachers." Now, to my mind, all these terms are perfectly intelligible to any one who has "one talent;" and as I am not disposed to think that any approved preacher of Universalism has not at least one talent, I am therefore rather inclined to the opinion, that the writer was rather in a puffing mood than otherwise, when he penned the article under notice. But if he was in sober earnest; it may not be amiss to state a few facts for his especial benefit.

Then, it doubtless was never in the mind of those making such calls, that the preacher must be a boy, but one in the prime of life, or a young man; chiefly, because they do not deem themselves able to support an experienced one, and because more bodily exertion may be necessary than they would like to impose on an old preacher, or than such preacher may wish to subject himself to. As for talented, judicious, good, and true preachers, I think there is nothing very unreasonable in those requirements; especially as the absence of any one of the above named acquirements would be considered a fundamental defect. If "Puff" will refer to the proceedings of at least two of the Associations in this State, for the year past, he will see, that even Universalist ministers can commit errors—as great a solecism as he may think is involved in the phrase, "BAD UNIVERSALIST." I admit that they are but seldom, yet it is notorious that they do sometimes occur, and that they may occur as seldom as possible, I think those making such calls, are perfectly justified in saying what they want, and what they expect if their calls are answered. As for the "standards of talent, goodness, etc.," I think any man can determine, with sufficient certainty, whether he has an improvable talent; and if so, he may set it down as a matter of fact, that he is embraced in the call, and act accordingly; for those who are destitute of the regular ministrations of the word, are not apt to be difficult; and I think seldom or never will be so, when they see the preacher's talent improving.

JUDICIOUS PREACHERS.

A writer in No. 5, over the signature of "Puff," says he "frequently sees notices of the want of talented, young, judicious, good and true preachers of Universalism;" and complains that "for the life of him, he cannot understand what they mean."

Now, so far as regards judicious preachers, I will humbly endeavor to throw some faint light upon the subject; and perhaps as successful a way as any will be, to attempt it negatively, by suggesting certain traits in ministerial character, which I think would go to constitute an injurious preacher.

In the first place, however, to avoid a misunderstanding, we will define terms. The term judicious, then, I understand to mean the same as wise, circumspect, discreet, or prudent. And by a judicious preacher, I understand, a preacher who is wise, circumspect, discreet and prudent, not in his preaching only, but in the general tenor of his life and conversation. We are now ready to consider some traits which go to constitute an injurious preacher.

1. Too much conceit, or self-esteem.—It is injurious in a preacher, when advised or cautioned by his superiors in information and experience, and who are authorized to administer reproof and counsel to the injurious, to attribute it to envy, and a desire to crush those talents which they cannot rival. It is injurious in an illiterate and ignorant preacher, who mutilates grammar in almost every sentence; and commits high treason against logic and sound theology, in almost every sermon; to suppose himself a paragon of eloquence and talent.

2. Too great a desire for admiration and applause—or too much approbation, as a phrenologist would say. For instance, when an individual, in order to get credit for an extraordinary reformation in morals, exaggerates the badness of his former character, in so great a degree, as to lose reputation both for modesty and veracity. Or when a preacher tells of riding fifty miles, after dinner, to attend an evening appointment. Thus, in seeking credit for zeal and perseverance, he loses the credit of being "merciful to his beast;" and sinks the dignity of the clergyman in the character of postillion. Also, when a young man, in order to appear witty and confident, "o'ersteps the modesty of nature," and violates good manners.

3. Too much gallantry.—As when an unmarried preacher pays such "marked attention" to every graceful young female, within the circle of his labors, that when he marries, a dozen others are disappointed. Or who, in a mixed company, will neglect or interrupt the conversation of elderly men on serious subjects, for the purpose of bandying compliments, speaking soft nothing's or gallanting the ladies around the room to the annoyance of his equals and the grief of his seniors.

In short, any conduct is injurious, in the clergyman, which tends in any obvious way, to injure his good name, or wound the cause in which he is engaged. And in this view of the subject, there are many things not morally criminal in themselves considered, which are nevertheless injurious in the preacher, because they are inappropriate and unbecoming. For instance, it is not immoral, in the boy, to chase a hoop along the street, or raise a kite; neither is it inappropriate or injurious. Now it would be no more immoral in the clergyman; but it would be extremely injurious, because it would appear unbecoming to the common sense of community.

The same may be said in regard to the levities and eccentricities which impair the usefulness of many gifted, but injurious preachers. A judicious preacher has exhorted, "Abstain from all appearance of evil." (1 Thes. v: 22.)

LETTER V.

To Rev. Josiah Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them."
1 Timothy iv: 15.

DEAR SIR—You next proceed and say:—"Having stated our views in these propositions, we will now proceed to the proof. When God placed Adam in the garden of Eden, he commanded him, saying, 'Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.'" You say—"The question arises, what is implied in this penalty? Does it comprehend moral death only; or does it include temporal, moral, and eternal death? The word death, in this place, is to be understood in its broadest sense, as including death temporal, moral and eternal." So says J. Keyes, in order, I suppose, to support the creed of his church and himself. But Br. Keyes should remember he is "to show" what it means.

In order to get a starting hold of the subject, it will be well to notice that the word death (singular) does not mean deaths (plural), therefore the penalty means the dying one death. The Scriptures say—"in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." It is not, "thou shalt surely die morally, temporally and eternally;"—neither is it, "thou shalt surely die three times;"—nor "three deaths." You will not be disposed to add to the word of God, neither will you extend it by construction. You say, "the word death in this place is to be understood in its broadest sense, as including death temporal, moral and eternal." Do you pretend to include more than one death? if so, then it ought to mean deaths, and you should have shown an error in the translation, or a typographical error, and that death (singular) is implied in the version when it ought to be deaths (plural). If it means but one death—"thou shalt surely die"—in your "attempt" you had the privilege of investigation and "showing" what that death was in fact. I think you will, on a moment's reflection, see your understanding come from popular opinion rather than accurate reading of the Scriptures. I shall "attempt to show" what that death was at a future time.

You proceed and say—"That it included temporal death is clear from the sentence that God pronounced upon Adam, after the transgression—"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread until thou return to the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. iii: 19. You add, "that the Judge of all the earth had a direct reference to temporal death in this part of the curse, is exceedingly obvious, for he says, 'dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return.'" It is true, the Judge refers to temporal death, and the reason is given why Adam should return to dust—and the reason is, because he was of the dust—"for dust thou art," etc.—"for out of it (the ground) wast thou taken," etc. The word for, is here used as synonymous with because—expressive of a reason. God declared that Adam should eat bread by the sweat of his face until he should return to the dust; and then he rendered a reason why he should return. It was not because Adam had transgressed that he should return—but because he was out of the ground—of dust, etc. Temporal death was an inevitable and dependent consequence upon the fact that Adam was of dust. Yes, temporal death was as certain upon Adam, from the time of his first creation, as that he was of dust. And I think I can convince you, before I leave you, that God originally intended, and before the transgression of Adam, that Adam should eat bread from his toils, or "in the sweat" of his "face" until he returned unto the ground; and that what you have stated to be a curse was a declaration of truth known and designed of God before the eating of the forbidden fruit by our first parents.

You say—"This was included in the general curse, and therefore constituted a part of it, (meaning temporal death,) hence, we conclude if man had not sinned he had not died; for where is the propriety of inflicting the punishment of death upon the transgressor for crime, seeing he would have died had he never sinned? In this case it could have been no punishment for sin, and it was a mere farce in pretending to inflict it as such." If we were to take for granted what you assume—that is, that temporal death was the penalty of transgression, there may be some coloring of plausibility in your reasoning. But if it be any other death, then you will, without any difficulty, see that your argument is sophistical. And it will be incumbent upon you "to show" several deaths before you can be allowed to jump from one to another, and then unite three in one and have one to be three, for the speculations of your creed and church. If you go upon the grounds of supposition, or as you term it, understanding, you may as well "understand" the word death in a still *broad*er sense, and suppose and say it means twenty deaths. I believe, and shall "attempt to show" at the proper time, that temporal death of man was the original design of God, and that Adam died the death (not temporal) consequent upon his disobedience—and thus vindicate the ways of God and give him supremacy over all, ascribing to him the honor of doing all things after the counsel of his own will, and punishing every transgressor according to the deserts of each.

Again you say—"hence we conclude if man had not sinned, he had not died." I will admit that, if Adam had not sinned, he had not died the death consequent upon, or which is, the wages of sin. But whether he sinned or not, the great event of death temporal was before him, stamped upon his material nature and involved in the truth that he was of the dust, and therefore must have returned to dust again.

It would seem, by the strange doctrine which you teach, that God created man immortal, and man made himself mortal. If we look for a moment to the definition and meaning of the words, the gross absurdity of the position will appear. Dr.

Johnson defines immortal to mean "exemption from death, never to die; never-ending; perpetual." And he defines mortal to mean, "subject to death; doomed sometime to die; deadly; destructive; bringing death," etc. We cannot conceive, with the approbation of even a freakish imagination, how it can be that man, when immortal (never to die; exempt from death) in his nature and in his creation, and thus constituted and formed by his God, could make himself mortal (subject to death). Nothing short of a disposition to have all things pertaining to religion clothed in mystery, will allow a man to receive such gross absurdities, as truths. You, Sir, must say you cannot understand this twist of your faith, and, must throw the rug of boasted mystery over it, in order to sustain your dogma of eternal death. Were you to exhibit such absurd and outrageous views on subjects of common place and daily interchange with the "people of the world," you would be called deranged, and justly too. Yea, were you to hear a man in common conversation, take such positions and use such arguments, you would readily call him an ignoramus—a foolish man—a swallower of great absurdities. It is a pity people will not reason on the subject of the Scriptures.

We are admonished "to be ready always to render a reason for our hope," then certainly we should exercise our wisdom in ascertaining the grounds of our hope. More soon. AMICUS.

[The following would form a very proper set-off to the false tales our Partialist brethren are so fond of telling about Universalists.]

ANECDOTE.....A FACT.

During the exercises of one of the Partialist singing schools in this city, not many months since, an Indian, very much intoxicated, staggered into their room, and united with them. The choir not approving such specimens of sacred music as his, and being unable to proceed with their exercises while thus annoyed, one of their number undertook to expel him. The poor Oneida not relishing such rudeness, exclaimed with great indignation, and greatly to the amusement of all present, "You good man! I good man. You Christian? I Christian, too—I METHODIST!" W. SCRIPTURAL INTERPRETER.

MATTHEW III: 7, 10, 12, AND LUKE III: 7, 9, 17.

These passages in the two books are parallel. Both use the same figures and refer to the same events. The phrases "wrath to come," "fire," and "unquenchable fire," are by many supposed to countenance the doctrine of endless wo—or, at least, refer to it. I will give a few of the reasons and authorities on which I rely to prove a different construction to be true.

I. "O generation of vipers! who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?"

1. The persons addressed by the baptizer were Pharisees and Sadducees—members of two Jewish sects. Even if the first believed in the doctrine of endless misery, (which is doubtful,) it is certain the Sadducees did not. So far from it, they did not even believe in any state of existence beyond the grave—for they contended that such a state was not revealed in the law of Moses. No intimation is given that the preaching of John had converted them—not even that he had attempted their conversion. Yet when Jesus confounded this same people, the fact is clearly recorded, and even the argument is set down which confounded them. See Matt. xxii: 23-35, and the parallel passages in Mark and Luke. Of course, they, at this time, were Sadducees, and the "wrath to come," of which they had been warned and from which they were fleeing, was not a wrath in which they had no belief.

2. A wrath to come for the disobedience of the Jewish nation, was revealed in the law, (Levit. xxvi. and Deut. xviii. and xxviii.) and frequently foretold in the prophets. (Isa. lxvi: 22-24; Jerem. vii: 29-34, and xix.) But it is admitted, by many of the best commentators of various Partialist denominations, that the doctrine of endless misery was not revealed in the Old Testament. Of course, as the Gospel dispensation was not yet established, nor the New Testament published, it could not here be preached nor referred to.

3. Standard Partialist writers refer these passages to the destruction about to fall on the Jews. Dr. Clarke, the great Methodist commentator, describes this phrase as meaning, "the desolation which was about to fall on the Jewish nation for their wickedness, and threatened them in the last words of their own Scriptures. See Malachi iv: 6." To this sentiment, the learned Lightfoot, Bishop Pearce, Hammond and Kenrick, all agree, as may be seen by consulting the works named at the close of this article.

II. "Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire"—and—"he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." These passages are clearly synonymous, and relate to the same subject. An explanation of the strongest expression will, therefore, explain the weakest. And here, be it remembered that the first and second reasons of the first division of this article, will apply as strongly here as they did there. I pass, then, to observe

1. Instead of regarding fire as denoting something necessarily very evil or wholly destructive or tormenting, we should remember that it is one of the purest and most purifying substances known. Hence, God and Jesus are both compared to fire. Deut. iv: 24, and Malachi iii: 2. Hence a baptism with the Holy Ghost and with fire is one of the excellencies ascribed to the mission and government of Jesus. See context, also, 1 Cor. iii: 11-15. Hence, also, the word and ministers of God are compared to fire. Jer. xxii: 29, and Ps. civ: 4. As a symbol of purity and an emblem of Deity it was and is yet extensively worshipped by the Persians and others. Its purifying nature also (probably) caused our Saviour to use it as an emblem of that persecution which his doctrines would excite among the corrupted Jews of his day, and by which his professed disciples would be tried—for persecution purges the drossy members from community. See Luke xii: 49. And this well known nature of fire, as well as the severity of pain its burnings can inflict, has undoubtedly caused it to be used in the Bible as an emblem of punishment. To show the severity and uncontrollable duration of that punishment, it is called unquenchable, everlasting, etc.—that is, man shall have no power to put it out—it will burn until its fuel shall be utterly consumed—until the purpose is effected for which it was first kindled. Prov. xxvi: 20—it is not quenched, it goeth out. In Isa. xxxiv: 8-16, temporal punishment is compared to a fire that shall not be quenched; yet (mark this!) "the cormorant and the bittern," "the owl and the raven" were to live in that fire, which was to last forever and ever. In Jer. vii: 20, you will read of another unquenchable fire in this world, for beasts and trees were to be consumed by it. See, also, Jer. xvii: 27, and Ezek. xxvii: 47, 48. This, I trust, will suffice to show that the phrase "unquenchable fire," or "fire that shall not be quenched," is used in the Bible to denote severe temporal punishments.

2. On this, as on the phrase "wrath to come," the most eminent commentators among our opposers, agree with us. The opinion of Dr. Clarke, following, is also that of Dr. Gill, Hammond, Lightfoot, Cappe, Kenrick, Pearce, and Le Clerc.

"Whose fan is in his hand.—The Romans are here termed God's fan, as in verse 10 they are termed his axe; and in chap. xxii: 7 they are termed his troops or armies. His floor.—Does not this mean the land of Judea, which has been long, as it were, the threshing floor of the Lord? God says he will now, by the winnowing fan [viz., the Romans] thoroughly cleanse this floor:—the wheat—those who believe in the Lord Jesus—he will gather into his garner, either take to heaven from the evil to come, or put in a place of safety, as he did the Christians, by sending them to Pella, in Cælo-Syria, previously to the destruction of Jerusalem. But he will burn up the chaff—the disobedient and rebellious Jews who would not come unto Christ that they might have life. Unquenchable fire:—i. e., that cannot be extinguished by man."

So says Dr. Adam Clarke, and because what he here says agrees with the subject, the context, and Scripture usage, we believe he says right.

N. B. If the reader wishes to examine these subjects further, or to read quotations from the Partialist commentators above named, he can be amply gratified by consulting Ballou on the Parables, (edition of 1832,) pp. 15-26; Whittemore on the Parables, (edition of 1834,) pp. 35-46; and Paige's Selections, pp. 24-32. EDUCATION.

I earnestly commend the article under this heading, from the pen of Br. Austin, to the careful perusal and candid attention of every reader of this paper. It is on one of the most momentous earthly subjects that ever engaged any man's attention. In my humble opinion, it should be copied into every newspaper and magazine, secular or ecclesiastical, in our country. Let each subscriber living near a newspaper establishment, ask its Editor to give it a conspicuous insertion, and no small service will thus be rendered to our common country.

This is no sectarian, no sectional plan—it should be guarded against ever becoming one—but is a subject on which every American can and should heartily unite. Let the people speak—let them but awake to the immense importance of this subject, and demand a system of useful popular education, and the work is done. We have sectarian colleges in plenty for the rich, every where—we want schools, as liberally endowed, for the people.

As to the particular plan, that is a mere trifle—fix on one that can be altered and improved as circumstances or expediency may require, and almost any State or national system will be better than none.

"What constitutes a State?"

Not high-raised battlements, or labored mound,
Thick wall, or moated gate;
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crowned;
No! me, high-minded men—
Men, who their duties know—
But know their rights; and, knowing, dare maintain—
THESE constitute a STATE."

TRIFLES.

If there is any sin in joking, I am in a poor way of becoming a practical Perfectionist in this life. For I love a joke occasionally—especially after a day of hard study, close confinement, or perplexing cares. Bless you, reader, a joke is better than medicine, in such cases! Many a fit of dyspepsia is dispelled by an indulgence in the harmless laugh occasioned by jokes acted, said, sung, read, or imagined. For, joking apart, dear reader, I have quietly imagined many a joke that has cost me more hearty merriment, when no one was by to witness it, than many a wiser man's real jokes. But to my work.

Br. Drew is making quite merry with the word "article" used by me to designate Mrs. Scott's "Blind Widow and her Family." Well—well—e'en let him laugh—better be merry than sad at my expense.

The truth is, I had intended to number the tale, narrative and essays, and those that word because it would designate each of them. But my foreman, hating a number to a heading, omitted it, leaving the "article" alone. Having a little esprit du corps myself, I could do no less than forgive him; and must now pocket the jokes as best I may.

Next time I will apply to one of the "wise men of the East" for some of their "notions"—perhaps they can invent some new word, as "con-spute" or "tria-logue," or some other half-Latin and half-Greek mixture, which shall sound so large that no one will dare laugh at it, however lamely its parts may fit, or inaptly it may express my meaning.

By-the-by, Br. Drew—in alluding to the ridiculous attempt of our cousins of the Messenger to evade the charge of believing in "universal salvation," by saying they believe in the "salvation of all men," and in asking them if they remember the famous war which raged in the Christian church some dozen centuries ago, respecting two words—Br. Drew, I say, mis-spells the two important causes of the ancient war. The parties were Homoousians and Homoiousians. There was but an iota (a Greek i) difference between them, in fact—but more in meaning than there is between "Universalist," and "a believer in the salvation of all men." He that would be merry at other's expense, should take care that the reckoning is not paid out of his own pocket. But, pshaw! I am moralizing where I intended only to trifles.

FUNERAL SERMONS.

As it is very seldom possible for Br. Skinner or myself to go into the country and attend funerals on week days—and still less possible (I might almost say never possible) on Sundays—perhaps the publication of this fact may save some persons a wearisome and painful journey—especially during the early part of Winter, and during those seasons when one or the other will be attending Associations. As for myself, the times when I will hereafter be able to go, (except in the societies where I statedly minister,) will be so few, that I need not be at all depended upon. It is painful to refuse—but the nature of the business in which I am engaged, and to which I must give all my leisure time, or disappoint thousands and ruin myself, imperiously imposes on me the necessity of refusing in almost, if not quite every case.

I have long desired to summon resolution sufficient to speak plainly, yet affectionately on this very delicate subject—doubly delicate, because my motives in doing so, are very liable to be misunderstood by all who do not sufficiently know me. The present is probably the most favorable opportunity that may ever offer—unless I do it anonymously, a mode of writing I much dislike when serious subjects are concerned. If what I say injures me in the estimation of those who do not know me well enough to allow me to be disinterested, the consolation, that I suffer for the probable benefit of many a poor, and injured, and suffering brother in the ministry of universal reconciliation, must be my support.

What I would respectfully say, is this:—Many of our lay brethren are not sufficiently thoughtful respecting the abilities, comforts and wants of their preachers, on these occasions. Sometimes a preacher is so suddenly called upon to attend a funeral, that he has scarcely time to dispose of his domestic affairs so that they can wait his return—and no time to prepare for the duties he has to perform. It is not every one that can officiate thus unpreparedly, to the satisfaction of a congregation.

But more frequently, by denying himself of the whole or part of a night's sleep, the preacher can prepare himself. Then, perhaps early in the morning, he must ride some fifteen to thirty miles, through such weather as may happen. After this, unless he has the frame of Atlas, he must need rest and refreshment. But there is no time for either—the people are waiting. He delivers his message of sympathy and consolation, and then, only, satisfies the wants of a frame injured beyond recovery, under a whole week. One brother told me he had once attended a funeral, under similar circumstances—rode, early in the morning, thirty miles, against a bitter wind—officiated—received the thanks of the disconsolate but wealthy widower—rode several miles back to a tavern—there bespoke and ate a hasty dinner, or supper—paid for it out of an almost exhausted purse, and returned late that night to his house—and probably told the keeper of the livery stable "charge the horse hire," for he had not enough money in the world to pay it! I know this is an extreme case—but even such sometimes happen; and others, not quite as bad, but bad enough in all conscience, happen too often. Not long ago I heard that another brother had been called to go some distance to attend a funeral. He started early in the morning. Cold with the ride, he arrived at a crowded house—suffered long there—then had to go several miles to the meeting-house—suffered there—and returned home without having tasted any refreshment during the whole day.—Whether he received enough to compensate him for leaving his business at home, and to pay his horse hire, I did not learn. Add to this, that persons of sedentary habits cannot as well bear the cold or exhaustion of travel, as those who labor out of doors, and that public speaking under such circumstances is very ruinous to the constitution, and the evil is of sufficient magnitude to warrant this notice of it.

No other profession or employment is asked to bear such things. Call on a farmer to quit his work—hire a horse, or even use his own—travel fifteen or twenty miles—thresh, or plough, or reap for you several hours, without previous refreshment, and previously manufacturing his tools to do it with—then thank him, and leave him return home and pay his expenses out of his own pocket, and he will deem himself rather scurvily treated; and indeed, I doubt whether he will submit to it. Yet such is the treatment received by many, if not nearly all of our preachers, time after time, and who are far less wealthy, than farmers generally are, and therefore, far less able to bear not only the fatigues, but the expense also. As for the labor, I have labored in a lumber yard, and in a harvest field, by the day, and can truly say, the bodily labor is less exhausting to body and mind—less injurious to health and constitution—than is mental labor continued for the same length of time and with the same earnestness.

But enough. Will our lay brethren endeavor to remember these remarks against a time of need? I have given no cases of my own experience, nor for my own benefit; but I have seen and heard of the sufferings of others until my heart has felt for them, and therefore have I written what I do hope our readers will remember.

FALSE REPORT CONTRADICTED.

Br. B. S. Keeler, of Middleville, writes us on the 13th inst., as follows:—

"Br. SKINNER—There is a story in circulation in this vicinity, to this effect:—That you and Elder Puffer have lately had an oral debate, in which he had the pleasure of stopping your mouth, inasmuch that you confessed your utter inability to sustain your system any longer. I can learn nothing of the time and place of this wonderful achievement of Methodist prowess. As I am not in the habit of believing all the stories they put afloat in these latter days of wonders, I thought I would drop you a line and request you to inform the public whether this story is true or false."

In answer to the above, we need only say, that we never, to our knowledge, saw or spoke with Elder Puffer but once, and that was in the pulpit at Middleville, nearly two years since, at the time we had the discussion with Elder Lake, the Free-will Baptist. And certainly, we then had no debate with Elder Puffer. And we are not aware that even the most strenuous opposers of Universalism claimed any advantage over us at that time, even by the united efforts of the two Elders. It is needless for us to say the report is false.

UNIVERSALISM IN NEW-YORK.

Were it not to redeem a promise, I would not, at this late hour, pen this article. But having promised to give some account of our cause in this State, I proceed to glean all the information I can from the various letters received from different sections. I shall not be very methodical in arranging the places named.

Newport, Herkimer county.—Br. Whitney wrote us, some time ago, that our friends are arousing themselves to form a society, and obtain stated preaching part of the time. He very pertinently remarks, on this subject:—

"It is frequently the case that a bad cause will prevail over a good one, because the friends of the former, conscious of its corruption, spare no pains in its behalf; while those of the latter, believing its merit a sufficient recommendation, are prone to negligence in its support. It is not enough; therefore, that we place our principles in contrast with their opposite, and rely upon the benevolence and good sense of mankind to make a selection. We cannot expect our cause to advance while we are sleeping upon our posts. If we could see our principles 'written in sunbeams on the arch of heaven,' it would avail us nothing without our own exertions. Even the doctrine of Universalism, with all its claims on our reception, could never, of itself, give happiness and virtue to the world. We are called upon to 'labor' in its promulgation, as well as to 'suffer reproach because we trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men.'"

Stafford, Genesee county.—A worthy Br. in this section, sends us, beside other encouragement, the following brief but cheering account of our cause there:—"The cause is prospering in this place, to quite an extent, and many are beginning to search the Scriptures to see what God has revealed. Your paper, also, is working almost miracles in this land." By letters from Br. Peck and others, we feel assured that Genesee county will be shoulder to shoulder with the other sections of our State wherein the cause is rapidly advancing.

Chenango county.—In South New-Berlin our friends were unfortunate in the selection of a preacher, whose conduct discouraged and dispirited too many. We have heard, however, that they are awaking from sadness and apathy, and preparing to occupy their beautiful meeting-house steadily, by supporting some one whose labors will build them up in the most holy faith they profess. They are able—may the will not be wanting.

In Norwich we are informed the state of affairs is yet discouraging—our few active and efficient friends, even, seem to despond, and there are wanting those to encourage them with other assistance than words. I could weep when I reflect on the prospect blasted by the mismanagement of one or two, and the supineness of others—but Pandora's box, however full of evils, still has hope, at the bottom. May we not hope that the numbers and strength which really do belong to us in this thriving village and its vicinity, will yet have "the breath of life" (zeal) breathed into them, and live?

In Oxford the cause is as steadily prosperous as it is steadily discouraging in Norwich. In Macdonough, also, where Br. Doolittle labors a portion of his time, we infer, from a considerable accession to our list, the cause cannot be retrograding.

In Lisle and other places in that section which are blessed with the labors of Br. C. S. Brown, "there appears an engagedness" (to use the words of Br. B.) "and an increased devotion to subjects of a religious nature. The general sentiment appears to be, Let us imitate the Bereans of old—search the Scriptures daily, and see whether these things are so. The consequence is, a better and more extensive charity prevails; and I am inclined to believe that, could the public be freed from those spiritual taskmasters who are continually binding heavy burdens on men's shoulders, (which they themselves are not willing to move,) we should soon see community generally uniting in peace. The truth is, in this part of God's heritage, the people have gone beyond their preachers in point of liberality, and it is only to be feared that, as they have been grievously imposed upon, they will be—come jealously cautious and fearful, and will not stop to examine the liberty of the Gospel with sufficient care and candor. With the superstitions of a false, too many are apt to reject also the consolations of a true religion."—"True—true—but how unwise is the man who flings away a purse full of genuine coin, because he has been duped into receiving a few counterfeit pieces!"

From Hoosic Falls, an active correspondent writes:—"Though we cannot boast of many valuable accessions to our ranks, yet the cause moves forward steadily. Men begin to open the eyes of their understandings and look upon the truth with a more favorable countenance. They will now, generally, read and examine for themselves, and are becoming more jealous of the claims of Partialism to exclusive orthodoxy and piety. By-the-by, self-styled Orthodoxy has grown less and less popular ever since that scourge of community, Foot, was here, and deluded and distracted many with his blasphemous and soul-chilling heresies of damnation and doctrines of devils. Heaven be praised, the delusion has been short as it has been grievous, and nearly all have again been restored to their senses."

Br. Eaton writes us respecting the state of the cause at Fulton, Oswego county, (his present residence,) and compares it with the state of things at Wolcott, Wayne county, two years ago, (where he then resided,) and with the change since then, as follows:—

"Our cause at Fulton seems to be quite prosperous. Measures have been commenced already, having for their object the erection of a meeting-house next Summer or Fall. I think the prospects of our friends are equally as good as they were at Wolcott two years ago, where they now have a neat and comfortable meeting-house to meet in from Sunday to Sunday, and a pastor to go in and out before them, teaching them the Gospel of the grace of God. Long may they enjoy these blessed benefits of their faithful labors, each man sitting under his own vine and fig tree! A little more than one year ago, the Presbyterians refused the Wolcott society the use of the Presbyterian meeting-house, on a week day, in which to perform the services of my ordination. Since then what a change! Their prejudices are now so much softened down as to allow them to meet with the Universalists, in the new meeting-house owned exclusively by the latter! God grant it may soon be thus at Fulton! Br. Cook is very well beloved at Wolcott."

From South Cameron, Steuben county, our worthy agent writes:—

"It affords me great pleasure to solicit subscribers for the Magazine and Advocate, which comes so well freighted with the glad tidings of great joy, and has been instrumental in convincing many that God will have all men to be saved. It has effected much good in this section, though it has not been as widely circulated as it might have been. [If he keeps on, it will soon be pretty well circulated in his neighborhood. Ed.] * * * I came into this part of the State in 1826, poor in purse but rich in faith. Not wishing to act the hypocrite, my sentiments soon became known, and were regarded with astonishment and terror. But it is not so uncommon now to see persons holding the terrible belief, that all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn to the Lord. Indeed, some of the principal professors of Partialism have come to this light, and the Limitarian clergy say the most prominent people here are Universalists; so that they despair getting up what they call a revival in this section. You will see by an extract from my letter in number 11, vol. vi., that we commenced holding meetings every Sunday, more than a year ago, for social worship and reading sermons. We still continue this practice to very good success. Our remote situation and limited means prevent us from getting a preacher at present."

He concludes by requesting that notices of Conferences be given considerably before hand; as they did not receive notice of the one at Kennedyville till after the appointed day. This by way of parenthesis.

Br. A Williams, now of Carroll, writes that, since his arrival in Chautauque county, he had itinerated almost constantly.

"The cause of truth, generally, is very prosperous. Our friends are spirited and resolute in advancing the faith they so ardently cherish. Many have been released from the bondage of fear, and have enlisted under the banner of universal Love, to dispel the clouds of darkness. * * * Our friends are not ignorant nor unmindful of these elating truths, and hence, exert themselves with the ardor of affection, to secure for themselves all the peace which the Gospel in its purity so richly imparts, and to cause others to taste the sweetness of God's grace, and the excellency of his wisdom."

Were not this article too long already—in despite of omissions most reluctantly made in quotations from some of the letters—I would add several others, of the same tenor, from other sections. But suffice it to say, the good work is steadily and surely progressing—our periodicals are valuable instruments in giving light to them that sit in shadows and darkness—our preachers are running to and fro, and knowledge is increasing—our congregations are becoming larger and more numerous—and, in short, the present year, will witness a glorious and happy increase of our numbers, our diligence and zeal—our knowledge and virtues—our prosperity and our joy! Let every man do his duty, and fear not for the result.

OUR PAPER.

At the close of the last week, (eighth number,) we had given to our readers thirty-six communications, from twenty-four different, well known correspondents, (the most of whom are engaged as regular contributors,) besides thirty-six articles from upwards of twenty anonymous contributors, a quantity of editorial correspondence, one sermon, and various editorial articles from the three Editors—all original in this paper—and various selected items. This week we present two new names, (new to this volume, though well known and highly prized by the readers of our former volumes.) There are several others, as valued and well known, who have promised us regular or occasional articles, but who have not yet found time to commence fulfilling. When all these shall have come to our aid, realizing that on each one we depend for assistance in elevating the literary and Christian character of our paper, I have no doubt (God helping us) of our success in making it an extensively powerful and useful instrument in spreading the doctrine of Universalism among our opposers, and increasing its practice among ourselves. But, oh, how dependant are we on others for the execution of our designs! Without constant aid from our able and excellent correspondents, we have nothing to send—without prompt and extensive support from our subscribers, we have nothing to send it on; and without the active and zealous exertions of our agents and friends, in procuring us subscribers, we have no one to send it to! Good Heaven! What is individual independence? A name without a subject—a shadow without a substance! If we had not unlimited confidence in God, who rules and directs all things, and inclines the hearts of his children even as the canals of waters are turned, we would be despondent and despairing indeed. But, to the object of this article.

I hope to be excused for calling the attention of our readers to the foregoing facts, for the purpose of satisfying them that we have done something, at least, towards rendering our humble sheet instructive and interesting to them, and useful to the cause. As we have begun, I think we can hold out to the end. Disappointments we know are unavoidable, and will do all we can to guard against them. But all common events considered, we can do even as we have done. If so—and we ask no one to take our paper any longer than it deserves to be supported—will not our patrons who have not exerted themselves hitherto, and who have liberal neighbors, able to take this paper, (in addition to any others they may now be patronizing, or who have no religious paper,) ask them to examine, and make up their minds on the subject of taking the Magazine and Advocate? Or, if they prefer some other, let them take some sister periodical—the Union, the Herald, or some more distant one, East, West or South—we had much rather they would take any than none.

We may seem very importunate on this subject—and we are so—for, in truth, the present should be a year of general, prudent, earnest action in our whole order—with every Universalist—for the greater spread and firmer establishment of the Gospel God preached to Abraham. We mean to do our share. And believing that every copy of our paper that can be put into circulation, will do its share, I urge this matter thus importunately. To meet the wants of inquirers, I have commenced the Scriptural Interpreter, which you will find in another column. Br. Skinner's Reasons will be another aid. Br. Spear's Ramblers—Br. Fuller's Differences—all—all will push the chariot of the Lord gloriously onward to triumph over error, and salvation from sin!

We have a few hundred files of the present volume yet on hand, which we hope will be taken up very soon; as, if they are not, we must lose their cost thus far, and lessen our edition to our actual circulation for the future—for we cannot afford to print a number of extra copies on risk. Hence, probably, those who delay subscribing may find, too late, and to their and our regret, that perfect files cannot be obtained. "A word to the wise is sufficient," says the old proverb—what person, then, can complain, seeing I have given them so many words?

THE FALL OF JERICHO.*

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

Now the gates of the city no longer unfold,
For the tale of the spies unto JOSHUA is told;
And not one may now enter or one from it go,
For the camp of JEHOVAH lies near JERICHO.

And its songs were all hush'd and its streets were all still'd,
For a dread of the mighty had each bosom fill'd;
And wakeful and fearful was each matron and maid,
And JERICHO's warriors and her king were afraid.

And the valiant of ISRAEL were streaming around,
With the ark of the LORD and the trumpet's shrill sound;
While through the still'd city pealed each blast that they blew,
And still louder on each day the strange echoes grew.

Till the sixth day was number'd e'en once on each day,
Did the trumpeter's loud blast resound with dismay,
But the dawn of the seventh came wildest with woe—
With the doom and the downfall of proud JERICHO.

For when seven high peals on the trumpets were heard,
Then the shouts of all ISRAEL convulsively stirr'd
All the strong laid foundations of fair JERICHO,
And her walls and her towers laid prostrate and low.

And the wall of the Canaanite rose on the blast,
As he shrieked in despair, ere he breathed out his last;
And he felt that his idols were worthless and vain,
For the HEBREW had come, and JEHOVAH must reign.

Messrs. EDITORS—Accompanying this, is an extract from one of "Cobb's Juvenile Readers," two numbers of which have been presented to the "Utica Universalist Sunday school" by Mr. Sweet, an agent for the above named work, who will please accept the thanks of the school for this valuable accession to their library—I say valuable, for the child must be dull indeed, who could peruse them without deriving therefrom both pleasure and instruction. I consider the extract well worthy a place in your columns—if you agree with me, by publishing it, you will gratify a

RELIGION.

Religion is the daughter of Heaven, parent of our virtues, and source of all true felicity; she alone gives peace and contentment, divests the heart of anxious cares, bursts on the mind a flood of joy, and sheds unmingled and perpetual sunshine in the pious breast. By her the spirits of darkness are banished from the earth, and angelic ministers of grace thicken unseen the regions of mortality.

She promotes love and good will among men, lifts up the head that hangs down, heals the wounded spirit, dissipates the gloom of sorrow, sweetens the cup of affliction, blunts the sting of death, and wherever seen, felt, and enjoyed, breathes around her an everlasting spring.

Would you wish amidst the great variety of religious systems in vogue, to make a right distinction, and prefer the best? Recollect the character of Christ; keep a steady eye on that universal and permanent good will to men, in which he lived, by which he suffered, and for which he died.

What now would you expect from a mind so purely and habitually benign? Is it possible to suppose, that a heart thus warm and wide could harbor a narrow wish, or utter a partial sentiment? Most luckily in this point, full satisfaction is in every man's power.

Go, search the religion he has left, to the bottom; not in those artificial theories, which have done it the most essential injury; or in their manner, who assume his name, but overlook his example, and who are forever talking about the merits of his death, at the expense of those virtues which adorn his life.

Not in those wild and romantic notions, which, to make us Christians, would make us fools; but in those inspired writings, and in those alone, which contain his genuine history, and his blessed Gospel; and which, in the most peculiar and extensive sense, are the words of eternal life.

Read the Scriptures, then, as you would read the last will of some deceased friend, in which you expected a large bequest; and tell me, in the sincerity of your soul, what you see there to circumscribe the social affections, to crush the risings of benevolence, or to check the generous effusions of humanity. Little-ness of mind and narrowness of temper, were certainly no parts of our Saviour's character; and he enjoins nothing which he did not uniformly and minutely exemplify.

Strange, that an institution, which begins and ends in benignity, should be prostituted to counteract the workings of malevolent passions, should produce animosities among those whom it was intended to unite; but there is not a corruption in the human heart, which has not sometimes borrowed the garb of religion.

Christianity, however, is not less precious to the honest, because knaves and fools have abused her; and let bigots and skeptics say what they please, she softens and enlarges the heart, warms and impregnates the mind of man, as certainly and essentially as the sun does the earth.

THE SUPREME POWER.

BY EDWARD EVERETT.

"It has been as beautifully as truly said, that the undevout astronomer is mad." The same remark might with equal force and justice be applied to the undevout geologist. Of all the absurdities ever started, none more extravagant can be named, than that, the grand and far-reaching researches and discoveries of geology, are hostile to the spirit of religion. They seem to us, on the very contrary, to lead the inquirer, step by step, into the more immediate presence of that tremendous Power, which could alone produce, and can alone account for the primitive convulsion of the Globe, of which the proofs are graven in eternal characters, on the side of its bare and cloud-piercing mountains, or are wrought into the very substance of the strata that compose its surface, and which are also, day by day, and hour by hour, at work, to feed the fires of the volcano, to pour forth its molten tides or to compound the salubrious elements of the mineral fountains, which spring in a thousand valleys. In gazing at the starry heavens, all glorious as they are, we sink under the awe of their magnitude, the mystery of their secret and reciprocal influences, the bewildering conceptions of their distances. Sense and science are at war. The sparkling gem, that glitters on the brow of night, is converted by science into a mighty orb—the source of light and heat, the centre attraction, the sun of a system like our own. The beautiful planet which lingers in the western sky, when the sun has gone down, or heralds the approaching of morning—whose mild and lovely beams seem to shed a spirit of tranquillity, not unmixed with sadness, nor far removed from devotion, into the very heart of him who wanders forth in solitude to behold it—is in the contemplation of science a cold-wrapt sphere; a world of rugged mountains and stormy deeps. We study, we reason, we calculate. We climb the giddy scaffold of induction, up to the very stars. We borrow the wings of the boldest analysis, and flee to the uppermost parts of creation, and then shutting our eyes on the radiant points that twinkle in the vaults of night, the well constructed mind sees opening before it, in mental vision, the stupendous mechanism of the heavens. Its planets swell into worlds. Its crowded stars recede, expand, become central suns, and we hear the rush of the mighty orbs that circle round them: the bands of Orion are loosed, and the sparkling rays which cross each other on his belt, are resolved into floods of light, streaming from system to system, across the illimitable pathway of the outer heavens. The conclusions which we reach, are oppressively grand and sublime; the imagination sinks under them; the truth is too vast, too remote from the premises, from which it is deducted; and man, poor frail man, sinks back to the earth and sighs to worship again, with the innocence of a child or Chaldean shepherd, the quiet and beautiful stars, as he sees them in the simplicity of sense.—North American Review.

Buy the truth and sell it not, is the command of Solomon. And this command will appear highly important, when we consider that error is the creature of imagination, a fancied connexion of unreal and fallacious objects; and that the conduct caused by it, will produce embarrassment, disappointment and suffering. Indeed, all the tendencies of error, are opposed to human happiness and improvement. But with truth it is entirely the reverse. If it demands a sacrifice, if it imposes a duty, if it imparts instruction, it is invariably to increase the sum of felicity. Truth, then, is the bread of heaven, the sun of the moral world, and the glory of the King eternal.

All things are right to them that love God, and know HIS WILL; but to those who do not, there is nothing right. For however prosperous things may seem to them, all will prove to be confusion, and folly, and shame.—Herald of Holiness.

An enemy that disguises himself under the veil of friendship, is worse than he who declares open hostility.

MARRIAGES.

In Palatine, February 14, by Rev. William H. Waggoner, Mr. OLIVER WAGGONER, to Miss ANGELINE PANGBURN, both of said place.

Also; same date, by the same, Mr. JOHN COUCH, of East Creek, Herkimer county, to Miss ELIZABETH WAGGONER, of Palatine.

In this city, on the 18th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. WILLIAM GOODSON to Mrs. ELIZA GRANGER.

In Hanover, January 28, by Rev. Philip P. Fowler, Mr. RUFUS H. BLODGET, to Miss SYLVIA WILLIAMS.

In Canajoharie, February 11, by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. SIMON TINGUE, merchant, of Fort Plain, to Miss ELIZA ANN GARLOCK, daughter of Mr. Henry Garlock, of Canajoharie.

In Parish, Oswego county, on the 11th inst., by Hon. Avery Skinner, Mr. JOHN H. HENDERSON, of Champion, Jefferson county, to Miss MARIETTA M. ALLEN, daughter of Comfort Allen, Esq., of the former place.

In Wyoming, Genesee county, January 31st, by Rev. T. P. Abell, Mr. NATHAN E. ELLIS, of that town, to Miss CYNTHIA DOLE, of Pike.

DEATHS.

In Orleans, Jefferson county, on the 24th of January last, Mr. SAMUEL COBB, (formerly of Deerfield, Oneida county,) aged 62 years. The funeral took place on Tuesday following. On Sunday, 31st, the writer of this notice tendered the consolations of the Gospel to the family of the deceased and a respectable congregation of neighbors and friends, who came together to mingle their sympathies with those who mourned the loss of a husband and father. It is sufficient simply to state, that Mr. Cobb was a Universalist. He was exemplary in life, patient and resigned during his last painful illness, and the closing scene of his mortal pilgrimage was serene and peaceful. He died in the firm faith of the Gospel of salvation for a lost world. May this faith afford comfort and consolation to those who mourn.

J. B., Jr.

Will the Watchman and Impartialist please copy?

In Warren, Herkimer county, January 31, DANIEL BRUNSON, in the 74th year of his age. He was one of that little band who faced the dangers of war to achieve our country's independence. Br. B. was also an ardent and exemplary believer in the doctrine of a world's salvation—in which faith and its correspondent practice, he lived, and, cheered by its consolations, he exchanged this life for a better.

His last request was, that he might have a Universalist preacher to deliver a funeral discourse, either on the day of interment, or immediately afterwards. But an ungrateful and bigoted son, a Methodist professor, in the absence of his more dutiful fellow-mourners, contrived to defeat his father's last request and dying expectations, by procuring a Partialist preacher, and burying the corpse the day after its decease!

Comment is needless. From such a spirit—from such piety—from such filial love, "good Lord deliver us."

In Sharon, Schoharie county, of scarlet fever, on December 6, last, ELIZABETH, daughter of Seth and Elizabeth Eldredge, in the 11th year of her age. A funeral discourse was delivered by Rev. Job Potter from 1 Sam. iii: 18, "It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good."

Farewell, blest shade! accept thy parents sighs,
While tears gush freely from their grief-worn eyes;
The spark ethereal's fled from life's frail urn,
To lands, "from whence no travellers return!"
Thy early prattle and thy pleasing wile
No more shall call our approbating smile.
Death took his aim! nor human aid could save;
Thou felt'st the wound and sunk into the grave!
But thou art gone to yon bright fields above,
Where God, the source, the fountain of all love,
Bids thee a welcome to that happy place—
Where saints and angels shout redeeming grace!
Roll on, ye wheels of time—roll on, and bring
The day, when at the mandate of our King,
We'll quit this tiresome, this fatiguing way,
And join our daughter in the realms of day.

EPISCOPALIANISM.....No. IV.

POLITICAL CHARACTER.

It is unquestionably well known to most persons, that the Episcopal church in Great Britain, is identified with the government. It is to all intents, a thing of State. And this is true in every place, Scotland excepted, where the sovereignty of England is owned. Wherever she has carried her arms, there she has planted the standard of Episcopacy, and there, also, her king is acknowledged to be "the head of the church." Her religious institutions are accordingly sustained in connexion with her general police—her clergy are, in a certain sense, officers of the government; and their support is derived as effectually from the treasures of the State, as are the salaries of her civil and military servants.

It will, of course, be inferred, that the English clergy find many inducements to meddle and interfere with the business of the State. And a very slight acquaintance with their history, will satisfy any one, that the bishops have, at different times, been the movers of the vast machinery of the government: and that they have directed and controlled its operations, in such manner and for such purposes, as seemed good in their sight. While to this day, few need be told, that the twenty-four English bishops are voting members of the House of Lords: and that these Right Reverend politicians inherit an income about equal to, if not greater than that which is realized by all the clergymen, of every sect, in the rest of the Christian world.

Poor Ireland has languished, and suffered, and bled under the iron grasp of these expounders of both law and Gospel, much longer than she would have done, had their seats in the House of Peers been vacated, or filled with less interested men. Her emancipation has no doubt been retarded, by the numberless expedients which the ingenuity of a class of powerful men could devise and carry into effect. And that they have power—a very dangerous power—no man can question, who recollects their connexion with the State. Their profession itself is one of power. For every minister of religion exerts an influence, so long as the functions of his high calling are so discharged as to meet the public expectation. And this, it will not be doubted, has been generally met by the English clergy. They have been as learned as any other class of men, and their morality has usually kept pace with the requirements of the age. Yet these are the circumstances which, combined with their position in society, give additional weight and influence to their determinations.

Such are the resources of the English clergy.—They are sustained by immense wealth—the highest literary attainments—in general, by an acceptable, approved morality; and by existing statutes—statutes venerable for their antiquity, incorporated with the political and religious prejudices of nearly an entire people, and of which they are themselves the keepers and expounders. It is not easy to form an idea of power more tremendous, in human hands.

It was in the face of this power, that Catholic Ireland asked emancipation. And can we wonder that her prayer was so long unheard? The interested never see, as other men see—the administrators of the law, and those who are alone benefited by its exercise, seldom feel its oppressions—and the receivers of a nation's tithes, know not the penury which they impoverish, nor the wretchedness which they create and which repines unpitied. To dispel the charm of Episcopal power and grandeur—to annihilate its influence over the people of England, and to moderate its tone in other lands, only requires that it be divorced from the State, and left to grapple on equal footing with other denominations.

But it is not alone in the factitious connexion of Episcopacy with the civil institutions of England, that we are to look for its political character. Its very genius is inspired by human policy; and all its institutions are monarchical or aristocratic. Its whole system is anything but republican; and it lives and moves only in its native element, when waiting at the footstool of royalty, or mimicking the mandates of supreme authority by the dictations of an ecclesiastic. The spirit of overbearing domination, of proud and high prerogative, mingles in its whole constitution, its principles, and its practice. And although it is little more than the ghost of itself, while trimming its lamp under the blaze of republican institutions; still from what it is doing even there, it is easy to perceive what it would do, under circumstances more obviously adapted to its temperament and disposition.

Of all this, one of the earliest of its royal patrons was fully sensible—one who exerted every effort to extend the empire, and to fix and dignify the power of Episcopalianism. James I., who was nursed in the principles of Calvinism, and under Presbyterian institutions, soon discovered on his accession to the British throne, that Episcopacy was much more congenial with his views of domination. It preserved, more effectually, those distinctions between man and man, in the spiritual world, which had been so strongly marked in the temporal, by the energy of the feudal system. And while it exalted the few almost above responsibility, it sunk and degraded the many to the humblest dependance or lowest servility.

That these views were entertained by James, is abundantly testified by the historians of his times—but it will suffice to present the reader with an extract from Mosheim, Eccl. Hist., vol. ii., p. 263. "As the desire of unlimited power and authority was his ruling passion, so all his measures, whether of a civil or religious nature, were calculated to answer the purposes of his ambition. The Presbyterian form of church government, seemed less favorable to his views, than the Episcopal hierarchy; as the former exhibits a kind of republic, which is administered by various rulers of equal authority, while the latter approaches much nearer to the spirit and genius of monarchy. The very name of a republic, synod, or council, was odious to James; who dreaded every thing that had a popular aspect; hence, he distinguished the bishops with peculiar marks of his favor, extended their authority, increased their prerogatives, and publicly adopted and inculcated the following maxim—'NO BISHOP, NO KING.'"

It is not to be inferred, that James intended that the civil institutions of Britain did not, or could not admit of the kingly authority without the Episcopal establishment. He knew that the reverse of this was true. But it is certain that he fancied and felt—with what propriety, the event proved—that the hands of monarchy were upheld and strengthened by its aid; and that the spiritual empire of the bishops, was eminently calculated to temper and mould the public mind into a state of subordination under a stretch of authority far beyond what could be hoped from the indulgence of any other ecclesiastical policy. The king, thus aided and sustained, would, in his estimation, be the king, in a very different sense from what he must be, under the influences of a more humble and less ostentatious system of religion. For as it must evidently excuse the multitude from the trouble of thinking for themselves on the subject of religion; so it was proportionably more probable that the people would take little interest in the management of their political masters.

But James was not the only English monarch, who entertained these views of the political character of Episcopacy. Mosheim, in continuation of his remarks on the state of the English church, after the death of James I., says, (Eccl. Hist., vol. ii., p. 265,) "His son and successor, Charles, who had imbibed his political and religious principles, had nothing so much at heart as to bring to perfection what his father had left unfinished. All the exertions of his zeal, and the whole tenor of his administration, were directed toward the three following objects: 'The extending of the royal prerogative, and raising the power of the crown above the authority of the law—the reduction of all the churches in Great Britain and Ireland under the jurisdiction of bishops, whose government he looked upon as of divine institution, and also as the most adapted to guard the privileges and majesty of the throne—'and lastly, the suppression of the opinions and institutions that were peculiar to Calvinism, and the modelling of the doctrine, discipline, ceremonies and polity of the church of England, after the spirit and constitution of the primitive church.'"

It is not difficult to imagine what would, in this instance, be considered a model of the primitive church, as the system of Episcopal government was "looked upon as of divine institution." What a blessing for a nation, to enjoy the light of such sagacious rulers!—who could determine what was apostolic, by its adaptation to their policy; and settle controverted points of doctrine, by prescription or extermination!

The king was well sustained, both in his views, and in the measures designed to carry them into effect, by the notorious Archbishop Laud. And under the joint administration of a vain and weak prince, and that of the daring, capricious, and intriguing prelate, the people were oppressed and tortured into a state of political and religious madness. The most revolting barbarities were practiced upon the dissenters, with a view to augment, or to secure the power assumed by the bishops. The king sustained the establishment—and the establishment upheld the king. Their identity became at length, so apparent that, in the rage of an abused people, both monarchy and Episcopacy were abolished together, as the mutual instruments of oppression. Popular prejudice in favor of Episcopacy and royalty, finally prevailed; and all the atrocities of persecution were re-enacted upon dissenters.—Force secured the triumph of the bishops and the king. And if any thing can furnish proof of the political character of Episcopalianism—that proof is abundant in the manifest estimation in which it was held by the people of Britain. It fell with the king; and it rose again with his restoration. So prophetic, and so true was the sentiment of James, "no bishop, no king."

It is both natural and reasonable to infer that the political aspect of the English church has changed under the stern republican institutions of the United States. And this is true, to a certain extent. But Episcopalianism is strictly the same every where; though its secularity may vary with circumstances. It always acts on the same general principles, and with a view to the production of similar results. It has an eye upon the civil institutions of the country, as steadily as the needle points to the pole; and aims at the control of the public mind, by an aristocratic influence, where it cannot direct the affairs of the State.

As evidence of this, it will be proper to present the reader with an extract from the preface of the "Book of Common Prayer for the Protestant Episcopal church, for the United States." The Convention by whom it was arranged, there say—"It seems unnecessary to enumerate all the different alterations and amendments. They will appear—and it is to be hoped, the reasons of them also, upon a comparison of this, with the Book of Common Prayer of the church of England. In which it will also appear, that this church is far from intending to depart from the church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship; or further than local circumstances require." (Baltimore edition, 1817.)

It is difficult to suppose, that either the Episcopalian, or any other church, can be distinguished for anything very important, not comprised in its "doctrine, discipline or worship." This was doubtless well understood by the writers of the above quotation. Such therefore as the English church is, such they would have the Episcopal church in the United States. For they assure their brethren in Europe—and they openly address the language to the public here—that they are "far from intending to depart from the church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline or worship." They would then, it seems, have things just as they are in Britain—a king for their master, a spiritual department for the lord bishops, in a temporal government, and secular power enough to secure the tythes, if not to enforce conformity to the ritual. For it will hardly be contended, that these are unessential points. And hence the departure from them, was just so far, and no farther, than "local circumstances" imperiously required.* How condescending to submit with so much grace to be governed, when there was no prospect of being able to govern—and to be patiently coerced into the practice of toleration, contrary to the established principles and usages of Episcopacy in all ages!

But what are the local circumstances which have produced the "alterations and amendments," in the Book of Common Prayer? We hope they do not relate to the doctrine of the Episcopal church. Because, if their doctrine was what it ought to have been, any alteration must be for the worse—and if it was not what it should be, to talk of amendments, may excite a scrutiny which will only be allayed by reforming the whole system.

These local circumstances are explained in another paragraph of the preface, before quoted. "But when, in the course of Divine providence, these

* Verax is not alone in these opinions respecting the political character and tendency of Episcopalianism. It has always required a head on earth—and has always availed itself of a temporal ruler for its spiritual pope, wherever it could procure one. That some of the leaders of the Episcopal church in the United States have hankered after, and longed for a marriage of their church to the civil government, was the opinion of Thomas Jefferson, as may be seen by referring to his Works, vol. iii, p. 441, where he says that the hostility of the clergy toward him "is on too interesting ground to be softened. The delusion into which the X. Y. Z. plot showed it possible to push the people; the successful experiment made under that delusion on the clause of the Constitution, which, while it secured the freedom of the press, covered also the freedom of religion; had given to the clergy a very favorite hope of obtaining an establishment of a particular form of Christianity through the United States. And as every sect believes its own form the true one, every one, perhaps, hoped for his own—but especially the Episcopalian and Congregationalists."

And what can be more natural than to suppose that a church, the duty of whose ministers it was to pray for the King, and Queen, and royal family, and Bishops, Lords and Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, as their temporal and spiritual rulers, during our revolutionary war, should retain a love for at least their "spiritual head," after that war? Surely such conclusion may be sustained by the reasoning of the same writer, respecting a sect that had not near as many inducements to cling to Great Britain, as have the Episcopalian. I allude to Jefferson's notice of the Friends, Works, vol. iv, p. 139.

And might not many of our those leading Episcopalian, who adhered to the cause of our national independence, have been induced to hope for a union of the church to the State here, as in England? They saw Bishop White acting as the chaplain of Congress, during all that time, and beheld in many of our civil and military rulers, members of that communion.

A. B. G.

American States became independent, with respect to civil government, their ecclesiastical independence was necessarily included; and the different religious denominations of Christians in these States were left at full and equal liberty to model and organize their respective churches, and forms of worship, and discipline, in such manner as they might judge most convenient, for their future prosperity; consistently with the constitution and laws of their country.—The attention of this church was, in the first place, drawn to those alterations in the Liturgy, which became necessary in the prayers for our civil rulers, in consequence of the revolution."

It is not the least extraordinary fact in the recorded labors of this Episcopal Convention—that the first and principal subject which occupied their deliberations, was the prayers for civil rulers. And as the alterations in these "became necessary in consequence of the revolution;" the local circumstances which produced those alterations are seen and acknowledged to be altogether of a political nature. It is very true, that the Convention afterwards informs us, that it has taken "a further review of the public service," and established "such other alterations and amendments therein" as were deemed expedient. But they protest, that no local circumstances—that is, political considerations—influenced them to make any of these. The only alteration, then, made in the services of the church, which by their own showing is referable to any local change wrought by the American revolution, is that relating to the prayers for civil rulers.

And what great change was made in these particular prayers? We answer, none worth naming—none that could render an apology necessary. It was the mere insertion of "the President of the United States, and all others in authority," instead of his most sacred majesty, the king of Great Britain, etc., and the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled. It is impossible to reflect on this singular yet grave measure, without calling to mind the equally grave proverb respecting a "mountain in labor." But as it was deemed necessary to make an apology for even this, it can hardly be supposed that the President is obliged to them for the alteration. For if "local circumstances" had not rendered it indispensable, prayers would, it seems, have been offered up for the king in preference. At least, the authors of the preface say, they did not intend any such departure from the worship of the church of England.

But there is something ineffably ridiculous in the remark, as well as in the idea, that because the form of our government was dissimilar to that of England, therefore any change in "the doctrine, discipline or worship" of the church was necessary. No man can pretend, that the church of Christ, was subject to such modifications. The doctrine preached at Jerusalem, was the same at Rome—the discipline the same, and the worship the same, in Greece, Italy and Palestine. To make alterations in these particulars, or even to talk of them, is not merely to raise the suspicion, but to force the conviction upon every reflecting mind—that the Episcopal church is a very different thing from the church of Christ.

Such alterations and amendments not only bear the appearance of compromising the Gospel to the policy of State—but it is in fact, the acknowledgement of a determination to do so. And whether that determination be uttered in England, or in the United States, is matter of perfect indifference—it stamps the seal of politics indelibly upon the establishment.

But this species of compromise with the "powers that be," is not without precedent. And the result might have satisfied the world of its character, without a repetition in our own times. The Jesuits always accommodated their "doctrine, discipline and worship," to the taste and moral feelings of the people. And in this they looked to the approbation and support of the church of Rome. And they received the countenance of that church, as long as public sentiment would allow. So with the jesuitical adaptation of Episcopalianism—it is approved, and will be practiced, until the better information and higher moral feelings of mankind, place it with the by-gone institution of Nicholas Loyola.

UNIVERSALISM IN THE WEST.

BY REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

Great things have transpired in the West within a little time. The news from this quarter is indeed so good, that I am scarcely able to communicate it in a manner equal to the occasion. Circumstances have favored us in so signal a manner, that I am at a loss how to account for them otherwise, than by referring them to a favoring Providence. They plainly indicate, to my mind, that the time has arrived for Zion in the West to arise and shine; "for her light has come, and the glory of God has risen upon" her. There was a time in Pittsburg, when the prospect before us was dark—very dark. No place could be obtained for our meetings—nothing favored the hope that a lot could be obtained on which to place a building, because of the sudden great rise in the value of real estate—there was no building could be even hired, or rented, that was at all proper to the purpose. Week after week I held my meetings in a room that was engaged for a dancing school—the front room on the same floor was a tap room, over head was a billiard table, and underneath a ninepin alley—the entire building was dedicated to anything but religious worship—and even for it we had to pay five dollars a night. We had well nigh despaired of ultimate success under these circumstances; when, to our joy, we heard of a little meeting-house that was advertised for sale. We were not long in availing ourselves of this opportune occurrence, and the following Sunday found us in possession of the premises. We now, for the first time, set about forming a society, and securing by subscription the amount requisite to cover the purchase; in both which objects we were very encouragingly successful. In this posture of affairs, I felt that I could be dispensed with at Pittsburg—as I had previously written for Br. Samuel A. Davis, to hasten on and succeed ~~me~~ there, which he had assured me he would hold himself in all possible readiness to do; and as, moreover, I stood under equal obligations to the brethren of Cincinnati, who began to grow impatient for my presence, more than a month having elapsed since the time of my proposed commencement amongst them.

At Cincinnati not one step had been gained in advance, since I left them last Spring. It may occur to the memory of your readers, that they were to have taken measures for obtaining a house during my absence—and, in justice to Br. Singer, I must state, that he and a few others did make zealous efforts to that end. But the cause in this city had been marked with peculiar misfortunes—public confidence in regard to it had been severely tried—it had been almost utterly destroyed. I actually considered the renovation of the society in Cincinnati, a less hopeful undertaking than even the origination of the cause in Pittsburg, with this difference however in favor of the former, that the people are in general more enlightened; and liberal in their views. It was with much difficulty that I obtained my own consent to undertake matters which, in prospect, were so difficult, as the resuscitation of a society dismembered, discouraged, and almost obliterated; and the reobtaining of a church, after the one they had owned had been sold for a sum which failed to cover the society's debts. I talked over this point seriously, with Brs. R. Smith and Sadler, who were here, and who were equally aware of the very unpromising nature of the undertaking. They, however, advised me to engage in it, as the society attached so high an importance to my doing so, and were so entirely confident of success could they but secure my services. Accordingly, I determined to engage heart and soul in the business. Our meetings were held in a large schoolhouse—congregations were not large at first, but they gradually increased, till at length every seat was filled, and this was even the case when I lectured on Wednesday evenings. Well, to make the story short, we soon obtained possession of a very valuable property, on terms extremely advantageous. It consists of a lot in the heart of the city, sixty-six feet on Walnut, by one hundred feet on Baker-street—a brick building called the Mechanic's Institute, forty feet by fifty-five, with a basement suitable for a Sunday school and vestry room, and the main room capable of accommodating six hundred persons, being ready furnished with a pulpit and the necessary supply of seats. For this valuable property we are to give six thousand six hundred dollars, a sum less than the ground alone is worth. We have already obtained subscriptions to nearly the whole amount, besides what has been subscribed in work and money toward putting the building in complete repair. (Oh! I had forgotten, that the purchase also includes a two story frame dwelling, which, when subjected to some repairs, will yield a rent of one hundred fifty dollars a year.) One individual gives us one thousand dollars, and several others give us, respectively, two hundred and fifty dollars. You may depend upon it, we feel well in Cincinnati. Our expectations—our hopes—our very wishes have been equalled by our success. Our society is continually receiving new accessions to its list of members, and persons of such respectability begin to attach themselves to our congregation, as convinces us that public opinion is about being regained.—Thank God for the state of the cause in the West!

I received a letter from Pittsburg, a few days since, just as I began to be very uneasy, lest Br. Davis should, by some means, fail of supplying that most important place. Said letter was full of glad tidings. Br. T. J. Crow had been there, and preached a few discourses. Br. William West, of Philadelphia, was also there, and had preached; and Br. Davis had been with them some weeks—had received a unanimous call to settle with them—their congregations were too large for their house of worship—they think of disposing of said house, and of procuring a larger lot on which to erect a more spacious building. Members were also being added to their society, and every thing favors the prospect, that the cause in that city will advance gloriously. Most happy was I in receiving this joyful intelligence; I have great confidence in the fitness of Br. Davis for that station, and he will find in the brethren, warm co-operators in every good work. Thus are the two cities of decidedly the greatest consequence in the western country, supplied with each a church and society, and the regularly preached word. I hope I shall not be suspected of wishing to appropriate any of the credit thereof to myself. I am, indeed, far from supposing that I deserve it. I have labored with equal zeal in other places, with far inferior success. All has been owing to the zeal and fidelity of the brethren in the two cities, and the blessing of God upon their faithful exertions. The crisis, too, was favorable—decidedly favorable. I pray God we may continue to run well, and that this may prove but the dawn of a day of brightness and glory to the West. Amen.

THE DIFFERENCE.....No. II.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

Most Partialists believe that mankind are born into this world with totally depraved natures—naturally opposed to all good and inclined to all evil, and that continually. We believe this doctrine is false, and of course highly detrimental to society, and therefore reject it.

1. It is in violation of the whole tenor of the Scriptures, wherein mankind are uniformly treated as possessed of a nature capable of obeying the commands of God. Now if I were born totally depraved, it would be most unreasonable to expect any thing good from me. It would be worse to require of me what I had no inclination and no power to effect; and cruel as the tender mercies of the wicked, to punish me for yielding to the impulses of a nature which I did not make and could not even desire to control. That parent is unreasonable, who requires his child to act beyond its known ability.

2. This doctrine is a reproach upon the Creator, if true. No good being would produce natures totally evil. If our natures are evil, their Author is not good. Besides, our Saviour's rule is, first to make the tree good, before we expect or demand good fruit from its branches. Shall we say God is demanding good fruit of a corrupt tree, and one which he made corrupt? Shall we say that he is so unwise, as to employ means to make the stream sweet, while he knows the fountain is bitter? Why does he not rectify the nature, before he demands good fruit?

3. It is opposed to all known facts. No human being is without some good qualification or property; and not one is so bad, but he might be worse. We universally speak of infants as innocent. They are so spoken of in the Bible. Jer. ii: 34, "Also in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents." Jer. xix: 4, "And have filled this place with the blood of innocents." Reader, what is your idea of totally depraved innocents? Shame on the man who will attempt to evade this evidence by a quibble, saying, that this was spoken with reference to actual sins! Will some one tell us what sin is not actual?

Again, Jesus said, Matt. xix: 14, "Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven." The doctrines of a totally depraved nature and of original sin are false, then—false as the doctrine of endless torment, and nothing can be farther from truth than that!

4. We reject it, because it can do us no good to believe that God has called us into being with evil natures—and because it has done much evil, where it has been believed, and will do more if suffered to remain. It is calculated to discourage and dishearten all who believe it. Who will try to do good, when he religiously believes every attempt will aggravate his guilt?

SPRINGFIELD (OHIO) DISCUSSION.

In the 30th number of the Sentinel and Star in the West, Br. Tizzard informs me that the Methodist paper of Cincinnati charges me with having backed out of the controversy held at Springfield, between the Methodists and myself, last Fall, during my western tour. Enough, perhaps, has been said on this subject; but as Br. T. requests some information, I will just state a few facts in as impartial a manner as the ordinary bias of a controversialist will permit, from which it may be seen who it was that backed out of the discussion.

The debate was commenced on my tour out, and was conducted at that time, on the part of the Methodists, by Rev. Mr. Lucas, of that denomination. After proceeding one day, as the discussion was about to be suspended till my return, many of the congregation were anxious to have the question decided before we left the house. By some it was proposed that a vote of the whole congregation should be taken. To this Mr. L. objected in the most positive manner, asserting as a reason, that a number had just left the house. At this a Methodist clergyman, whose name I forget, arose and advised that no decision should be made; especially as the discussion was to be resumed in a short time. This advice was received; and the clergyman who gave it, has since acknowledged to a friend of mine at Springfield, that had a vote been taken, he must have voted against Mr. Lucas!

This unfavorable impression against Mr. L., I do not ascribe to the power of my arguments, but to the unhappy course pursued by him in debate, a specimen of which I will here present. In framing the question, Mr. L. became dissatisfied with the phrase "all men," which occurred in it, and accordingly substituted the phrase "all intelligent beings." After I had opened the debate and endeavored to establish the salvation of all men, Mr. L. arose, and argued in the following manner:—"It is for my opponent to prove that infants and idiots are intelligent beings before he can prove their salvation. I say they are not, for they do not possess intelligence. It is for him to prove that the fallen angels, who possess intelligence, will be saved; and until he can do this, I have nothing more to say." This was unfortunate for Mr. L., and could not fail of exciting an unfavorable opinion against him; for it discovered a disposition to embarrass, by requiring the proof of that which even he at all other times was willing to admit, viz., that infants and idiots will be saved. Now, it is probable that Mr. L. was aware of this unfavorable impression when he objected to a vote of the congregation, for the debate was held in his own house of worship and his own congregation were present.

When I returned from Cincinnati, I found that the Methodists, for some cause or other, had obtained another disputant. They had sent for Rev. Mr. Raper, their presiding Elder, who was now in the village prepared for the contest—a very different one, however, than I expected; for he informed me at the house of one of his brethren, that he had come for the purpose of discussing the abstract question of future punishment, and that he was not willing to meet me on any other. I replied, that I would not exchange the question already in debate for one of minor importance.

After conversing for sometime on this subject to no purpose, we repaired to the chapel where a large congregation had assembled, and were already in waiting. Mr. R. proceeded to inform them publicly, that he had expected to meet me on the subject of future punishment without regard to its duration, and consequently was not prepared to prove the doctrine of endless misery! But he should follow, he said, with such an examination of my arguments as he might think proper.

The discussion, which was now resumed, continued in progress, at this time, one day and two evenings, except the ordinary intermissions, and was closed by Mr. R. with an address of an hour and a half in length. At this I requested of him the privilege of speaking a few moments to correct some of his most flagrant errors, since he had transcended the ordinary limits. He objected on the ground that it would place him under the necessity of speaking again; "and this," said he, "I do not feel able to do." Justice would have been done me in this respect, but as Mr. R. was opposed to a regular discussion, no moderators were chosen the last time—and thus ended the debate.

One of the seven Methodist clergymen who were present, prayed fervently in public during the debate, that God would "sweep the refuge of lies from the village of Springfield." But verily there appears to have been a lack of faith somewhere, otherwise the work would have been done, and consequently I should not have been called on to make this correction. J. WHITNEY.

THE DEVIL CAUGHT.

At a protracted meeting now in progress in the village of Boonville, the following highly important and cheering intelligence was communicated in a prayer, (1) by one of the Rev. actors: "O Lord, we thank thee that thou hast got a hook in the old devil's nose."

Now it is well known that the "old fellow" has been running at large through the earth, seeking prey, ever since his egress from hell, soon after his expulsion from heaven for rebellion. And to think that God, after so long a time, has got him in a manageable situation, and that he will, if he be a good being, probably secure him, that he may no longer "devour" the children of men, is a thought that must gladden every benevolent heart. But the wonder is, that a zealous advocate for modern revivals, one who feels anxious that "precious immortal souls" should be converted to the belief of endless misery, should feel so thankful at his satanic majesty's capture! For I am sure that, so long as the devil remains a prisoner, and is not at the service of revivalists, just so long they must suspend their operations, or labor in vain. "No devil, no converts." And unless they can manage an "exchange," I am wholly at a loss to imagine how they will be able to continue the siege much longer. ELM.

REPENTANCE.

"For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation, not to be repented of: but the sorrow of the world worketh death."
St. Paul.

Repentance is every where presented in the Scriptures, as an indispensable duty. The good and the wise of all ages have enlarged on its importance. The term itself, is frequent among all sects, but is evidently employed by many without being understood. Some of the best writers have erred here. Dr. Johnson, in one of the Essays in the Rambler, presents the following definition:—"Repentance is the relinquishment of any practice, from the conviction that we have offended God." Now, although we venerate the labors of this great man, we find ourselves obliged to dissent from his theology. He was probably led, like many others, to adopt the popular faith without examination. Thousands have thus been deceived. We should exercise as much reason on religion, as on any other subject. A better view than the above, may be presented. Repentance is the relinquishment of any practice, from the conviction that we have violated the laws of Heaven. A still shorter definition has, by some, been adopted: "Repentance is reformation." This sentence is very full, inasmuch as the whole result of genuine repentance is at once brought to the mind. Practice, not profession, is the only proper guide for the judgment.

The motive generally employed by theologians to produce repentance, is, the avoidance of punishment. But this is not right. There is no way to escape the consequences of past transgression.—"He that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons with God." "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." Such is the testimony of Holy Writ. Repentance for past sin enables us to avoid future transgression. It corrects evil habits, and where it is sincere and thorough, it will effect an entire change in the whole life and conduct. The author of our motto evidently had allusion to two kinds of repentance, produced by opposite causes, and terminating in opposite results. There may be a repentance where there is no wish to forsake any evil practice. This is denominated "sorrow of the world." But "godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation." One is death to the mind; the other is life. We are, therefore, to be careful to avoid the one, and cherish the other.

If we would be happy, or add any thing to the enjoyment of others, we must repent of every deviation from the path of rectitude. Sin never can make us happy. Let all strive, therefore, to examine their hearts, and see wherein they have erred. Each one of us has gone out of the way. We have followed our own devices. We are not to look so much at the follies of others. We should begin with our own hearts. It is easy to reform. Bad habits may be broken up. Evil desires may be destroyed. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and unto our God, and he will abundantly pardon."

 THE GOSPEL, A FEAST.
 BY REV. J. BRITTON, JR.

The Gospel is aptly represented by a feast of good things. It is, indeed, a feast of fat things. It is to the mind, what good and wholesome food is to the body. It is delicious. It gives strength. It is such food as the soul, when it is in a natural, healthy condition, desires. The mind may become diseased, and then it desires the most bitter spiritual food. The stomach is sometimes disordered. An unnatural appetite is oftentimes created, by the use of improper food and drink. Then the person craves the most loathsome food; such as would be abhorred when the stomach is in a healthy condition.

Now true Gospel food is adapted to the constitution and wants of man. Every person naturally desires the bread of eternal life; and nothing short of this will satisfy the mind, when it is in an uncorrupted state. It is what every person in a state of nature desires—and it satisfies the want of the soul. But when the mind is vitiated by tradition, and corrupted by receiving the inventions of men, it loathes the food of the Gospel and prefers the most bitter thing, even the bread of death, to the bread of eternal life. For instance; people will hear the promises of God recounted, again and again; they will listen to the invitations, which he has given by the prophet to all people, to partake of the abundant fulness of the feast prepared in Mount Zion—all this may be presented to them in order to satisfy their spiritual desires, and they will go away empty; having listened to these messages of God's goodness as idle tales.

These persons are too apt to suppose that improper food is presented; but they would do well to recollect, that when they were first introduced into the kingdom, they relished true Gospel food. At that period it was their meat to be assured, that sufficient provision was made for the supply of all; then it was their delight to listen to the messages of God's illimitable grace. What, then, is the difficulty? The truth is soon told. They have eaten freely of that which is not bread; moderately, at first, as they were able to bear it; and the mind in consequence, has become vitiated, and they find no relish for aught but what is bitter. As one accustomed to strong drink, is not satisfied with pure water, so they cannot be satisfied with the wholesome food of the Gospel. What, then, shall be done? The remedy is at hand. As in the one case, so in the other, there should be an entire abstinence in regard to the deadly poison. Come away, and taste not the unclean thing. As well might we expect, that one who is in the daily habit of drinking the intoxicating liquid, will be satisfied with simple water, as to suppose that one who is constantly partaking of that which is not bread, will be satisfied with the bread of eternal life. No, there is no mingling things so very opposite in their nature. Let the individual who finds no food for the mind in the Gospel of salvation, abandon the use of that which has so strangely corrupted the mental desires, and come to the feast of the Gospel, and partake of its fulness, till every want is satisfied. Yes; and let all come to this feast; it has been prepared for all people, and whosoever will may come, and whosoever partakes will be satisfied—will find food adapted to the desires and wants of every rational being.

 LETTER VI.

To Rev. Josiah Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.
 "And this I speak for your own profit." 1 Cor. vii: 35.

DEAR SIR—Before embracing the ideas that immortality was made mortal, and that man changed his own nature, conclusive evidence ought to be presented. If a man will believe such a doctrine without direct testimony, and ought not to be called and considered credulous, I would be pleased to be informed in what credulity consists.

If there be direct testimony on the subject, I would suppose that you, a believer in the doctrine and having the advantage of the wisdom, researches, creeds and opinions of your church and ancestors of like precious faith, in retrospect unto your great Wesley and through him even unto and beyond the celebrated James Arminius, you would be able at this time "to show" it. But we seek in vain for the testimony in the productions of your pen. The best evidence you offer on the subject, is a vague far-brought understanding of some passage of Scripture, twisted from its legitimate meaning, and forced to bear a construction favorable to your hypothesis. You may as well hang a bunch of poisonous hemlock upon the boughs of the olive, as to hang upon the passages of Scripture quoted by you a constructive meaning of eternal death, by change of man's nature through transgression, and contend it is the teaching of those passages.

You next quote the language of St. Paul—"Wherefore as by one man sin entered the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. For until the law, sin was in the world; but sin is not imputed where there is no law. Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him who was to come." Romans v: 12-14.

Thus you comment:—"Here the apostle expressly declares that death entered into the world 'by sin'; that is, death of every description: if so, then temporal death must have been a consequence of sin." If so—yes, if so. But does the apostle say temporal death entered into the world "by sin"? Or does he say "death of every description" entered the world because of sin, as Mr. Keyes wishes to have it? No; nor did any prophet, apostle or disciple of our Saviour, and much less our Saviour, ever say any such thing. The passage does not help you in any way. The apostle says "death by sin" entered the world, that is, the death consequent upon sin—the death which is the wages of sin—a death in sin. It is exceeding strange how you could assume to say—"that is, death of every description," thus seeking to cover your Heathenish "eternal death" without a blush. How is it that you will presume to palm off upon a reading community, your groundless suppositions as, and for, arguments? In doing so, your station of Elder in the "Methodist Episcopal church" will not save you from the smile of contempt of every lover of truth and fair reasoning, who stands unshackled with the prejudices of priestcraft. It was for you to show that temporal death was a consequence of sin. The apostle did not pretend it.

You quote the concluding clause—"So death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned"—and then you add—"Not indeed that all have sinned personally, for infants are incapable of personal transgression; but Adam, the progenitor of the human race and our representative, sinned, and his sin was so far imputed to his posterity, that in consequence of it, they have all become mortal, therefore, 'death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression'; that is, over infant children who are incapable of personal transgression."

From this we see the thickness of the scales over your eyes is such, that it appears to you as if the apostle taught that when sin entered the world death passed upon all, as a consequence of one man's sins. But the apostle taught that "death passed upon all men for (because) all have sinned."

We cannot deny but what death entered the world when sin did, for "the sting of death is sin." Then we can see the teaching of the apostle by varying the phraseology somewhat. "By the offence of one sin entered the world, and death by that sin, and death passed upon him who sinned; and so also all have sinned, therefore death passed upon all, because all have sinned."

You seem to hang upon the declaration that "death reigned—over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression"—and you say, "that is, over infant children, who are incapable of personal transgressions." You must notice, Sir, that the apostle does not say death reigned over those who had not sinned at all—but those who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression—thus distinguishing Adam's transgression, and meaning they had sinned in some other manner, or that they were sinners in some other point of view than after the similitude of Adam. If infants are incapable of personal transgression, (which I admit,) how and why are they sinners, or in sin? I think the Scriptures will decide the question, and we will not mar the plans of God by making Adam's transgression the cause of their sin. Adam's sin was a peculiar transgression, if we take the letter of Scripture. If infants suffer the death consequent on sin, it must be a sin not after the similitude of Adam's. We will see the Scripture definitions of sin. The apostle John says, "sin is the transgression of the saw." 1 John i: 4. This, infants cannot be guilty of. The same apostle says, "all unrighteousness is sin." 1 John v: 17. And the apostle Paul says, "whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Rom. xiv: 23.

Infants, although as innocent of all transgression as angels, still they have not faith—they have not Gospel life and light—therefore are in darkness and death. Hence we see that death has passed even upon those who have "not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." All are sinners from their birth in one sense, for they are without faith, and when they come to acquire faith—believe they pass "from death unto life." John v: 24.

Every individual, young and old, must be lighted with Gospel light—or in other words, must have a knowledge of the good tidings (Gospel) of life and immortality as brought to light (not created) by the Saviour of the world. Knowledge not being innate, you will readily see why infants, though lambs in purity and innocence, are in darkness and death—without faith, and thus in one sense in sin; but not sinners after the similitude of Adam. But will you say that infants are born thus in darkness by reason of Adam's transgression? Will you say that had not Adam transgressed, he and his posterity would always have been in knowledge, light and life. Let me ask then, Sir, what occasion there was before the "fall," of knowledge, and faith in the Saviour before man had sinned—if your abominable creed be true, that the salvation which is of faith, be a salvation from hell? Was man liable, or obnoxious to hell before Adam's transgression, and faith necessary to uphold him? Then he was thus created and placed by his God, and will not appear so very variant at the present day. If true faith in the Saviour be the true life and the light now, it ever was since the creation of man. How could Adam before his fall, have believed in a Saviour of the world, and thus have had life, if it were not a truth in the providence and design of God in the beginning, that there should be a fallen and lost world first, in order that there might be a Saviour of the world? If you grant there was a design in God that the world should become lost—fallen—then you will be pleased to attribute the present condition of the world to God's design, rather than to man's voluntary change of nature.—Will you deny that scriptural and spiritual life consists in the knowledge of God and faith in Jesus Christ? Then what will you teach for light and life? If you do not deny it, will you pretend that life consisted in something variant from this, before Adam sinned? Will you pretend that had not Adam transgressed, knowledge would forever have been innate to his posterity? What evidence have you for this? None—friend Keyes.

But my sheet is full. Have patience, Elder, I will try to write you again, soon, by way of reminding you of these things. AMICUS.

TO THE UNIVERSALISTS OF OHIO.

DEAR BRETHREN—You are respectfully requested to consider on the expediency of holding a meeting, to be composed of all the ministers in the State, and one or two delegates from each of all the societies, at such place as may be deemed most central, and at such time as may be most convenient, for the important objects—1. Of exchanging views as to how we may most effectually advance the interests of truth. 2. Of adopting measures of hearty and united co-operation to that end. 3. Of forming, if need be, a State Convention, with powers so defined as to prevent misconstruction, either mental or practical, and so accordant with primitive usage as to secure the acquiescence of the most cautious and conscientious of our brethren. And, finally, of becoming better acquainted with each other—with each others' situation, qualifications, wants, etc., and the state of the cause, and its requirements within the sphere of our respective fields of labor. Humbly hoping that you will unite in my views of the urgent expediency of this measure, I propose Columbus as the place—the third Wednesday in April as the time, and three days as the duration of said meeting. Very affectionately,

GEORGE ROGERS.

BREVITY OF LIFE.

"Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow: for what is your life? It is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away."

Nothing could more appropriately, or more forcibly, remind us of the shortness of human life, than the figure used by the apostle in the above passage of Holy Writ. Life he here compares to a vapor, which in fact "continueth but a little time." We have all seen the exhalations of the evening, rising and spreading themselves forth, and enveloping the whole face of nature; but when the sun arose, its rays immediately dispelled them, and like the "baseless fabric of a vision," they vanished, and "left not a wreck behind." Thus it is with human life; for awhile we may sport our time on the vast stage of existence; we may run the giddy round of pleasure, and fondly hope to reach the summit of human happiness; but sooner or later, the grim messenger comes, and compels us to take our departure for that "undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveller returns." Well might the poet exclaim, in view of this subject,

"Time! what an empty vapor 'tis!

And days, how swift they are!

Swift as an Indian arrow flies,

Or like a shooting star.

"Our life is ever on the wing,

And death is ever nigh;

The moment when our lives begin,

We all begin to die."

Not only is our life short and uncertain, but every thing by which we are surrounded, is continually changing and passing away. We hold all our earthly possessions by a very uncertain tenure, although we may have accumulated much of this world's wealth, and possibly may be saying, "Soul thou hast much goods laid up in store for many years; eat, drink and be merry;" yet in a day we think not, and in an hour that we know not of, we may be stripped of our highly valued possessions and become wanderers on the face of the earth, not having where to lay our heads. In fact, there is nothing in this world that is capable of affording complete satisfaction. There is always a void that is never filled; always a wish that is never gratified. The mind is ever sending forth the "fond desire" after something which is not at present enjoyed; something which, if we were indeed to possess, would, like all else, fail to impart the anticipated pleasure, or satiate the longing desires.

If every thing, then, is so fleeting and transitory; and, above all, if we ourselves are not certain of one future moment, where can we find an abiding place? where shall we seek a refuge in the day of trouble? I answer, in the bosom of religion. There we shall find a safe harborage in the time of the deepest distress: and when our souls are just hovering on the confines of the "unseen world;" when we are about laying down this mortal coil to be clothed upon with the vestments of immortality; religion will fill us with "joy unspeakable and full of glory," and enable us to sing the song of "redeeming grace and dying love" throughout the ceaseless ages of eternity.

When I take into consideration the joy that will be experienced in the paradise of God; and when I reflect, that this joy will continually increase while "endless ages shall roll on," I feel to exclaim, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!" O the joyful hope of the Christian! how it lifts him above the transitory things of earth, and gives him the blessed assurance that if this "earthly house of his tabernacle were dissolved, he has a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens!"

Brethren in the faith once delivered to the saints! seeing we have such a glorious prospect in view, "what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?" Let us endeavor to walk worthy of our heavenly calling, and not "again be entangled in the yoke of bondage." Let us strive to copy the examples laid down by our crucified and risen Master; and, while we remain sojourners here below, let us adorn the doctrine we profess by a "well ordered life, and a godly conversation." Let the apostolical admonitions sink deep into our hearts, to "rejoice evermore;" to "pray without ceasing;" to "abstain from every appearance of evil;" to "deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God." By so doing we shall advance the cause of our beloved Master, render ourselves happy, be bright and shining lights in the world, and convince the worldly-minded that there is a divine reality in the religion we profess.

SCRIPTURAL INTERPRETER.

DANIEL XII: 1, 2, AND JOHN V: 28, 29.

By the especial request of a correspondent, who professes inability to reconcile the first named passage with the doctrine of universal salvation, I step aside from my regular course to attend to these parallel passages.

I. Before the captivity in Babylon, angels were never mentioned by name. After that, names were given them.

1. Who is "Michael the great Prince?" Robinson in his Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, says, the angel who presided over, or took charge of Israel—the guardian angel of the Jewish nation. See Dan. x: 13–21, where he is first and fully named. In this Macknight and others agree.

2. "At that time"—when? The preceeding chapter informs us. Though a prophecy of things to come, yet it is evident, (and is so acknowledged by the translators of the common version, in their heading of the 11th chapter,) that it relates to the Jewish nation. That nation has now ceased to exist—"that time" is therefore past.

3. What was the "time of trouble, such as never was, since there was a nation, even to that same time"? Our Saviour himself will inform us. Matt. xxiv: 15–21, and Mark xiii: 14–20. In these passages this very sentiment of Daniel's is quoted, that prophet referred to by name, and the whole "trouble" applied to the destruction of Jerusalem, the miseries of which never had been, and we are assured never will be equalled; the doctrine of infinite and endless misery to the contrary notwithstanding. This brings us to the second verse.

II. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake—some (of the many) to everlasting life, and some, (the rest of the many) to everlasting contempt." To sleep, is not always to be dead, (Eph. v: 14)—to sleep in the dust of the earth, is not always to be literally buried in the grave. (Sam. ii: 8, and Nahum iii: 18.) But if it did mean this, this passage would only prove a partial—a special, and not a general resurrection. So with the parallel passage in John. That only speaks of those that are in their graves. Neither speaks of "the dead," as Jesus and Paul do, when treating of the resurrection to immortality. Those that are in the graves—those that sleep in the dust of the earth—embrace but a portion of all mankind, and most probably mean all who are in a cold, apathetic, low, degraded condition—asleep to religion, truth and godliness—in the dust and ashes of mourning, misery, sorrow and poverty of knowledge. For in these various senses may these phrases be understood by referring to the passages where dust is named, and particularly to Ezek. xxxvii: 11–15, where the Israelites are said to be in their graves, in this life.

2. What, then, is the probable meaning of the phrases "life" and "everlasting life," "condemnation" and "everlasting contempt"? The brevity necessarily prescribed to myself in these articles, will not permit a dissertation every time such phrases occur. It is well known that the Scriptures do not invariably use "life" and "everlasting" or "eternal life" to denote the state of bliss in immortality, nor the other terms to denote endless woe beyond the grave. Those who believe that such is their meaning in these passages, are bound to prove it—nor only so, but to account for the absence of the definite and express language which is always used when speaking of the resurrection to immortality. Nor is this all—they have to reconcile all this with the acknowledged infinite and endless goodness of God. But to briefly show that we do not require this because we are unable to explain the language used, consistently with other passages of Scripture, I will remark—"life" is spoken of in reference to the temporal blessings promised in the law of Moses. See Deut. xxx: 15-20. Jesus uses "life" and "eternal life" as synonymous, Matt. xix: 16, 17, and shows that he means by both the "life" of the law of Moses, in order to "keep the commandments." Both these he represents as synonymous with the "kingdom of heaven," and "kingdom of God"—Matt. xix: 23, 24. And all these he represents as synonymous with temporal salvation—Matt. xix: 25, 26. Compare with these the parallel passages, Mark x: 17-28, and Luke xviii: 18-23. Believing in God and Jesus, is eternal life. John xvii: 3.

3. The meaning of the passages. When the guardian angel or messenger of the Jews should stand up for the deliverance of the chosen among that people, to be saved from the corruptions and bondage of the law, then a time of trouble, famine, desolation and death, should take place, such as had never been known, and would never again occur. Then the nations of the earth, expecting generally a great personage from God, (for there was such a universal expectation,) will be awaked or raised up from their stupor, indifference and apathy by these great events. Those who are prepared to receive the Gospel, by holiness of life and benevolence of heart, will come forth to the resurrection of life—those who are not thus prepared, will reject the Gospel, and will come forth to contempt, condemnation and shame. This resurrection is yet going on, and will continue until all the nations shall have become the kingdoms of God and Christ.

If the reader wishes further information on either of these passages, he will find it in Ballou on Atonement, (ed. 1832,) pp. 147-169; Balfour's Second Inquiry, pp. 239-247 and 300; Familiar Conversations, (ed. 1835,) pp. 182-185; and Paige's Selections, pp. 167-170; the Magazine and Advocate, vol. vi: pp. 368-373. If "M." after consulting these works, has any remaining objections, and will plainly state them, I will attempt their removal by further considering these passages.

A. B. G.

FAIR WEATHER CHRISTIANS.

It is presumed, the reader will readily understand what is meant by the above appellation; and, therefore, a minute definition of the phrase will be unnecessary. Suffice it to say, we mean by it what we suppose all others mean when they use it, to wit, those mortals, whose zeal in the cause of religion—or whose devotion to the ordinances of public worship—is always governed by the weather—whose presence or absence at the church on the Sabbath, as readily determines what the weather is, as does the best constructed barometer—whose devotional mercury always fluctuates in the neighborhood of what is vulgarly called convenience or bodily comfort; and invariably sinks as low as zero, if not lower, whenever the days happen to be a few minutes too short or too long, a few degrees too hot or too cold, or a trifle too wet or too dry. Now we have orthodox Christians and heterodox Christians—old school and new school Christians—perfect and imperfect Christians—male and female Christians—liberal and bigoted Christians—in short, all kind of Christians that can be named; but put them all together, they are not near as numerous as the fair weather Christians. For this latter class are always sure to be on the side of the majority. You will never catch them in the minority. Whenever there is to be a small meeting, they are very careful not to be present. Whenever there comes a very beautiful and pleasant day, and all other circumstances are favorable, and it is altogether more convenient for them to go to meeting than it is to stay at home, or go any where else, you will see them flocking to church "as clouds, and as doves to their windows." But let there come a storm—let it be a little wet under foot—let the heat or the cold vary five degrees from what they are accustomed to feel in their own chimney corners; and, although such weather would not harm them in the least, or deter them from going abroad on business or visits upon any other day of the week, yet upon Sunday, it would prove fatal to them to go out; and with one accord they begin to make excuses; or, at all events, whether they make excuses or not, they stay at home, "with one accord." There seems to be among them a remarkable concert of [in-] action, or fellow-feeling upon the subject. Whether they previously consult upon the subject, and agree upon the modus operandi, or whether they act [or neglect to act] from mere instinct, we are unable to say. We should like to be informed by some one who knows; for we are, personally, very little acquainted with this class of Christians, our duties never allowing us to keep them company, excepting in public, and on such occasions as would render it indecorous to ask them the question. We have thought of adopting the following method of becoming more intimately acquainted with them: viz. to give notice at the close of the next Sabbath's meeting, that there will be preaching on the ensuing Sabbath at this place, provided the weather should be favorable. And then, should the weather prove unfavorable, we could spend the Sabbath in looking up, and visiting these fair weather Christians, and perhaps might succeed in forming an intimate acquaintance with some of them. And certainly we should be highly gratified in seeing them much oftener than we are now permitted to, especially when we have a number of stormy, or cloudy, or cold Sundays in succession. D. S.

THE RECORD.

ERRATUM.—In No. 4, page 31, current volume, in the list of meeting-houses, for "Amherst Mass." read "Amherst, N. H." The Independent Messenger complains, that we have placed it among Universalist houses, when its builders only believe in the salvation of all men, and call themselves Universal Restorationists. Great difference between six and half a dozen! Br. Skinner furnished the item, though probably I made the error here corrected in reading the proof.

SOCIETIES.—A new and rapidly increasing society has been formed in Pittsburg, Pa., which has purchased a meeting-house, and given a unanimous invitation to Br. S. A. Davis, of Funkstown, Md., to settle with them; which he will do in the Spring. Br. Davis leaves twelve congregations, (in a circuit,) to which he ministered until a rheumatic complaint disabling him, induced him to accept the invitation to settle as above. He says that Br. West, late of Philadelphia city, talks of locating in Frederick county—in which case there are yet eight places unsupplied in Washington county, where one or more preachers will be well supported. The society in Cincinnati, Ohio, is increasing under the labors of Br. Rogers. They have purchased a house for $6,600. The subscription for its payment is nearly filled—the ladies are busy trimming the pulpit, etc., etc. See his letter in this day's paper. The above particulars respecting Pittsburg and this city are gleaned from the Union. But the letter we give to-day is of much later date. A promising society was formed, February 3, in Marblehead, Mass. Another was formed at Lewiston Falls, Maine, and obligated itself to meet every Sunday for social worship, and to hear a sermon read when they could get no preacher. An excellent plan. Another was formed, January 25, at Portageville, Allegany county, in this State, and has engaged the services of Br. J. Babcock, of Hume, for a part of the time.

PREACHERS.—In addition to the conversion of Br. Farley, named in No. 8, we now have the pleasure of recording some more accessions. The Union contains a letter from Br. Guild, of Delaware county, stating that Rev. James G. McAdam, of Delhi, has united with us in proclaiming Jesus as the Saviour of the world. He is a native of Scotland—formerly belonged to a Baptist church in Glasgow—but embracing more liberal views of Christianity, [Br. Williamson cannot object to this phrase,] he united with the Unitarian society, under the pastoral care of Rev. George Harris, in that city. This society and its pastor are what, in this country, is called Universalist. In 1834 Br. McAdam came to New-York city, but finally removed to his present residence, where he worked at his trade, (tailoring,) occasionally preaching in that and the neighboring towns, as a Unitarian. Becoming acquainted with Br. Guild, he was much surprised to find that he was essentially what is here called a Universalist. Br. Guild says he is a good preacher, a talented man, a good neighbor and a pious Christian, esteemed and beloved by all who know him. Br. S. A. Davis, in his letter from Pittsburg, published in the Union, says that Eusebius Hoag, a lay member of that society, has preached several sermons on the great salvation, to the entire satisfaction of all who heard him. He was formerly a Methodist. He is spoken of as a worthy man who will make a useful laborer. Br. A. G. Clark, (published in our list, in number 2, as J. T. Clark,) who studied with Br. C. S. Brown, of Lisle, it will have been seen by this paper, has commenced his labors as an evangelist. He is spoken of as faithful, good and able. There is room for a few dozens more.

INSTALLATION.—Br. E. Wellington was installed as the pastor of the Meriden union society, (in Vt.?) on January 25. Sermon by Br. R. Streeter—charge and fellowship by Br. Gifford.

REMOVALS.—Br. Thomas J. Smith, from South New-Berlin to Bridgewater, as noticed in our last. He will preach half the time in this place, and probably the other half at Richfield Springs. Br. A. Norwood, of Brewster, Mass., has engaged to preach one-half the time with the society in South Dennis, same State. This is represented as a very small but highly energetic society.

MEETING-HOUSES.—Besides the purchase of the two named in Br. Rogers' letter, there was one dedicated in Stockbridge, Vt., (at the Narrows, as the account has it.) Sermon by Br. R. Streeter, assisted by Brs. Wellington and Garfield.

The following interesting item was crowded out in setting up the last Record. A brick union meeting-house, owned in part by Universalists, was dedicated on Christmas day, by Brs. Myers and Longenecker. It is located in the vicinity of Mechanicsburg, Cumberland county, Pa.; where there are a goodly number of believers in the universal restoration of mankind to purity. They intend sustaining the preached word steadily.

CONFERENCE AT NORWICH.—The Conference held on February 3d and 4th, in Norwich, Chenango county, was attended as well as could have been expected in that severely cold weather, and with the roads so blocked up by snow as they were. Six sermons were delivered by Brs. Kinne, E. Gage, Ames, Delong, T. J. Smith and Doolittle, who were all the ministering brethren present.

WESTERN UNION ASSOCIATION.—A special session was held at Philomath, Ind., January 30. Brs. E. Gird, Moderator, and Asher A. Davis, Clerk. Resolutions were passed designating the bounds of the Association to embrace the societies in the western part of Ohio and the eastern part of Indiana that may find it most convenient to attach themselves to it—and recommending all brethren in its bounds to form themselves into societies. A committee of inquiry reported that charges having been preferred against Br. Robert Smith, by the Connecticut Convention, which he refused to explain, it was proper to suspend Br. Smith's fellowship with that Association until he regained his fellowship with the said Convention. The brethren in the bounds of that Association, were requested to take some measures to support Br. W. H. Jolly as an itinerant preacher in that section. Adjourned to meet in Miamiasburg, O., on the Saturday preceding the last Sunday in May next.

Br. D. D. Smith has received, and it is believed will accept, an invitation to settle with the Universalist society in Portland, Maine. The Universalist and Ladies Repository will not be removed from Boston.

ANECDOTE.....PROFANITY.

During the extraordinary deep snows of the present winter, the hollows commonly termed cradle or pitch-holes were very deep, and frequently occasioned fractures of the sleighs and harness. These were very trying to the tempers of hurried or impatient travellers, and more so to stage drivers, who had frequently to stop and betake themselves to repairing the accidents as well as they could. Many, especially of this latter class, were addicted to the use of oaths, which, if not in all cases profane, were, certainly in no case very sacred. It may well be credited, that these numerous accidents did not lessen them in quantity nor in quality. "Our army swore terribly in Flanders," said my uncle Toby; but really, I doubt whether they swore more terribly than many stage drivers have done this past winter. But to my anecdote.

Br. P., one of the best and mildest of men, was travelling in a stage, under the care of a very impatient plier of the lash, who, every time he had to stop to repair his harness or the stage, swore "most profusely." It was very annoying to sit and hear him in silence—yet to rebuke him would probably increase the evil, if not add some new annoyance to it. What was to be done to check the torrent of angry and profane words? Br. P. hit on a plan. The next break, just as Jehu commenced, Br. P. pleasantly remarked, that "the best way of proceeding in such vexing cases, would be to take every thing good humoredly, and instead of swearing, to whistle at the difficulty!" The oddity and pleasantry of the proposal tickled the driver's fancy, who, half-ashamed, burst into a laugh, and after a pause, replied—"Well, so it will be the best way!—won't it?" and forthwith commenced whistling as earnestly as he before had cursed. Thus, by "a word fitly spoken," and in a proper manner, Br. P. was released from hearing the disagreeable language, even if the driver is not rendered thoroughly ashamed of it, and led to abandon it entirely.

While on this subject I will add, that surely those guilty of using such language, have no right to offend others with it—that could they see themselves as they are seen by others when they use it, they would not long continue to outrage decency, religion, and even common sense, by the use of such language—and that stage and boat proprietors should inform those in their employ, that swearing is contrary, not only to morality, religion, and decency, but the civil law also; and that, therefore, they have no right, human or divine, to annoy passengers with it. It is pleasing to observe that the vice is growing more infrequent—that no person professing decency and religion, will be held guiltless on using it—and to know, that the rapid spread of the principles of universal benevolence must soon do away the passions and doctrines in which this abominably disgusting, irrational, and degrading vice has its source and origin. Amen. A. B. G.

HAPPY COMPLAINT.

A queer complaint this, but a real one. My foreman and his fellow-printers, have had their tastes so pampered by the many very excellent things sent in by our correspondents and brother Editors, that it is with difficulty an editorial notice from my pen is allowed to pass muster. Not to say anything of the "go by" given to several of these articles in the beginning of the year, and for which I was fain to excuse them by flattering my vanity that it was all owing to the press of business, and accidents of the press, (but for the omission of which poor I was blamed, as if I could help it that cannot help myself!)—not to say anything of these—there are the notices of four or five new publications—acknowledgments of the reception of one or two new pamphlets—commendatory and explanatory notices of the two last prize articles—puffs of some two or three of our periodicals that have just commenced new volumes—notices to correspondents, etc., etc., all "laid over" until too old to be worth noticing! Was there ever——but where's the use of scolding! There is only one way of mending the matter. I must either "spruce up a bit," or carry my wares to some worse supplied market! Who'll buy? Who'll buy?

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.

"Carlos" in the Independent Messenger, of February 12, and "Philo Veritatis," in the same periodical, of February 19, are informed that my authority for stating that Mr. Marshall was a Universalist, is the sister periodical of Boston, called the "Trumpet and Universalist Magazine." I have searched for the number containing the information, but as I cannot find it conveniently—and as the correspondents of the Messenger appear to be in a great hurry—I will state my impression of the information. It is, that Mr. Marshall was one of the first who came forward in Richmond, Virginia, and united with the society gathered there by Br. J. B. Dods. If, from any cause whatever, I have misstated the sentiments of the Chief Justice, in saying that he believed in the universal restoration of mankind to primitive purity, I am willing to retract the statement. But I presume I may ask to be convinced of my error first. Any thing else, brethren?

SOMETHING SINGULAR.

The Editor of the Gospel Sun, in the second number of that paper, in giving a statement of the prospects of Universalism (as he has it "Our Cause") in Vermont, etc., has pursued exactly the same arrangement, named the same places, the same persons, and the same circumstances—used the same language and quoted the same quotations—that I used in number 6, of this paper! Astonishing as it may seem, it is a fact which I have tested by a careful comparison of the two articles. Every word (except the heading of the article) is the same. I am not able to account for this marvellous circumstance, except by supposing that Br. O. A. S. must have copied my article!

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

The February number has reached us in due time—has been read at any time, as we could spare it—and is found to be full of its usual good reading. This work for essays, tales, disquisitions, reviews and poetry, and Wardie's Library for the new publications themselves, (and with Wardie you get the cover full of reviews, tales, etc.,) and a centre table is decently provided with literary fare—especially if you buy a new book occasionally at the bookstore. Add to this our own, and two or three more Universalist periodicals, (we are not very particular which, provided the Magazine and Advocate is among the number!) and an occasional new Universalist book, and you are well provided with sustenance for the religious faculties—indeed, for the moral, religious and intellectual. Add to these two or three good political newspapers—let the New-Yorker, a very excellent news and literary paper, be one, by all means—and you will have enough of reading to occupy all your leisure hours, and to instruct you how to employ the rest of your time.

Oh, I forgot to say, be sure and get political papers on the right side of the question—any body can tell you what side that is—it is the side on which each person has placed himself!

But of the Knickerbocker—if you can afford it, reader, subscribe for it—if you have time, read it—if not, lend it to those who will read it. If you cannot subscribe, try and borrow it—and be careful to return it soon, neat and clean. You will find the articles good, very good of their kind—even those you disagree with, will please by their style and finish.

POSTAGE ON BOOKS.

We frequently receive requests from distant subscribers to send them some particular Universalist book by mail. Hitherto, we have hesitated to comply with such requests, believing that the writers, were not fully aware of the amount of postage on books that are not periodicals. In most cases, the postage on a book sent over one hundred miles, by mail, amounts to just about the cost of the book! Those who make such requests, notifying us of their knowledge of this fact, shall be attended to—otherwise we shall presume, as heretofore, that they are not aware of the cost of conveyance.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS.

THREE numbers after this will complete the first quarter. All who commenced taking the paper with the volume, will remember that their time for advance payment then expires, except in extraordinary cases.

N. B. Those agents and subscribers who can safely and certainly remit to us by private conveyance, free of expense, immediately on the opening of the canal, may delay until that time. GROSS and HUTCHINSON.

ANECDOTE.—During the late protracted meeting in Madison, a gentleman after hearing the infamous Elder Knapp, remarked to a friend— that it would take as much such preaching to convert a well-read and thinking man, as it would of skim-milk to make him drunk.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We owe an apology for the delay of some articles—but as they will now soon appear, we will only say that the articles and letters from Dr. Benton, Brs. Bullard, Gregory, Sadler, Rogers, C. S. Brown, W. S. Balch, French, J. M. C., A. C. and a few others have been received, and will be attended to in the course of another week.

Notes on Sacred Subjects, part II., gratefully received; hope they or similar articles will be continued by our able correspondent.

ERRATA.—In number 8, page 59, current volume, the last line in the second column and the first line in the third column, were transposed in some of the copies.

Also, number 4, page 32, in the name of the author of the prize poem, for "David" read "Daniel." 'Twas my fault.

LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

"A well-wisher to the Liberal Institute," suggests, that if the Executive Committee would appoint "a suitable man in every neighborhood, and he should be publicly requested by them to be active, collections would be made far more advantageously than by any general request."

This suggestion meets the approbation of the Committee, and Matthew Pratt, Esq., (Pratt's Hollow,) of Stockbridge, and Rev. K. Townsend, of Victor, are respectively desired to collect and transmit subscriptions and contributions to the funds of said Institute, through the medium of the Treasurer at Clinton, D. Pixley, Kirkland, Rev. D. Skinner, or E. S. Barnum, Esq., Utica.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO THE MEMORY OF MISS LUCY ROUND,

(Daughter of Mr. P. Round,) late of Moscow, M. T., who departed this life, aged 17 years.

BY G. W. BRANCH.

Transient, though lovely, were the years of her childhood;
She lived but a moment and vanished away,
No more to be seen in the fields or the wildwood;
She has fled from the world to a happier day.

Then why should we mourn her untimely departure,
Or wish her once more on earth to return?
She has fled to her Saviour, with love and with rapture—
Yes, followed in peace where our Jesus has gone.

Then why, tender parents, say, why do you mourn?
Your daughter's released from all trouble and pain,
She'll waken again in th' effulgence of morn;
Ah, then, tender sister, you will meet her again.

Farewell, then, loved Lucy—ah, farewell forever,
(A slumber profound and unbroken is thine),
Till the spring of eternity darkness shall sever,
And the dead all be raised in God's likeness divine.

DISTRESS OF A CHOIR WITHOUT THEIR LEADER.

MR. EDITOR—The subjoined account of a scene which took place some years ago in D—H—chapel, was sent to me in a letter from a friend; it was a scene at which, I believe, you were present. As it may serve to revive recollections of old times and former associates, in the minds of some of your readers, who were then connected with each other by common studies and pursuits, but now are widely separated; I send it for insertion, if you please, in the Register. The writer of the letter was a member of the choir described, but, having to officiate in the pulpit, that evening, he did not occupy his usual seat, nor perform his accustomed part in the singing.

* * * * * "Cambridge, March 22, 183—"

"Last Saturday evening, in my turn, I preached. From such another preaching, I beg to be delivered. I will explain. I went through the introductory exercises, read chapter and hymn, looked at the singers. A—r was not there. What they would do, I did not know. Hoped for the best. An indistinct, guttural, unmeaning sound, intended as the pitch, was propelled from five or six bass throats. With the pitch thus at loose ends, entirely undecided they rose. Each man, having selected a key to suit himself, began to sing bass. Where shall I find words to express the confusion, the chaos of sounds which ensued. Imagine to yourself a Babel of jarring voices, only let it be in singing instead of talking, or better, think of a Dutch concert, and you may form some remote idea of the noise made by the D. H. choir. Poor fellows! they felt horribly. P—y sung on in an unbroken, imperturbable strain of thundering bass. B—m twanged out his usual tones intermittently—a pause between each, as if he were deliberating this question, Is it best for me to sing or to stop singing?—at the same time, keeping up a vibrating motion between P—y on his left, and M—s on his right: as if he expected to vibrate himself into a decision. As for M—s, agony was inscribed on every feature. It seems that there was a kind of indefinite expectation, among the suffering choir, that he would sing the 'air.' This expectation, poor fellow, he did his best not to disappoint. So, after drawing out a note or two of his accustomed bass, as if to prevent it from sinking, he would strike off in a tangent, into the 'air.' But it required such a prodigious effort to do this—it was achieved at such a stretch of mouth, tongue, windpipe, that he could not abide more than a note or two at a time; after squeaking out which, he again resolved his muscles into a preparation for bass. I cannot give you a better idea of the expression of his countenance, than by telling you, that he looked like a man who would rather die than live; who would have felt, at any rate, exceedingly relieved, if the floor had opened under his feet, and dropped him gently into the cellar. However, they stood their ground, one and all, as if determined not to leave the field, without a struggle. In this way, they labored through one verse.

"Meantime, let us turn a moment to the audience. Of these, a part were angry, a part nervous, a part, despite of their earnest endeavors, shaking with suppressed laughter. Dr. — knit his brows; the other professors opened their eyes to saucer-like dimensions, and the preacher, with his handkerchief over his face—but I will not attempt to describe his emotions.

"We left the unfortunate singers at the end of the first verse. Having accomplished this, there was a pause for breath. On this occasion it was longer than usual. I began to hope. I could not ascertain what ground I had for hope, by looking at them. No! I had to fetter every avenue of sense, excepting my ears. I began, I say, to hope, that they would put their heads together, and devise measures that would make the succeeding verses bear some distant resemblance to psalmody: for I knew, that at best, it must be distant. This hope was fanned by a new pitch, which P—y was pealing forth with the confident air of a man who was determined to act with energy requisite to a great emergency. The thought which passed through my mind, was that he had taken a low pitch in order to sing the 'air.' So I waited, expecting to hear the 'air.' But alas! the second note convinced me of my mistake—it was genuine bass; and, as to the third, in attempting to make it his voice failed him. It was too low, as he afterwards figuratively said, for he is a poet, he could not 'reach it with the top of his toes.' Discomfited and disappointed, he emitted a few random notes—answering perhaps to the deep low of a cow, after she has moo-ed—and then stopped. This was the signal to the rest; who, as drowning men will grasp at straws, had embarked all their slender chance of success in his confident lead. When he gave up, voice after voice died away in low, indistinct murmurs, until with looks turned to me, stamp with ineffable despair, and which seemed to say, had as it was, 'we have done our best,' they sat down, at the end of the second line, second verse.

"I found, after the close of the exercise, that the sympathies of the school had been warmly enlisted in my behalf."—Register and Observer.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 22d ult., of consumption, after a long and lingering sickness, Mrs. JANE HARRIS, consort of Abraham Harris, aged 36 years. From her childhood upward, and through her whole life, Mrs. H. was remarkable for her evenness of temper, her quiet spirit and her sedate and unobtrusive manners. As in health, so in sickness, the same quiet, meek and uncomplaining spirit seemed to prevail—not a murmur was heard from her lips—not one complaint was dropped from her tongue. She was a worthy, exemplary and highly esteemed member of the Universalist church in this city; and died in the triumphant and joyful assurance of that faith in a world's salvation which for a number of years she had professed. She even longed for the hour to arrive, and when the bitter pang of death had struck her, she exclaimed, "That is death—I welcome his approach." But a few hours previous to her death, when her pastor and a number of her neighbors and some strangers were present, she spoke freely of her approaching dissolution, longed for the hour to come when she should depart and be with Christ—requested her pastor to attend her funeral, and then with fervor exclaimed "Universalism is good to die by." The corpse was removed on the 24th ult., to Middleville, Herkimer county, where most of her connexions reside, and the funeral obsequies performed agreeably to her request, in the Union church, where a sermon from 2 Cor. v: 1, was delivered to a large circle of mourners and sympathizing friends. May a merciful God kindly comfort and sustain the bereaved husband, (who is now for the second time left a widower,) and the children and kindred, one and all, and enable them to say, "The cup which our Father giveth us, shall we not drink it?" D. S.

In Royalton, January 30, Miss EDITHA NILES, aged 20 years. Thus, in the morning of life, another young person has been called away by the summons of that messenger all must obey. Educated in the principles of the Christian religion, she had never yielded to the importunities of those who desired her to abandon the faith of the Gospel, and warned her of what they believed the awful consequences of believing in Universalism. Relying upon the goodness of God, she remained steadfast in her faith through life. Her funeral was attended by a large concourse of people, who sympathized with the mourners in their great loss. May the aged parents, the brothers and sisters find consolation in the Gospel of Jesus, which the writer labored to set before them, equal to their necessities. C. H.

PROPOSALS

By J. Kidwell, for publishing by subscription, in Philomath, Indiana, for the benefit of the Western Union Seminary, a monthly periodical, to be entitled the Philomath Encyclopedia.

This work, (as the name signifies,) is intended to embrace "the circle of science." It will be a miscellaneous work—including the wide range of Ancient and Modern History; the manners and customs of Ancient and Modern Nations; Moral, Natural and Political Philosophy; Original Essays on Government; the elementary principles of Law, Cosmogony, Physiology and Phrenology; a review of some of the most celebrated authors—particularly Bishop Paley's "principles of Moral and Political Philosophy," and Professor Silliman's Lectures on Geology;—with a view of showing that the knowledge of Moral, Natural and Political Philosophy has been much circumscribed and obscured by false systems of Theology—by the means of which, the aspiring student, in his manly exertions to attain a knowledge of Science, is turned aside from the plain path into a labyrinth of Metaphysics in which the mind is infinitely lost in the dark fogs of learned ignorance and superstition.

The Encyclopedia is designed for the present state of society—to facilitate the spirit of reform, and to assist the studious, at a small expense, to become acquainted with the elementary principles of knowledge, free from a false prejudice of preconceived opinions.

It will no doubt be objected by some, that there are already floods of periodicals flowing in upon the reading part of community, and, consequently, a new periodical is not necessary. The publisher begs leave to observe, the great number of periodicals published in the United States reflects high credit on our enlightened citizens as an enterprising and reading community—and that predilection for general reading which characterizes a liberal and high-minded community, seems to encourage the enterprise. In addition to the above, we would also remark, notwithstanding the numerous periodicals now published, there is not one in the United States of the same character which the Encyclopedia assumes:—and the general spirit of reform now abroad in the republic, in the opinion of the publisher, calls aloud for such a work.

The public will be prepared to judge of the merits of the work, when it is before them. We flatter ourselves, the originality of the work will entitle us to a liberal share of public patronage.

To render the Encyclopedia truly worthy of an extensive patronage, several scientific gentlemen have been engaged to contribute to its pages, which will give to the work an interesting variety rarely to be met with in any periodical. No pains will be spared to give character and importance to the work. It will be printed in form for binding, and when completed will form a family library of itself. It will contain all Lectures and Orations delivered in the Western Union Seminary, on interesting subjects, either by the faculty or students. And all matters and things belonging to the Institution in which the public have any interest, will appear in the Encyclopedia.

CONDITIONS.—The Encyclopedia will be published once a month—each number will contain 48 super-royal duodecimo pages—printed on new type and good paper—12 numbers will make one volume, containing 576 pages—price TWO DOLLARS per volume, paid invariably in advance. The work will commence as soon as a sufficient patronage is obtained. Those who receive subscription papers are requested to obtain subscribers and send a list of their names and places of residence, as early as practicable, to the publisher; the ordinary per centage will be allowed to agents for their services.

¶ All printers of public papers who will publish this prospectus, and forward their papers to the publisher, shall be entitled to an exchange, and the sincere thanks of the publisher. All exchange papers will be thrown into a reading room for the benefit of the students of the Western Union Seminary.

Printers, Postmasters, and other persons, disposed to encourage the Encyclopedia, will act as agents for the publisher. All communications will be directed to the publisher, Centreville, Wayne county, Indiana.—POST PAID.

THE PREACHER.

FUNERAL DISCOURSE.

BY REV. J. POTTER.

Delivered at Burlington Flats, Otsego county, December 24, 1835, on the death of Nelson W. Converse, of Loraine county, Ohio, (son of Henry and Mary Converse, of Burlington,) who was drowned, near his residence, on the 20th of November previous, in the 26th year of his age.

[Published by request.]

"And he said, It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good." 1 Samuel iii: 18.

The present is a season of deep and thrilling interest, in which we are called to contemplate the uncertainty of all our temporal enjoyments. Our health, our friends—all are exposed to be snatched from us in a moment. A young man in the midst of health, life opening its fairy prospects before him, instantly sank into a watery grave, to rise no more in time; and deep, indeed, is the wound which has been made in the breast of the afflicted parents and friends, by this dispensation of divine Providence. Deep and mysterious are all the ways of God, and hidden oft with a veil which we cannot draw aside; yet he has not left man to grope in entire darkness and uncertainty, without either light or a guide. He has made a revelation of himself and of his will, to man, as far as it is necessary for our obedience to him, and our comfort and trust under all vicissitudes which he has called upon us to pass through in this state of mortality.

I have made choice of the above passage on the present occasion, for the purpose of vindicating the ways of God to man, as the source of all consolation in times of deep distress and bereavement. In seasons of sudden and unexpected affliction; when our loved ones are taken from us; when the sun of their prosperity seems unclouded; to see it go down, as it were, at noon, leads us to inquire, Why is it so? Why are we called to sip the bitter cup of affliction? Although the wise Governor of the universe may not stoop to give, at the moment, a reason for what he does, and though he may never reveal to us, in time, the particular reasons which swayed the divine counsel, yet he has revealed to us the principles of his moral government, so that we may, by the assistance of analogy, be able to presume what are the motives which govern the divine mind at all times.

The circumstance which called forth the words of the text from Eli, the priest of God, was of a peculiarly afflictive character. It was the revelation by Samuel, of the purpose of God in the final destruction of Eli's house, and that the "iniquity of his house should not be purged with sacrifices nor offerings, forever." "And Samuel told" Eli "every whit, and hid nothing from him. And he said, It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good." We are instructed in the subject before us, that the destruction of Eli's house was from the Lord; and hence we are led to inquire, whether all events are under God's immediate superintendence?

Upon this subject even Christians have been led into very gross errors—having allowed God's presence in particular events, while much the largest proportion of events have been supposed to be the effect of chance, or what amounts to the same, to no purpose of the Deity; and consequently such events are not included in, nor belong to the original purpose of God. Such doctrines are atheism in disguise; for, if we limit the divine purpose, we of course deny God's right to govern in all things—for no one would think of ascribing government to the Deity where he had no purpose in governing, and, consequently, no end to be attained. But when we contemplate the Father of the universe as an infinite being in all his attributes—in wisdom, power and goodness—comprehending all his works from eternity to eternity—one who, ere time began—ere he laid the foundations of the earth, or spread out the heavens as a curtain, or placed the sun in the firmament thereof to irradiate Summer's vale, or ere he established night's silvered queen, amid numberless twinkling orbs—by his intuitive knowledge, looked through and comprehended all worlds and beings—we are compelled at once to admit that with the Deity there cannot be any event either new or old, but one eternity ever present, in which there is neither past nor future time. In this view of the subject, there can be no event but what comes within the exercise of God's goodness, wisdom and power; so that God cannot be the immediate or remote cause of any event which shall not eventuate in the greatest possible good, notwithstanding there may be, in the chain of events, great affliction, and to us much evil. Yet when we contemplate the Deity as a perfect being in all his attributes, knowing all events, and perceiving the effect which every cause will produce, having the end in view from the beginning, and under the exercise of all his attributes at one and the same time, we can imagine no event in the economy of God's government but what must have been viewed by the divine attributes—must have called into exercise the divine goodness, mercy, justice, love, wisdom, knowledge and power, and caused them to act in concert—and consequently the greatest good must necessarily be eventually produced. But the manner in which the divine purpose has been treated by most religious sects, who have robed it in the thunder clouds of infinite wrath and vengeance, and caused it to doom unborn millions to endless woe, ("according to the unchangeable counsel of God's own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, and ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice")—such views have driven thousands to the cold, dreary and rayless regions of skepticism and unbelief, and many more to the ravings of hopeless despair.

Hence, to deny a purpose or plan in the creation of God, would be to deny that he possessed any wisdom or interest in it; for where there is no purpose, there can be no wisdom; and it may even be doubted whether human idiocy itself, ever becomes so perfectly fatuous as to take no interest whatever in its own actions. But if it take an interest, it will manifest it by acting on some plan, however vague—by forming some purpose, however indefinite. How much more, then, must the all-perfect God have a purpose in his works of creation, providence and grace! Hence, when man was created, there must have been a plan which was the product of God's goodness, and infinite goodness, guided by infinite wisdom, can never produce an infinite evil. The acknowledgment of God's government over his creatures for good, is all we claim; for if the divine government is good, all its acts must of course be of a like character, as, "no fountain can send forth" two kinds of water—the one bitter and the other sweet. Infinity cannot be divided, neither can an infinite being have opposite purposes at the same time; and God is "in one mind, and who can turn him? And what his soul desireth, even that he doeth." Job xlii: 13. Therefore the mutations and changes of which we are susceptible, affect not the divine mind, for these he perfectly comprehended when we were yet in nonentity, and the world in chaos.

The inquiry naturally suggested, upon the admission of the above position, that God created and governs the universe by an immutable purpose, is, How can man possess freedom of will? This we conceive to be a part of the purpose of God; for by infinite knowledge and wisdom he was enabled to balance every thing within his own infinite control, and notwithstanding he had given man a consciousness of freedom which enables him to act as perfectly free as though there was no power above himself, yet he remains subject to the moral government of God.

Instance the circumstance of Joseph and his brethren: they first purposed to kill him, but Reuben endowed with more kindness than the rest, entreated them to put him into a pit under the pretext that their hands would be free from the stain of their brother's blood. This they consented to do; and when they had lowered him into the pit, supposing that all was safe on their part, and they would be secure from his having dominion over them, the work was not completed which would serve the divine purpose. Egypt was to be the great theatre on which Joseph was to act; and how could that be accomplished? In the exercise of divine wisdom and goodness, the Ishmaelitic traders were to be ready to convey him in the capacity of a servant—which was accomplished. This was supposed, by Joseph's brethren, to be an entire defeat of any thing that could relate to their bowing down to Joseph, or his having dominion over them. Is any one prepared to say there was not a complete freedom of action (agency) on their part? Not a man living dare dispute it.

The wickedness and treachery of Potiphar's wife, in procuring his confinement in prison—the imprisonment of the chief butler and chief baker with Joseph—their dreams, with the interpretation of the same by Joseph—the deliverance of the chief butler from confinement—all were necessary to introduce Joseph to the notice of Pharaoh, in order that he might interpret the monarch's dreams, and be advanced to the highest honors in Pharaoh's dominions. And all this was accomplished through the instrumentality of the most base designs on the part of man—even the exercise of the worst passions of human nature. The entire freedom of man's will cannot be denied to the actors of the actions above described; and yet it will be acknowledged, even by those who are disposed to reject the divine purpose in human actions, that in this, God had a purpose, and that that purpose was, to accomplish great good.

How many similar instances in the history of the divine government, are recorded, in which the divine wisdom and goodness have accomplished the greatest amount of good, peace and joy to the human family, and that too, through deep affliction. Behold the aged patriarch Jacob, and his family, when the famine began to be sore in the land, and death in its worst form stared them in the face. The only hope of succor was from Egypt—and that was only based on a travelled rumor that there was corn there. His sons went thither to procure the staff of life—but on their return, notwithstanding they had procured corn, yet Simeon was detained.—They had been accused of being spies—the only evidence that would be received to the contrary was, that they would bring their youngest brother, leaving Simeon as the pledge of their return. Judge of the mingled emotions of joy and grief in the mind of the patriarch—joy in obtaining bread, but grief in the detention of his son! "Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all these things are against me." Thus with much fear and trepidation, the patriarch consented that Benjamin should go with his other sons into Egypt, when Joseph made himself known unto his brethren.

When shame, guilt and confusion of face came over the envious brethren, and they wept aloud, "Joseph said unto his brethren, I am Joseph; doth my father yet live? and his brethren could not answer him; for they were troubled at his presence. And Joseph said unto his brethren, come near to me, I pray you: and they came near. And he said, I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt. Now, therefore, be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life." In the full enjoyment of free moral agency, with designs of evil against their brother, in order to avoid the accomplishment of his dreams, they at length found themselves bowing before him, in guilt, shame, tears and disappointment. But they receive a brother's forgiveness and love, instead of the anger and hatred which they had meted out to him. And he assures them that, notwithstanding their purposes of evil and envy, God had taken the direction of the event, even to the preserving of life—theirs included! Thus the "wrath of man shall praise thee: the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain."

All this deep and trying affliction to the patriarch—the prospect of not only the loss of his children, but also of his own life by famine—God, by his purposes of goodness, mercy, wisdom, justice, and power, so overruled in the event, as to produce the greatest amount of good to all. Could the patriarch have been imbued in the divine wisdom and knowledge previous to the event, he might in truth and sincerity have said, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

Again let us examine the circumstances of the advent of the Lord of life—behold the marked afflictions which were poured out upon himself, as well as those associated with him in his ministry—see also the malice, wickedness and revenge which actuated those of his opposers, in which they left no means unemployed, which in their power they could devise, to put a final end not only to the messenger of this good tidings, but also the doctrine itself. Like Joseph's brethren, they had no claims to purity of motives; but, on the other hand, they were actuated by the most unprovoked anger and malice, and it would seem as though they spared nothing which cruelty could suggest or human ingenuity could invent, to add keenness to the affliction, or to make the sufferings complete, which they inflicted. And when to all visible appearance, they had poured out the hottest vials of wrath upon the Son of God—while nature was in her last agonies—behold the display of infinite love in his prayer for his murderous persecuting foes—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" In all this, God's love triumphed over hatred—wisdom over their folly and wickedness, and the kingdom of God was established, and every knee will be made to bow, and every tongue to confess that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Even on the day of Pentecost did this work of subjection begin.

In the above cited cases of Joseph and Jesus, it is evident that they were attended with the deepest affliction and suffering; and the latter as well as the former was accomplished through human agency, and overruled for good, even to those who exercised the worst passions of their natures to prevent the accomplishment of the events which were presented as the end to be obtained—that of Joseph's brethren bowing down unto him; and, in the other case, of having Jesus to rule over them.

The latter, as well as the former, was not the work of chance, and yet every power and all freedom of man's agency was exercised to the fullest possible extent—yet the apostle has informed us, "For of a truth, against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done." It appears evident that, in all the dispensations of his providence, God has a purpose; and that too in overruling all things for the best good of his creatures, and in a way which shall exalt his own perfections, and thereby engage the best affections of the human heart, and invite the entire and perfect confidence of all his children, under all the dispensations of his providence.

It is clearly made to appear from the foregoing, that under the government of God, all things are made subservient to his will and purpose; and having given us the strongest possible evidences of his goodness, mercy and love, not only in the daily manifestations of his kindness, in that he opens his hand and satisfies the desires of every living thing—not only in his continued watchfulness over us—but more especially in the gift of his Son for the salvation of a lapsed world from sin and death. In all this the divine attributes stand pledged to bring good out of what appears to us to be evil—comfort out of affliction—light out of darkness, and immortality out of mortality and death. For Jesus by his death and resurrection hath brought life and immortality to light, and has not only revealed the divine paternity, but has also revealed to man all that light, and peace, and salvation which God has ever endowed man with a capacity to enjoy, either in this or in a future mode of being.

Hence, although the deceased finished his days suddenly, and apparently without a friendly hand to close his eyes in death—and though the ever anxious parents cast their eyes towards the fatal spot where he found a watery grave, and sigh that they could not have ministered to him in the last trying, closing scene—yet he was not alone—there was One with him who presides over the floods, and who could not be separated by time nor space, and who could go with him where parents could not, and who instructed the psalmist to say that notwithstanding he should pass through the "valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Hence the consolation derived from the fact that God is omniscient and omnipresent, possessed of infinite wisdom, and love without partiality, is that of the apostle, who was "persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." This above every other consideration, is capable of absorbing the soul in sweet conformity to the divine will, reconciling us to God, and will enable us to breathe forth the language of good old Eli—"It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good."

The dealings of our heavenly Father with his children, bear such a similarity to that of our earthly parents, that we will indulge the comparison. In the government of our parents over us, they, for wise purposes, have concealed from us many reasons of their dealings with us. Hence, in our minority we have at times, grieved—thought our lot hard, and sometimes have indulged in anger, without pausing to reflect, or without waiting to judge the act by their motives as we might learn from the result. Yet when we arrived at full age, how many things connected with the discipline which we have been subjected to, have been so explained as to cause not only our reconciliation, but even to draw forth the hearts' best gratitude to the parent! So with the government of our Father in heaven. He frequently performs his will without stooping to explain to us, at the time, all the motives which he may have in view; but he leaves us to consult the past dispensations of his providence, which, though afflictive at the time, were overruled by his wisdom and goodness to become the greatest blessings to mankind, and even to those whose wickedness richly merited, as they needed, all the suffering inflicted. Such are the wonders of the divine government, and such may be confidently looked for as the result of all his dealings with his intelligent offspring.

The riches of divine grace are clearly manifested in Jesus, the only true medium through which God has revealed himself to man—for "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself"—"who was the image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature"—"the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person." "It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven." By the above we may learn, not only the true character of God through Christ, but also the purpose of his mission, which was to reconcile all things unto himself, especially the afflicted and those that mourn.

Jesus Christ in his mission to a benighted world has not only revealed the Father's attributes and character, but has also given the strongest reason possible to put our whole confidence in him, under every dispensation of Providence. He was sight to the blind—hearing to the deaf—speech to the dumb—health to the sick—comfort to the mourning—strength to the weak—salvation to the lost, and life to the dead. And as the representative and image of God, he has pledged the divine attributes for our salvation. There is no wo or malady to which our natures are heir, to which he has not given the strongest evidence of his compassion, tenderness and love.

Such is the divine character of God, as seen in his image—and such is his government over his intelligent offspring. "He doth not afflict willingly, (for the sake of afflicting,) and though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies"—and "though sorrow may continue for a night, yet joy cometh in the morning." And such was the confidence of the patriarch Job in the divine character, even under accumulated afflictions, as the loss of his children, his property, and even the approach of his own dissolution, that he exclaimed, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." And also when the death of his children was announced to him, he exclaimed, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Thus in the cases above cited, where afflictions were meted out by the divine government, notwithstanding men were called to drink even the dregs of the bitter cup of sorrow, yet they found him a present help, even in affliction, and worthy of their entire confidence. And in the end, they found a Father who could bring joy out of affliction, disappointment and sorrow.

With these views of the divine character and government, we humbly commend you to God, and to the word of his grace who has said "my grace is sufficient for you." "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour, Jesus Christ," into whose hands the Father hath given all things, and who will hold his dominion until he hath reconciled all things unto himself, until he has destroyed the last enemy, which is death, and then God will become all in all. AMEN.

TEMPERANCE.....No. VIII.

BY A. W. BENTON, M. D.

I design in this article, to say a few words on the traffic in ardent spirits. And I am confident that I cannot in any other language, so well express my own views on the subject, as by copying the preamble and resolution introduced at a meeting for the promotion of the cause of temperance in the United States, held at the capitol, in Washington, February 24, 1833, together with the remarks of Mr. Cooke, member of Congress, in support of the same. The preamble and resolution read as follows:—

"WHEREAS, the manufacture of, and traffic in, ardent spirit, are a fruitful source of pauperism, misery and crime, deeply injurious in their operation to the pecuniary and moral interests of community—AND WHEREAS their abandonment presents the only effectual remedy for the evil of intemperance, therefore,

“Resolved, That they ought to be discountenanced and abandoned, as incompatible with the obligation of social and moral duty, by every patriot, and especially every Christian in the country.”

In submitting the resolution just read, Mr. Cooke said he had “intentionally directed a blow at the great source and fountain of intemperance. Public opinion is already informed of the universality and the magnitude of the evil. Its condemnation is recorded upon adamant, and its omnipotence needs now only to be directed to its source, to demolish it forever.

“Let us, then, since the outposts are taken, and its picquet guards have capitulated, direct our forces against the strong holds of the enemy. Let us carry the war into the head quarters of his army, and as the surest and most effectual means of drying the fountains of his poisons, let us crush and crumble the head of the serpent that has beguiled us. Do not mistake me. We ask no aid from force; the great cause in which we are struggling, looks not for success to the arm of civil or military power. It wields nor spear nor sceptre. Enthroned in the affections of the patriot, the philanthropist, and the Christian, and based upon the everlasting foundations of moral justice; its hopes of final victory are directed to a higher source. Time, intelligence, inquiry, reflection, perseverance, and the consequent overwhelming power of public sentiment, are the great agents which are working out its glorious triumph.

“The terms of the proposed resolution may, by some, be deemed severe in their requisitions. I do not think so. A brief glance at the immeasurable ruin—at the countless crimes, miseries and deaths which the manufacture and traffic of ardent spirit have brought upon the human race, will shield it from the injustice of such an imputation. What are the facts? It has long been settled by the concurrent testimony of the most distinguished physicians, that alcohol is a rank and deadly poison—that in its effects it resembles arsenic, and though slower in its operations, it is not less certain and destructive in its effects. Ay, Sir, that it is infinitely more so; that it poisons, destroys, kills both the body and the mind; that the inevitable tendency of its use is the paralyzation of health, the destruction of the human constitution; the prostration of morals; the accumulation of crimes; the augmentation of the sum total of human wickedness and human misery; the derangement and stupefaction of the intellect; the oblivion of every social and religious obligation; the extinction of the love of honor in the human breast; and the annihilation of every high and holy feeling of the soul, which elevates man above the brute and allies him to God! Who is not, then, ready to exclaim that the mere use of this poison is, of itself, a crime? A crime however that sinks into insignificance when compared with that of making and vending it for the destruction of others.”

“No one can longer deny that from this source (the manufacture and traffic of this destructive fluid) flows a train of evils, which embodies every variety of human crime, and human misery; which converts the blessings of heaven into curses, and those of life into the tortures of disease. Without this agency, all these vast and complicated evils would cease to exist. The individual, therefore, who manufactures or traffics in this poison, knowing and reflecting upon the wide spread ruin and desolation which results from his agency in increasing its consumption, is, in the eye of Heaven, responsible for all, and richly merits the disfavor and reprobation of his country. Where, in the eye of eternal justice, is the difference between him who strikes the blow of death, and him who knowingly maddens the brain, and tempts and fires the soul to strike it?”

“I repeat, therefore, that it is now too late to deny either the criminality of this traffic, or the magnitude of the evils which result from it. They are seen every where. Cast your eye over the broad and the boundless map of moral desolation, which these agents of ruin have spread over the nations, and then tell me if we are not called upon to express our reprobation in terms much severer than those of the resolution before you, upon the cause of these evils?

“I speak not merely of their effects upon civil liberty, or upon the political and commercial prosperity of the country. I speak not of their influence upon the character of nations, or upon the stability of governments. I speak not of the immense sacrifice of property—of the more than one hundred and twenty millions of dollars which are annually expended in the United States, in the consumption of these poisons; of the two hundred million dollars worth of time, of which they annually rob their victims. I speak not of those stupendous public works and monuments of art, to the erection of which these accumulated sums might be annually applied; nor of the security, prosperity and glory which they would give to the country.....I speak not of fields turned to waste—of homes deserted—of hearths desolate—of happiness forever blasted, of hopes forever crushed beneath the withering tread of this fell destroyer.—Nor will time permit me, even for a moment, to point you to those scenes of grovelling dissipation, of frantic riot, of desperate revenge, and of brutal abandonment, from which the once kind husband and father is sent home, transformed into an infuriated demon, to his trembling wife and famished children, the object alike of terror, of shame, and of heart-rending commiseration. I cannot speak of those truly tragical results of this inhuman traffic, of those scenes of unutterable wretchedness and agony of soul, over which my heart has often bled, even in the far off peaceful wilds of the West; of those scenes in which I myself have seen this demon of destruction, rising on his pedestal of broken hearts and blasted hopes, and, intent on gain, filling the very air with moral pestilence, blasting every noble and manly feeling of the human heart, and pouring from his poisoned chalice, his fiery streams of agony and despair, into the once happy and cherished circles of domestic peace and love.”

“But I forbear to expatiate. In conclusion, let me only ask, can that traffic be justified by an enlightened and virtuous people, which thus alone holds out the chief temptation to that intemperance, which strews the land with beggars, and widows, and orphans, and crimes—which breaks up the foundations of social happiness, consigns millions prematurely to their graves, and fills the world with wailings, lamentations and woe? I answer, no, Sir. Policy, morality, patriotism, religion condemn it. The omnipotence of public opinion will put it down. A mighty and a glorious revolution, thank God, is in triumphant progress. A light, brighter than the sun at noon-day, has burst upon us. All now see and admit that if there were no makers and vendors, there would be, there could be no drunkards; and that from the moment of their abandonment of this horrid traffic, a more golden age would dawn upon the world, and the bright earth would smile and bloom again in primeval happiness and peace. Let us, then, lay the axe at the root of the tree—at the root of this great Bohan Upas of moral death and social ruin. Let us assail its giant trunk, now that we have lopped its branches. Let us invoke that wretched commerce which is conducted beneath its deadly shade, to abandon its pursuit, and to withhold its liquid fires from the execution of their threatened devastation upon the brightest promises and hopes of man. Let us invoke the dealer in that commerce, by every bond of social duty—by his detestation of crime—by his love of virtue—by his devotion to the public peace—by his sympathy for the wretched—by the bitter tears of the widow—by the heart-breaking cries of shelterless and degraded orphanage—and by every tie that binds the good man to his country, to close forever the flood gates of this all-devouring deluge, and to unite with us in drying up this great source of individual crime and national degradation.”

Such is the warfare I would wage, and such the weapons I would wield against the traffic in ardent spirit. And I leave it for the public to judge of their congeniality with our free institutions.—Such, too, is the course pursued by the Executive Committee of the New-York State Temperance society. And it is not till such weapons have failed to reach the hearts of individuals, that they have recommended the withdrawal of patronage, except so far as the article itself was concerned. For it cannot be expected that any consistent temperance man would patronize a man who was engaged in no other traffic except that of alcohol.

P. S. Not wishing to advance an opinion without offering my reasons therefor, I will briefly state the reasons why I considered a part of “A Friend to Temperance’s” article unworthy of notice. I did think that his insinuation of hypocrisy, his appellation of “wiseacres” and “puppets,” his accusing the leading members of temperance societies of taking all the responsibility from the drunkard, and heaping it upon the vender; of ceasing their war against the use of spirits, etc., without quoting the language, or telling where it may be found; together with what he said about Presbyterian priests;—I say, I did think that his language did not breathe that spirit of candor, of forbearance and charity, which should entitle it to a candid reply. I humbly confess myself wrong, and inconsistent, in referring, at all, to what I deemed unworthy of notice. But since I committed the error, I hope that the above apology and confession will secure me the pardon of the public.

PRECEPT AND PRACTICE.

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSEVILLE.

Who has not felt the truth of the remark thrust home to his heart,—“They talk like angels, but they live like men”? What a woful contrast between our words and deeds! Did mankind teach by example, as well as by precept—did we live what we so earnestly recommend to others—how soon would the raging lion become as the gentle lamb! What a glorious revolution would burst upon our land—yea, encircle this mighty globe!

Our theory is surpassing excellent, but how corresponds the practice? Lay thy hand upon thy heart—close thine eye, and look within,—Does naught condemn? Happy! thrice happy art thou who canst truly say, “I have pursued that course which I have so warmly recommended to my fellow-beings!” Thou possessest a gem above all earthly price, and well hast thou deserved it.

APOLOGY FOR PREACHERS.

BY REV. C. S. BROWN.

Perhaps few things appear more reasonable than the common complaint that preachers do not visit more among their congregations. But let us examine the subject, for a few moments. Let it be understood, in the first place, that it is not because we do not wish to visit more; but because we have other duties to perform which we deem more necessary.

In the second place let it be understood that a year consists of three hundred and sixty-five days.

Of these, there are Sundays	52
The remainder are spent in week-day or evening lectures	100
Funerals	20
Visiting the sick	30
Visiting each family once	50
Cares of family	35
Attending to studies	52
Attending to Associations, Conferences, etc., and travelling to appointments, etc.,	26
Total	365

The above we consider a pretty fair representation of the general distribution of a country preacher’s time—allowing for variations which, however, cannot materially change the result.

Now, brethren, how much time has he to spare for extra visiting?

TOUR IN OHIO.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

I take the present opportunity of furnishing you a few scraps from my journal, relative to some of my peregrinations in the West, since the date of my last letter. I was at Belpre, situated on the northern bank of the Ohio river, when I last wrote. From thence I went down this grand, majestic and beautiful stream to the city of Cincinnati. I stopped on my passage at Gallipolis, Portsmouth, Maysville, and some other small towns, but did not tarry long enough to deliver my message in either place. The scenery bordering on the Ohio river is sublimely beautiful; and strikes the eye of the travelling spectator with the most fascinating charms. Sometimes he finds himself in a wild, romantic country, surrounded by high, lofty hills—shelving rocks—and huge precipices; with here and there a glen—a ravine—a rivulet—a tributary stream, occasioning the most pleasing variety.—Sometimes these mountainous elevations approach the river, where they are beheld in all their grandeur and sublimity, and from whose cloud-capt summits we should suppose an observer might grasp in his vision the whole surrounding country, and feast his eyes on the rich and beautiful perspective stretched out before him—sometimes they seem to gradually retire and lose themselves in the distance, leaving in view rich, luxuriant vales, and fertile, alluvial bottom lands, where may be seen the busy husbandman providing himself with the good things of earth by his industry and enterprise. Thus, the traveller has always something new to gaze upon, and something interesting to admire.

Gallipolis is an old town, but not in a flourishing condition. There is less business done in it than in any place of its size on the river, with which I am acquainted. The surrounding country is uneven and rugged—quite thinly populated, and embracing but little wealth. Consequently their means are limited; and it is not to be expected that they can sustain themselves as well as some other places more favorably circumstanced. It was formerly a French settlement, and many of the descendants remain. Attached to the traditions of the fathers, and influenced by educational bias, many of them have imbibed the principles of Volney, Voltaire, Rousseau, and other infidels of the French revolution. They are, however, quite distinguished for their good understanding and sound sense in matters of general intelligence. Quite a goodly number of citizens are Universalists, and if they could obtain stated preaching, there would be no difficulty in sustaining a good society.

Portsmouth is situated on the confluence of the Sciota with the Ohio river, and near the junction of the Ohio canal. It is most delightfully situated, save that it is subject to inundations. It may be extended to any size, any future business or circumstances may demand. The commercial advantages hitherto enjoyed have not been sufficient to warrant a very rapid growth, but they are now improving, and present prospects predict an extensive advancement in time to come. I know not much about the characteristics of the inhabitants; or their moral and religious condition. But I perceived that they had sufficient Partialism among them, to secure the erection of one or two meeting-houses for her benefit.

Maysville is on the Kentucky side, and presents quite a city-like appearance. It has many attractions, and commands quite an extensive business. It extends up and down the river a considerable distance, but is quite narrow in width, owing to the very high hills that skirt its rear, and seemingly threaten, in lordly pride, to push the whole town into the river. The Kentuckians are much like the Virginians, in character. They are fond of amusements, such as hunting, gaming, horse racing, etc., but pay less attention to moral, mental and religious culture, than the northern people. They are distinguished for many noble sentiments and commendable qualities, that serve to recommend them to the esteem of the stranger. They are frank, ingenuous, and familiar; and though possessing a nice sense of a peculiar kind of propriety, they are social, and easy of access; and manifest none of that reserved indifference and cold formality so common with the northern people. The traveller will feel himself as much at home, (and more at ease,) among the Kentuckians, as he will among the inquisitive and companionable Yankees. They are rough in their modes of expression; and their common profanity would shock the sensitive religionist of the North. But it is not regarded by any class of citizens, with a few exceptions; and it passes unobserved. Their internal policy is rather stifling to enterprise and industry; and calculated to perpetuate certain emotions and feelings hostile to refinement, greatness and glory. It is to be hoped, however, that a change will come over them in due time, that they may keep pace with their northern sister States, who are setting them an example in many respects worthy of imitation.

The whole northern part of Kentucky is hilly and unfruitful, and with the exception of its romantic scenery, there is much less to admire than in Ohio. There are some "sunny spots" occasionally to be seen, that may serve in a measure, to redeem its character; but it will bear no comparison with its sister State bordering on the North.

Cincinnati is the great mart of the western world. The visitor would think he had entered one of the Atlantic cities. And when reflecting on its situation in the "far West," he would almost think it was a dream. It exhibits all the characteristics of a seaport. It is generally well built, and contains many fine edifices and public buildings. Eight or ten schoolhouses that have been recently erected, of handsome architecture and resembling houses of worship in their external structure, quite ornament the city. The inhabitants, now amounting to nearly forty thousand, have emigrated from almost all parts of the world; and consequently there is a great variety of character in the place, as well as a great variety of sentiment and opinion in relation to politics, literature and religion. The Catholics have a strong hold here; and it remains for time to show who shall finally have the ascendancy—they or the Protestants. There is much strife between them at present. Both are eager of success. But such is the state of public opinion, providing the Protestant sects behave themselves equally prudent and discreet, there can be but little prospect of the Catholics making proselytes of the American people—and of course, but little hope of their triumph.

Universalism is not in as hopeful a condition as I had anticipated finding it. There are quite a number of warm-hearted friends in the city, who will do all they can for the promotion of the cause, and who will make any reasonable sacrifice for sustaining it. They have recently purchased a house of worship, and though not beautiful, it is well situated, and quite convenient. And having secured the services of Br. George Rogers, it is to be hoped that they may flourish and prosper. I tarried a number of weeks in that region, during which time I visited a number of the adjoining towns, and delivered my message to such as would hear the "Gospel's joyful sound." In the mean time I was present at two oral, public debates carried up by Br. Robert Smith, and two of the Methodist clergy, and lasting four days each. This was an excellent treat for me, being the first of the kind I had ever attended; and I think they cannot fail of being conducive of general good in the advancement and promotion of the cause in the region where they were held.

There are quite a number of Universalist societies in the vicinity of Cincinnati—some of whom are about to build houses of worship—and all that is wanted to render them flourishing, is a few faithful shepherds to go in and out before them, and to feed them with knowledge and understanding.

This is the region in which to preach the love of God—it is exhibited in legible characters on every thing that is seen—and may be illustrated by the whole of the surrounding scenery. Oh! if we had only the means possessed by others, what a shaking among the dry bones there would be in the world—the whole earth would be soon revolutionized. But we must wait God's own time. "He that believeth will not make haste."

I have concluded to make my Winter quarters at Columbus, where I have been a number of weeks. We are considered as unpopular; and our place of worship is not very inviting; but we succeed in keeping up pretty large audiences—evenings. I know not what may be the result of matters here. This is the most important post in the State, and it is very essential that we should get a foothold here. I would be willing to make some sacrifice for its accomplishment, and shall do all in my power to place the cause on a permanent foundation in this city. The result must be left to Providence. Our present operations are but an experiment. We will hope for the best.

I occasionally visit a small place situated where the canal crosses the national road, and have the prospect of getting up a respectable society, and of securing an interest in a small church. This will enable us to advance in conjunction with others. It is certainly a good time for operation in the western world; and I would that our means were adequate to public wants.

THE LAW AND ITS PENALTY.

"The penalty of God's law is eternal death—or eternal suffering in hell. No part of the divine penalty is endured in this life. But the penalty is inflicted after death, and is endless suffering in hell."

"This life is not a state of retribution in any sense, but a state of trial, simply."

The above are the bare assertions, made in the pulpit, by the Rev. Medad Pomeroy, pastor of the Congregational church in Elbridge. They are very important assertions, if true—and if false, the fact ought to be known.

That the penalty of the law is endless suffering in hell, is an assertion we have often heard him make, but it is never accompanied with the proof. We want the proof—positive proof. A doctrine fraught with such awful consequences, ought to be backed up with plain, positive proof.

Now, if the Rev. gentleman will point us to one single plain, positive declaration of Holy Writ, that the penalty of any law given to man by the great Lawgiver, is endless suffering in hell, I pledge myself to renounce Universalism, and give my support to him and his doctrine. With a little trouble and expense, I could point him to the penalties of the laws of this State. I would bring on the statute books, and refer him to the very passages, in plain language. Well, then, cannot friend Pomeroy, who has made the Bible the man of his counsel, point us to one solitary passage containing a law, the penalty of which is endless suffering in hell, after having made the declaration, with so much assurance?

In the Old Testament we find hundreds of laws, and the penalties annexed thereto. The penalties are plain. I will quote one. "Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses." Num. xxxv: 30. This law is plain. The penalty is plain. The Jews could not have been mistaken in this. Now, if there is a law in the Bible, the penalty of which is endless suffering in hell, I have never been able to find it. Will friend Pomeroy just show me where it is?

REASONS.....NO. VII.

FOR REJECTING THE DOCTRINE OF ENDLESS MISERY.

"Produce your cause, saith the Lord, bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob." Isaiah xli: 21.

Eighthly. The doctrine of endless misery stands directly opposed to the justice of God. No attribute of the divine Being, it is believed, stands out in bolder relief against this doctrine than the attribute of justice; notwithstanding which, strange as it may seem, this is the attribute mainly relied upon by the advocates of that theory for its support. Many and many are the times and occasions when, after exhibiting an array of arguments almost innumerable and absolutely invulnerable, in favor of the ultimate salvation of all men and in opposition to endless misery, founded on the wisdom, power, goodness, mercy and grace of God, we are met by the pertinacious opposer with what he considers a quietus to all our arguments, and the strong bulwark of his own darling theory, viz:—That we have forgotten or overlooked the justice of God—that this stands out in hostile and dreadful array against the sentiment we hold, and in favor of never-ending misery—that although all the other attributes of God might seem to favor, or be easily reconciled with universal salvation, yet the strict and inflexible justice of God will forever stand in the way, with sword in hand, to doom to ceaseless wrath a portion of our race, and confine them to the shades of woe to all eternity!

This sentiment, we are aware, derives most of its strength and influence from the power of tradition.

"Man early imbibed false notions of God, Supposed him a tyrant, and vengeance his rod."

From their earliest childhood, people have been taught to believe that they were justly liable to, and richly deserved the deep damnation of hell forever; and that if they were ever saved, it must be by some process by which the voice of justice would be silenced, its righteous claims waived, and its legally sanctioned grasp on its victims loosed by the interposition of some opposite power—some countervailing attribute. And this opinion has been strengthened by the requisition made by almost all professedly orthodox churches on the candidates for admission to their fellowship:—That in narrating their religious experience and exercises they should confess that they had seen themselves to be poor hell-deserving sinners, justly liable to endless damnation, and that if justice were done them endless perdition would be their inevitable doom! Thus these traditional teachings and narrated experiences of reputed saints, have tended to fix and perpetuate in the mind the most false and pernicious ideas of divine justice—that this attribute is no other than the spirit of infinite malignity and almighty revenge; than which nothing can be more opposite to the true attribute of divine justice.

These views of divine justice set at variance Heaven's glorious attributes and at once array the Deity in open hostility against himself. But we read "a house divided against itself cannot stand," but is "brought to desolation." God is not divided against himself—he is one. His name is one—his nature is one—his essence one—he can never be or act inconsistent with himself—with the unity of his nature—the harmony of his designs and purposes. God is love. "He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love." He can have no attribute in opposition to love. "Thou lovest all the things that are, and abhorrest nothing that thy hands have made, for thou never wouldst have made anything to have hated it." God's goodness and mercy are infinite. "The Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." He can have no attribute in opposition to his goodness and his mercy: therefore "justice and mercy are met together: righteousness and peace have embraced each other," "Justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne: mercy and truth go before his face." His nature being love, his essence benevolence itself, all his attributes are consistent with, and in fact nothing but modifications of his infinite love. Hence, the very rod that justice raises for the punishment of the transgressor, is guided by mercy and applied by the hand of love. Hence, the apostle says, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth—he chastens for our profit that we may be partakers of his holiness." And an inspired prophet has said, he is "a just God and a Saviour;" which sentiment would have to be reversed to suit the popular notions of justice and salvation, and would then run something after this manner, "He is a just God, but not a Saviour;" or "He is a Saviour, but not a just God;" as the popular notions on this subject suppose, if any are saved it must be at the expense of justice, (so far at least as the individuals themselves are concerned, inasmuch as all deserve endless damnation,) and that if strict justice is done to all, the endless misery of all will follow as a matter of course.

The favorite and principal argument relied on in support of the justice of endless misery is this: That sin is an infinite evil and therefore justly deserves an infinite punishment. And as an infinite punishment cannot be endured in a limited period, therefore it will require the whole of the long and untold period of eternity to punish sin according to the extent of its demerit. This argument is indeed the dernier resort of the advocates of the merciless dogma of endless misery. It was never thought of till modern times—was never invented till all other arguments failed and were found utterly insufficient to sustain the doctrine with the least semblance of plausibility. And whether or not there is as much strength and solidity as plausibility in this argument will be seen in the sequel. That it is a dernier resort we think will appear from the fact that those who take this ground evidently see themselves in a bad dilemma and are often driven to shift their position to maintain even the appearance of strength. They sometimes undertake to maintain that sin is infinite because committed against an infinite God—sometimes because it is the transgression of an infinite law, and that the law is infinite because God is its author; and sometimes because it is the opposite of holiness, and as God is infinite in holiness and sin is its opposite, therefore sin is infinite as the antipode of holiness.

But the entire sophistry and utter untenableness of all such arguments will be seen at a glance. There is and can be, strictly speaking, but one infinity in the universe; and that is God. He and he only, is infinite in all his perfections, in all his attributes. Holiness is an essential principle of God's nature and in him it is infinite. So also of wisdom, goodness, power, etc. In him they are all infinite. These principles may also exist in man, but in man they are all necessarily finite—the same in nature, but different in degree from what they are in God. Man may be wise, but his wisdom is limited—he may be powerful, but his power is limited—he may be good, but his goodness is limited—he may be holy, but his holiness is limited. So he may be sinful, but his sin is limited by the same cause that limits all his attributes and all his actions—by the very nature which he possesses. To say that sin is infinite because opposed to the holiness of God, would be to say that there are as many infinities in the universe as there are, ever have been and ever shall be, sins, follies and foibles, among the children of men from the creation of the world to the last child of Adam's numerous race: and as God is but one, and he no more than infinite, what could he do against so many infinities opposed to him and his holiness? Would not sin be much more likely to overcome and destroy the holiness of God than the holiness of God would be to destroy sin? To say that sin is infinite because it is the transgression of the divine law, and the law is infinite because God is its author, would be to say that every thing that God has made is infinite because God is its author—would be to say, "Beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see, no glass can reach," from the high archangels that bow before the throne of the Eternal, down to the meanest creature, the most diminutive insect that flits the air or grovels in the dust, is infinite because God is its author! To say that sin is infinite because committed against an infinite God, would be to say that opposition necessarily implies equality! A fly attacks a horse; therefore a fly is as big as the horse he attacks! A gnat attacks an elephant; therefore there is no difference in the size of a gnat and an elephant!

Thus we see the weakness and extreme absurdity of the arguments employed to prove that sin is an infinite evil and justly deserves endless damnation. The theory, too, involves innumerable other absurdities and inconsistencies besides those above named. It supposes a finite being can commit an infinite act—that a stream can rise higher than its fountain—that an effect can be far greater than its cause—that the creature can equal if not exceed the Creator.

Moreover, the theory, if admitted, would defeat the very object professedly had in view by those who maintain it, viz: to honor and magnify divine justice. For it would prove the eternal injustice of God, and the utter impossibility of his ever being able to do justice by one soul of Adam's sinful race, and therefore that this glorious attribute of Deity would be forever dishonored and defeated. For if sin be infinite and justly deserve endless punishment, then it is certain, justice can never be done—its demands can never be satisfied—the time will never arrive when its claims can be said to be liquidated. What is always doing can never be said to be done; consequently it can never be said respecting any sinner that he has received all the punishment that justice demands.

If sin be infinite for the reason assigned by the advocates of this theory, then every sin is infinite, and all distinctions between crimes must be done away—there can be no crimes more or less enormous than others in the comparison—the crime of stealing an apple is equally as heinous, involves as deep guilt, and exposes to as deep and lasting damnation, as the crimes of rape, treason, arson or murder, or all of them united. If every sin be infinite and deserve endless damnation, then justice would require as many eternities to punish a man for his sins as the number of all his sins from his birth to his death: and supposing a man to live three score years and ten, and to commit only one sin per day during life, it would require the enormous number of twenty-five thousand five hundred and fifty eternities to punish him justly! nay, justice could not be done him even by this multiplication of the number of eternities, for the reason before assigned, that no one of them would ever end!

Common sense, reason and revelation alike declare such a theory false and absurd. The common sense of all mankind, when not distorted by tradition or prejudice, or warped by the systems of men, must teach them that man is finite in his nature, finite in all his faculties and attributes, and that all his deeds, whether good or bad, must necessarily be finite in their character and consequently limited in their effects. The fact that all just laws, human and divine, recognise different degrees of criminality in transgressors, and impose different degrees of punishment accordingly, refutes the idea of the infinity of sin. There are proportions and degrees of guilt, in all transgressors; and all wholesome laws graduate their degrees of punishment accordingly. The Scriptures plainly recognise this rule. Jesus says, (Luke xii: 47, 48,) "That servant which knew his Lord's will and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required."

Thus we see that sin or guilt is reckoned and its degrees determined, not by the holiness of God, its opposite; not by the infinity or perfection of the law of God, of which it is the transgression; not by the infinity of God, against whom it is committed; but by a very different and altogether better standard—the degree of light and knowledge enjoyed by the transgressor. Two individuals may perform precisely the same act outwardly, and yet be involved in very different degrees of guilt by it.

according to the different degrees of knowledge possessed: and this is indeed the only just or correct criterion by which to regulate or determine the responsibility of mankind. Hence, idiots and insane people are not considered responsible at all, either to God or man. The little child is less responsible than the enlightened adult. And that moment different degrees of responsibility and guilt are recognised, that moment the idea of sin's being infinite must be abandoned; because there are no degrees to infinity—no proportion, no comparison, no resemblance between finite and infinite.

It being thus clearly demonstrated, both by reason and revelation, that sin is finite or limited in its nature, it must be equally clear to every rational mind, that justice can never require infinite or unlimited punishment as its penalty. It would hence be a most flagrant violation of the justice of God to torment mankind infinitely, either in degree or duration for sins which in their very nature were necessarily limited and finite. Each crime can justly deserve but a certain degree or amount of punishment, even if we suppose punishment to be inflicted on strictly retaliatory principles, (which, by-the-by, we do not admit,) and put as many finites together as we please, we can never make an infinite of them. Multiply the number of transgressions, and extend the duration of punishment for each one to the utmost stretch of human thought or conception—employ as many figures to calculate their number and duration as would wind the earth from pole to pole, and multiply them thrice ten thousand times into themselves; still they would come short of infinity—there would ultimately be an end of them, and a rigid and inflexible justice would be satisfied, and say, "let the punishment of the transgressor cease." Thus we see that justice especially, as well as every other attribute of the divine Being, stands directly opposed to the doctrine of endless misery.

Ninthly. The doctrine stands directly opposed to the truth of God. The veracity of Jehovah is intimately connected with and concerned in this subject; and as certainly as the word of God is true, so certainly is the doctrine of endless misery false. This will appear, not only by the general tenor of our subject, the denouement of our successive arguments relating to it, the voice of the Scriptures generally, and the arguments yet to be adduced on the affirmative of the question concerning universal salvation; but also by the direct and positive assertions contained in the Bible against this doctrine. For example we read, Lam. iii: 31-33, "The Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." Here we have the positive and solemn asseveration of God's inspired prophet, that he will not cast off forever. But the doctrine of endless misery affirms that he will cast off forever. Therefore the doctrine directly contradicts the word of God by his prophet. Again, God says by the prophet Isaiah (lvii: 16,) "I will not contend forever; neither will I be always wroth: for the spirits should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." Here Jehovah not only solemnly declares that he will not contend forever, nor be always wroth, but also assigns the reason why he will not—the creature would perish—the souls he has made could not endure the eternal wrath of their Creator. Now the doctrine of endless misery contradicts this testimony, and maintains that God will contend forever and be always wroth with some of his children, and yet does not pretend to assign any reason for such a merciless procedure. Now it appears to me that those who contradict God, and maintain that he will forever contend and be eternally wroth with his children, ought to give as good a reason, at least, why he will as he has why he will not.

Other testimony from the Scriptures might be adduced on this subject, but we deem it unnecessary under this head. We have given a number of "strong reasons," at least they appear so to us, for rejecting the doctrine of endless misery. We have shown that it is useless, pernicious, dishonorable to God and opposed to all his attributes—his benevolence, mercy, wisdom, power, justice and truth; and we now leave the reader to make up his mind whether the doctrine can be true, or deserving his confidence or support. In our next, we shall proceed to present the reader with some of our "strong reasons" for believing and maintaining the doctrine of universal salvation.

D. S.

TRIFLES.

Every man it is said, has his peculiar whims—certain it is, I have mine, and love their gratification dearly. Having ruled over certain districts in Pennsylvania, governing the children, who ruled their mothers, who ruled their husbands, who are the sovereign powers that be—in other words, having taught school for several years, correct "spelling" enters among my other troubles. The printing business added a few more "notions" to my whimsies. The study of theology added to these again. All these have been increased and peculiarized by a sedentary life and a nervous habit of constitution. Hence, even trifles become, frequently, important matters in my eyes—whether they are regarded as matters of pleasure or of business. This by way of apology and for preface for these trifling articles.

Like many others of my race, I carry my faults behind me—my neighbors' full in sight—and hence, see defects in others where I do not even suspect them in myself. This, to satisfy the reader that I do not call others guilty because I am innocent.

Two errors have been lately, very generally copied into our periodicals, from secular papers, where they have been circulated so long and generally as to be worthy of correction. The first is an anecdote of Dean Swift. It states that once when a couple appeared before him to be married, he commenced by reading the funeral service, and on being checked, said they had better be buried than married. The error is, in calling the Dean a bachelor. If I mistake not, Dean Swift was a married man, but (worse than brute that he was!) he never lived with his amiable and excellent wife.

The second error is a sophistical comparison, representing the newspaper borrower's excuse, ("Lend me your paper, I only want to read it,") to be as absurd as that of a man who should say to a baker, "Lend me a loaf of bread, I only want to eat it." If reading a newspaper destroyed it, or utterly prevented others from reading it, the comparison might answer.

The Christian Pilot heads "Bible Readings," (copied from this paper,) "By Mrs. Julia Ann Scott." I know no correspondent of that name. Miss Julia H. Kinney, that was, (not Kenney, as some print that name,) is the Mrs. Scott who furnished those articles.

Ever since I have been convinced by actual examination that the Bible speaks of the "doctrine of God," "doctrine of Christ," "doctrine of the Gospel," always in the singular number (doctrine, and not doctrines)—and that, on the other hand, it speaks of the "doctrines of devils," "false doctrines," etc., always in the plural form (doctrines, and not doctrine)—I say (for fear the reader may forget, in the length of the sentence that I have already said, that) ever since I have been convinced of this fact, I feel a twinge all over my nervous system, like the jangling of a harpsichord all unstrung, at reading in a Universalist periodical of "our doctrines," "the doctrines of Universalists," "the doctrines of the Gospel," etc. This whim of mine is at least a Scriptural one.

Believing that no person is an actual loser by being removed from this state of existence, I cannot but think that, however we may mourn the decease of relatives and friends, our apparent loss is their gain. Yet how often do we read obituary notices in which the loss is placed to the account of the deceased! They do not mean, I hope, to insinuate that the living are gainers by it! The language runs, generally thus—say the deceased is a father—"Long will the bereaved children lament his loss"—probably meaning "their loss." When correspondents make such errors, Editors should correct before publishing them.

EPISCOPALIANISM.

The following very shrewd and sensible remarks on the hollow coldness of Episcopal formality and ceremony—the incongruity between it and apostolic simplicity and zeal—and especially on the nature, end and aim of the Methodist Episcopal government, are worthy of a careful perusal. The comparison of the presiding Elder, and the comment by the Doctor, are beyond all praise. I wish every independent minded Methodist in the United States, could see this double-gear, people-grinding, ecclesiastical mill in its proper light.

The article is an extract of a letter (published in the Christian Palladium, of the 1st inst.,) written by Elder I. N. Walters, and dated city of "New-York, January 30, 1836." Read it. A. B. G.

The next thing that particularly arrested our attention, was the different churches called after the apostles—such as St. John's church, St. Paul's church, St. Stephen's church, etc. These churches, as they are called, have towering steeples and lofty spires, whose stupendous heights reach the passing clouds. We entered some of those churches and beheld with astonishment, the regulations and worship of those popular sects. And what, Sir, do you suppose was passing? The priest changing his dress, reading prayers, and the prayerless, with their books, reading over after him. But the most striking thing we saw, was the figure of St. Paul in marble, in front of St. Paul's church in Broadway. He is represented walking out of the church, with his books under his arm, as though he was disgusted with the proceedings inside, and was about leaving them to pursue alone their anti-Christian worship. I observed to my friend that those Babel builders could have presented nothing so illustrative of the circumstances of the day, as that figure. The Athenians, while surrounded with thirty thousand gods, made an altar to the "Unknown God," which proved to be the true God. So those people in the midst of their extravagance, had presented something to [represent the apostle Paul; and unwittingly they had represented him truly; for it is so designed as to] show that the apostle was disgusted with their forms and ceremonies. And there is Trinity church, which stands in a very conspicuous place, where all classes can read the inscription. A stranger wished to know, whether the people who worshipped in that temple were not Hindoos, and had the image of Brahma, with his three faces representing what the house was called. We answered no; these people professed to be Christians. What kind of Christians? said the stranger. Christians of the church of England, was the reply. That is very likely, I am sure, said he; they cannot be Christians of the church of God, for that has one God, and one Lord Jesus Christ, and not a Trinity. So he passed on. But in the midst of our ramble, I thought if Paul, John, Stephen and the other apostles, were to rise from the dead and appear in this city, as they did at Athens, Rome, Ephesus, etc., they would not be permitted to preach in those churches which are called by their names—they would be looked upon as some crazy fanatics, and their doctrine would be heresy. Why, Sir, I believe they would be indicted for blasphemy, whipped for fools, and imprisoned for knaves; and if they worked a miracle in confirmation of their mission, they would be laughed at as magicians, only acquainted with the principles of legerdemain. For even when a man appears among them, holding forth the plain, simple truth of the Bible, taking the name of his divine Master, pleading for the injured rights of his fellow-men, and declaring the Scriptures to be the only and all-sufficient rule of faith and practice, he is denounced as a dangerous man, one that is corrupting the morals of the youth, and more to be dreaded than the avowed infidel. Such, Mr. Editor, is the state of popular orthodoxy in the city of New-York, in the circle of one sect.

Our attention was next arrested with the Methodist churches. They are plain neat buildings, very suitable for worship, and the only inscription they have is, "THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH." I said to my friend, there is more aristocracy to be found in those plain buildings than in all the other Protestant churches that we have passed to-day. "Oh, no; you are certainly mistaken." I asked him if he had ever come in contact with their Episcopal majesty? He said no. Then you know nothing about their cruelties. I informed him, I had less confidence in the friendship of a Methodist clergyman, than in that of any other minister in Christendom. I looked upon their friendship like that of a frozen snake; meet with them where they are unpopular or want to accomplish anything for their interest, they will be very friendly—all love and goodness. But as soon as their ends are accomplished, they will turn about and tell the most egregious falsehoods about our doctrine—defame our character, and say, we will be damned as sure as the devil is damned, etc. Just like the frozen snake, when you take it in, and warm and thaw it, it will be sure to bite you. I speak from actual experience. Even in this city during my controversy with them, you saw how they treated me, what power they wanted to exercise over the people—how important they were in my own pulpit—what awful misrepresentations were made, and how the speaker strained every nerve to shed a few crocodile tears to make the people think he was sincere.

But to illustrate my views of their government, I will relate a circumstance that happened in Ohio a few years ago. The Rev. George Brown was stationed in a very thriving village, where there was a large Methodist church. He was very popular in his church, and a man of fine talents. He united with the Methodists very young, as the church of his father and mother, with the firm belief their government was the best in the world, and never had any doubts on this subject till the close of the second year of his station. A quarterly meeting being appointed, the presiding Elder, and a number of circuit preachers were in attendance. On Saturday evening, the presiding Elder, Mr. Brown, and other ministers were invited to tarry with a certain Doctor in the village. They readily accepted the invitation, and accordingly went and spent the evening very agreeably. On Sabbath morning while at breakfast, the presiding Elder addressed the Doctor, as he was always angling to catch big fish, and the Doctor being of that class, said, you ought to join our church; your lady belongs, and you ought to go with her. Sir, said the Doctor, I like your preaching and your doctrine, but I never shall join your church. Why not? said the Elder. Because I do not like your government. Astonishing, said the Elder, that you do not like our government, when, Sir, it is the best in the world. I will give you an understanding of our government—and for the sake of illustration, I will present to your view a double-gear mill. You know in those mills there are large wheels, and smaller ones, all moving for the good of the whole. Just so in our government, we have a large outside wheel that moves with great precision and regularity; this we call the bishop wheel. There is another inside of that which moves with great precision. This we call the presiding Elder wheel. And there is another which moves with the same precision, which we call the itinerant wheel.—Lastly, there is another that we call the local preacher or class leader wheel. Now, Sir, all these move with great regularity and precision; and something similar to Ezekiel's vision—a wheel within a wheel. How do you like it, Sir? Mr. Brown said he knew the Doctor to be one of those deep thinking, penetrating, philosophic geniuses, and was waiting to hear his answer, as they calculated to catch him at that meeting. The Doctor turned his eye upon the Elder with one of his keen, sarcastic looks, and said—and all these wheels to grind the people! A great silence. Mr. Brown said his knife fell out of his hand. The Elder was confounded, and they were all amazed; not a word said. The Doctor perceived their confusion, but proceeded and said—Sir, your government is not as good as the British laws! Another thundering sentence. But he proceeded to show—in England there were three departments—monarchy, aristocracy and democracy. The king has vested in him the principle of monarchy; consequently people are ruled as things, not as men. And there are lords or peers who have vested in them, as the nobility, the principles of aristocracy, where the will and interest of the people are never consulted. But there is the House of Commons, where the people are represented and have a voice. You have the two former but not the latter. You meet in your general and annual conferences and enact laws, where the people are never consulted, and where they have no voice in the matter. Then your functionaries are compelled to enforce them on the people, under the penalty of being excluded from church, etc.—Therefore I shall never be a Methodist. Mr. Brown concluded the Doctor saved considerable by his reply to the presiding Elder, as they did not eat any more after the great wheels began to move. They all concluded the Doctor was a very impertinent fellow for talking so to the presiding Elder, as you know they love to be called Rabbi, and looked upon as the second wheel. They all soon repaired to love feast. Mr. Brown said he took a seat in a corner, and while the brethren were singing and praising God, he could hear nothing but—all these wheels to grind the people, and our government not as good as British laws—and verily he thought it was the truth. He immediately threw of the yoke of Episcopal despotism, and in a short time was a free man.

"YOUNG MEN, BEWARE!"

This is the label with which Br. Hutchinson (never mind what he says, ladies, he is not married yet) marked the following letter from a Postmaster at the West. Really, it was not a very inappropriate label, had he only added to it "of marrying bigoted Partialists." It is only a few days since Br. Gardner wrote us that the people in the valley of the Mississippi were beginning to think for themselves, and to act, too—this, then, must be an exception to the general rule—or, perhaps our subscriber is proceeding gently and cautiously, intending to convert his wife by degrees. He may rely upon it, he will find no better way than to give his wife her paper, and he take his—she will have no cause to complain if the division of papers is thus made equal. After a time, she may be prevailed on to exchange with her husband—and the work is done. I care not how prejudiced a woman is against Universalism, a comparison of her favorite Partialist journal with a Universalist paper, will soon show her where the spirit and doctrine of Jesus is—and she will reject the cruel doctrine of endless sin and woe, and of the devil's triumph, with abhorrence. If she does not, she must lack human reason or woman's tender feelings and gentle spirit. Let our subscriber try it. If he will not, or cannot, he can pay up to the then present time, and we will discontinue the paper. Will the Postmaster please to attend to this? A. B. G.

—, Pike, county, Ills., January 10, 1836.

"Messrs. EDITORS—It appears to be a duty incumbent on me, to apprise you that your paper directed to —, is not taken out of the postoffice. His lady is [what is called] Orthodox, and consequently cannot bear the thought that her ungodly husband shall be a participant of immortality with her, or in other words, that he shall dwell with her in the next state of being, without a miraculous change in this—professing at the same time, that it is God who must work such change "of his own good will and pleasure." She is opposed to his taking your paper to his house, through fear of contaminating the family with the doctrine that 'Christ is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world.'

"The first paper, and the package containing twenty-seven papers of back numbers, he lifted—his paper still arriving, I asked him if he did not intend to lift them; he replied that he did—that he hoped his wife might, perhaps, come to reading them, and he would be at liberty to read them himself, without injury to her feelings—and so the matter stands, until now, I thought it my duty to inform you of the case, and then you will know what you will do.

"The doctrine of the restitution is advancing here, (although we have no preaching,) by means of your valuable paper.

NEW AGENTS.—J. E. Beardsley, P. M., Scipio—William B. Holmes, Herkimer—Roderick Frisbee, Eaton's Corners.

Will Mrs. W. S. Baleh, Providence, (R. I.), and Allen Thompson, Somerville, please act as agents for this paper?

ITEMS.

PHILOMATH ENCYCLOPEDIA.—Br. Kidwell requests all our Eastern Editors to copy the proposals published in our last—also to send on their papers in exchange. He thinks the first number will appear next month.

Br. E. GAGE wishes all with whom he left the Register and Almanac, to make immediate returns to him at Kings' ferry, P. O., Cayuga county.

* * The Herald of Truth will please copy.

CORRECTION.—In noticing the Conference at Norwich, in number 10, I stated that six preachers were present. I was unintentionally misinformed. Br. M. B. Newell, and a young brother from the East, supposed name of Parker, were also present.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—A desire to give Br. Potter's excellent sermon this week, and some unavoidable circumstances, have compelled us to defer some promised articles till our next. Br. T. C. E. will oblige us much by sending the sermon.

Br. PRICE—Send the Union to Br. T. J. Smith, Bridge-water, Oneida county, and charge A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

POETRY.

INTEMPERANCE.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

Parent!—who with speechless feeling,
O'er thy cradled treasure bent,
Every year, new claims revealing,
Yet thy wealth of love unspent.
Hast thou seen that blossom blighted,
By a drear, untimely frost?
All thy labor unrequited?
Every glorious promise lost!

Wife, with agony unspoken,
Shrinking from affliction's rod,
Is thy prop—thine idol broken—
Fondly trusted—next to God?
Husband!—o'er thy hope a mourner,
Of thy chosen friend ashamed,
Hast thou to her burial borne her,
Unrepentant—unreclaimed!

Child—in tender weakness turning
To thy heaven-appointed guide,
Doth a lava-poison burning,
Tinge with gall affection's tide!
Still that orphan-burden bearing,
Darker than the grave can show,
Dost thou bow thee down despairing,
To a heritage of woe?

Country!—on thy sons depending,
Strong in manhood, bright in bloom,
Hast thou seen thy pride descending,
Shrouded to the unhonored tomb?
Rise!—on eagle pinions soaring—
Rise!—like one of godlike birth—
Sweep the spoiler from the earth.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

A Mother's Love—how sweet the name!
What is a Mother's Love?
A noble, pure and tender flame,
Enkindled from above,
To bless a heart of earthly mould;
The warmest love that can't grow cold;
This is a Mother's Love.

To bring a helpless babe to light,
Then while it lies forlorn,
To gaze upon that dearest sight,
And feel herself new-born:
In its existence lose her own,
And live and breathe in it alone;
This is a Mother's Love.

Its weakness in her arms to bear—
To cherish on her breast,
Feed it from love's own fountain there,
And lull it there to rest—
Then while it slumbers watch its breath,
As if to guard from instant death—
This is a Mother's Love.

To mark its growth from day to day,
Its opening charms admire—
Catch from its eye the earliest ray
Of intellectual fire—
To smile and listen while it talks
And lend a finger when it walks:
This is a Mother's Love.

JUSTICE.....RIGHT.

The radical sense of justice and equity, is straight as a line, or smooth and even as a surface. The opposite qualities, wrong and injustice, are expressed by words which signify a deviation from a straight line or an even surface. The printer uses the word justify in its original sense. Types justify when they are exactly of a length, and form an even surface. The word wrong, from uring, to twist, like the word perverse, from the Latin pervertio, gives the true primary sense of moral evil—a deviation from the straight line of duty, rectitude, or divine commands.

The word right in English signifies primarily straight, as a right line in mathematics. This is the Latin rectus, a participle of rego, to rule, guide, or manage. But these explanatory words do not express the radical signification, which is, to strain, to stretch; for government is restraint. Now straining, stretching, gives the sense of straight, or right.

The consideration of this word right suggests the question whether the right arm of the human species is generally made stronger than the left, or whether the greater strength of the right arm, which occurs in most men, is the effect of habitual use. I am inclined to believe that generally the superior strength of the right arm proceeds from nature, rather than from use; though the dexterity of that arm may be from habitual use. Certain it is that, in some cases, the right limb is the largest; and it may be the intention of the Creator to give that arm the superiority, to enable men to apply it in sudden emergencies, when an equal strength and facility of use in both arms might delay action, by causing suspense for a moment in deliberating which hand to employ.

Of the antiquity of this estimated superiority of the right arm, we have abundant evidence. It was this opinion that rendered omens on the right hand auspicious among the Romans, and inauspicious on the left hand—the light or weak hand. So in Scripture, the exertion of great power by the Almighty is expressed by the use of his right hand.

This preference or superior strength of the right hand, has also rendered the right side the place of honor. Of the antiquity of this preference, we have a remarkable proof in the conduct of Jacob, who, when about to bless the sons of Joseph, laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, the younger son, and his left hand upon the head of Manasseh, intending by that act to signify that the greater blessings were to attend Ephraim.—Noah Webster.

MAXIMS FOR MARRIED LADIES.

The following maxims, if pursued, will not only make the men in love with marriage, but cause them to be good husbands. The first is, to be good yourself. To avoid all thoughts of managing a husband. Never try to deceive or impose on his understanding, nor give him uneasiness; but treat him with affection, sincerity and respect. Remember that husbands, at best, are only men, subject like yourselves to error and frailty. Be not too sanguine then, before marriage, or promise yourselves happiness without alloy. Should you discover anything in his humor or behavior not altogether what you expected or wish, pass it over, smooth your own temper and try to mend his, by attention, cheerfulness and good nature. Never reproach him with misfortunes, which are the accidents and infirmities of life—a burden which each has engaged to assist the other in supporting, and to which both parties are equally exposed—but instead of murmuring and reflections, divide the sorrows between you; and make the best of it, and it will be easier to both. It is the innate office of the softer sex to soothe the troubles of the other. Resolve every morning to be cheerful all day, and should anything occur to break your resolutions, suffer it not to put you out of temper with your husband. Dispute not with him, be the occasion what it may, but much sooner deny yourself the trifle of having your own will, or gaining the better of an argument, than risk a quarrel or create a heartburning, which it is impossible to foresee the end of. Implicit submission in a man to his wife, is ever disgraceful to both; but implicit submission in the wife, is what she promised at the altar, what the good will revere her for, and what is, in fact, the greatest honor she can receive. Be assured, a woman's power, as well as her happiness has no other foundation than in her husband's esteem and love, which it is her interest, by all possible means, to preserve and increase. Study, therefore, his temper, and command your own. Enjoy with him satisfaction, share and soothe his cares, and with the utmost assiduity conceal his infirmities.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

The excellence of this prayer would justify its introduction into any form of worship, intended for the use of Christians, upon any occasion whatever: for never, perhaps, was a more perfect form of prayer embodied in words—nor can any mere human praise or panegyric do justice to its merits, as a specimen of composition of that peculiar character. It carries the evidence of its original along with it. None can pause and reflect upon its excellencies, without being struck with the conviction, that the mind which conceived and dictated that form of prayer, was alone that which knew both for what to pray, and how to pray, in the manner most becoming the agent in the act of prayer, and the object addressed by it. A peculiar air of well-sustained grandeur—a solemn and dignified simplicity, combined with all the warmth and feeling which is necessary to give animation and fervor to devotion, is characteristic of it throughout. The flow of thought—the tone of emotion—the propriety of expression—is the most correct and natural, yet the most elevated and dignified, imaginable. Seriousness is the feeling which predominates—a composed, a concentrated seriousness—full of a reverential sense of the worth of prayer. Let an individual enter into the spirit of each petition, as its own nature and import would suggest—and so would he find himself affected by it. His soul would rise with the gravity, majesty, dignity, and yet the calmness, the simplicity, the sobriety of the truly Christian prayer. He would feel in whose presence he was; and his words (as the words of that unrivalled prayer are) would be reverentially brief, concisely full, composedly fervent, eloquently simple and sublimely expressive.

IT IS GIVEN TO ALL TO DO GOOD.

There are those that have a gentler and more bounded ministry, seemingly more limited at least, though in reality with an expansiveness which may bear it beyond many that are deemed the most extensive, and that are the most conspicuous. She who carefully and tenderly constructed the little boat of bulrushes in which the infant Moses floated safely on the Nile, unknowingly but holily contributed her portion toward the splendid triumph of Israel's emancipation from Egyptian bondage. Not less holy would have been her task, nor less divine her mission, had the child's destiny been only to feed the flocks of Jethro upon the pastures of Midian. From those to whom the physical safety of the infant human being in its fragility, or the soothing of age in its infirmity, is a care—to those who fill man's little separate world with order, harmony and gladness—to those who are as the fire from heaven that was said, in times of old, to descend and consume the sacrifice on the altar, and who kindle and inspire all that is high and holy in human intellect or energy; through all these, woman has her mission, too, equal with, though varied from that of man, and often full alike of peril and glory; as was theirs who stood by the cross when the disciples fled, and came to the sepulchre before the disciples stirred.

CONSTANTINE.

It is said that Constantine, finding when he came to the throne a considerable number of Christians in office and at court, issued an edict requiring them to renounce Christianity or quit their places. The far greater part of them resolutely gave up their employment and prospects in order to preserve a good conscience; but a few cringed, and renounced Christianity. When the Emperor had thus made full proof of their disposition, he turned out every one that had complied and took all the others in again, stating to them, that "those who would not be true to Christ would not be true to him."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on February 24, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. HARVEY VAN VLECK, to Miss IRENA CAIN, both of Schuyler.

Also, on the 6th inst, by the same, ROBERT GALLT, Esq., of Weedsport, to Miss MARGARET JANE, daughter of William B. Goff, Esq., of this city.

In Boonville, February 26, by Rev. J. A. Aspinwall, Mr. THOMAS FETTERLY, of Little Falls, Herkimer county, to Miss HANNAH MARIA KEYS, of the former place.

In Ellisburg, December 6, 1835, by Rev. J. French, Mr. FERRENZO BROWN, to Miss CAROLINE SHERMAN, both of Ellisburg.

In Ashford, Cattaraugus county, on February 21, by Rev. J. Todd, Mr. APOLLOS WOODRUFF, to Miss CAROLINE C. DYVERT, both of that place.

DEATHS.

In Little Falls, Herkimer county, on the 21st February, last, JAMES G., son of Mr. D. W. and Lavina Shaw, in the 8th year of his age. A funeral discourse was delivered on the following day by the writer of this, to the mourners and a respectable congregation of sympathising friends, from Isaiah xl: 8. M. B. NEWELL.

In Clarendon, January 13, Mrs. LUCY KNOWLES, aged 73 years. She retired to bed in usual health, and, on the following morning, when called to breakfast, she answered not. She had closed her eyes in death, probably, without a struggle or a groan.

The funeral services were attended by the writer, on the 15th, and the Gospel presented for the comfort of those that mourned—may it be salutary to all present on the mournful occasion. C. H.

MINISTERIAL CONDUCT.

BY REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

How shall I best serve the church of which I am a member?

Uncle Jeremy, an old friend of mine to whose opinions, in these matters, I attach some consequence, thinks that more is required to qualify a man for the Universalist ministry, than a mere flippancy in running through a round of texts against Partialism, and in favor of his own beau ideal of doctrines. I confess I think him not far amiss in this. It was Paul's judgment that the Gospel minister should be "apt to teach," and hence he enjoins Timothy, "till I come, give attendance to reading." The first promulgators of the Gospel were supernaturally endowed with knowledge and the gift of tongues, which is evidence undeniable that, in the judgment of God also, they who are employed to teach others must themselves be taught. What can be more contemptible than an ignorant public teacher? I once witnessed a regularly ordained preacher publicly reading a chapter in Job, and having occasion to turn over the leaf he turned over two by mistake, which brought him into the Psalms, and he continued to read without knowing the difference!

An idea has certainly obtained amongst the public, that Universalist ministers are well instructed men, and something more than a mess of rant is expected of one of them, when he rises to preach—reason and evidence are required of him as the ground of his hope. Now, if he is palpably deficient in grammatical accuracy, the intelligent will despise him as an ignoramus—if he affects the florid style, and fails through utter ignorance and mismanagement of figures, they will loathe him as a conceited coxcomb—if he talks of Greek in hobbling English, they will pity him as an irreclaimable fool—in any of which cases, he not only must fail of being useful, but he brings the cause he has espoused into contempt. An illiterate man is continually liable to err in one of these ways, or in all of them together—unless he has been extraordinarily endowed by nature—and he moreover discovers such an ignorance of principles in theology and morals, and of facts in history and the sciences, as continually exposes him to the ridicule, contempt, or disgust of his hearers; and, if he have nice sensibilities—though that seldom happens—he often incurs the most painful self-mortifications. For my own sake, then, as well as for that of the church to which I belong, I must endeavor to render myself acceptable as a public teacher, by applying myself earnestly to the cultivation of my mind.

A Universalist preacher, more than any other, is accessible to all classes of the public—the candid inquirer—the captious querist—the bitter, self-confident Pharisee—the skeptical, future-life-denying Sadducee—and he may depend upon it, that even his bitterest foes—those who most virulently vituperate against the morals and faith of the Universalist—will nevertheless deem it out of character with his profession, if he substitute dogmatism for argument, or a supercilious retort for a meet and candid answer. He, moreover, will not be allowed to avail himself of that most convenient evasion under which the craft has so long sheltered its weakness and its ignorance—"It is an awful mystery, and must not be pryed into by vulgar minds." This continues still to be a comfortable subterfuge for others, but better things are expected of him, and he must qualify himself accordingly. How can he endure the reflection that every paltry pedagogue he may meet in his rides—every itinerant vender of Par-tialism—may be his superior in literary attainments? I once had a conversation of some length with the Principal of a seminary in high repute. I was the first minister of our order with whom he had ever fallen in, and for a Partialist clergyman he spoke of us with much liberality—he had a favorable impression of our standing in point of intelligence. I overheard him express this to the gentleman (himself not a Universalist) at whose house we met, "Be sure you bring him to my residence, and make a tarry of some hours," said he, "for nothing pleases me better than conversation with well informed travellers." I excused myself from going however. Do you guess the reason? He had greatly overrated my information. I feared a further acquaintance would sink me in his estimation—and, so far as the Universalist body and myself were identified in his mind, any contempt he might feel for the latter would extend to the former. I confess I am so much of a sectarian, that I cannot consent to bring myself into disparaging contrast with a preacher of another sect. I owe it to the church of which I am a member, to contribute my utmost to elevate its standing, for intelligence, as well as for purity of life, and amenity of manners. What would I not have given in this case—for the sake of the Universalist order alone—to have stood on a par, in point of mental culture, with my amiable, and enlightened, though Partialist friend! Alas! this is not the only instance in which I have been mortified by a consciousness, that my attainments were far short of the requirements of my station.

I hope these remarks will not operate discouragingly on the modest subject of a call to the Gospel ministry. When I speak of a call, I am not to be understood in the popular sense of that term. If his qualifications are limited, let his pretensions be limited accordingly. Let him beware of the frog in the fable, which burst itself in straining to become an ox. If he cannot greatly edify, he need not disgust his hearers. The besetting sin of illiterate preachers is, that of indulging in an inflated style—they mistake bombast for rhetoric—attempting the sublime, they push just one step beyond, into the ridiculous! They find an analogy to their preaching, in the strutting pomposity of Cudjo in the tawdry livery of his new coat, or in the fair Phillis in the antiquated hooped petticoat and faded flounces of her mistress. Modesty and simplicity, even in the absence of literary acquirement, will gain for a public speaker the respect of the intelligent part of his auditors, for they will perceive that nature has laid in him a solid foundation—good sense—and they will hope that study and application will superinduce upon that foundation all the other requisite qualities of a successful public teacher.

It is too late in the age of the world for an illiterate ministry to succeed, except among the illiterate. Fifty years ago this was not the case; scarce one individual in a hundred had then a knowledge of grammar—scarce one in five hundred had any acquaintance with physics—the human mind had hardly cast off its swaddling clothes—anything would answer public expectation that was preaching in profession, and noise in reality. A Methodist itinerant, named Benjamin Abbott, served up an agreeable mental dish from the text, "I knew thee, that thou art an oysterman." "Wonderful condescension!" he exclaimed, "for Christ to stoop to the humble office of an oysterman! Sinners are the oysters which are roasting in the fire of hell, and preachers are the tongs employed for pulling the oysters out of the fire." I am told that several were hopefully converted under this sublime rhapsody! But people now-a-days know the difference betwixt "austere" and "oyster," and, therefore, it behooves the preacher to know the difference likewise.

A clerical acquaintance of mine, (I had it from the lips of a witness,) conceiving that he had a call to preach the Gospel, called on an eminently learned minister of the Episcopal church, to obtain his judgment in regard to this conceived point of duty. An ignorant fanatic would consider this step a "conferring with flesh and blood;" but with that I have nothing to do. The clergyman questioned him touching his literary attainments. He was answered that these were not very extensive. "You have had a good English education, I suppose, at least?" The other did not comprehend exactly what was comprised in the phrase, "a good English education." "I mean grammar, geography, the common branches of mathematics, etc." My friend replied, that he could read pretty well, [without spelling his words, I presume,] and he could also write; he had, moreover, learned to cipher as far as compound multiplication; but of grammar and geography he knew nothing. The clergyman shrugged his shoulders. "Have you read the classics?" he inquired. My friend replied with a vacant stare. "I mean standard writers, the best old English authors, as Johnson, Goldsmith, etc.?" On being answered in the negative, he inquired touching history, belles lettres, the elements of physical science, etc., on all which subjects my friend knew just as much as he knew of the botanical productions of the Asteroids. The clergyman for a while was dumb with very amazement. "You, perhaps," he at length remarked, "have wholly employed yourself in theological reading. What authors have you read in this department?" The respondent began to feel piqued, as his ignorance became more and more developed; for, truth to say, even in theology he had read nothing but a volume or two of sermons, and the journal of an itinerant preacher named Jesse Lee; he therefore answered with some tartness, that, having got religion when young, and acquired considerable experience since, he could teach others what he knew himself. "Well," retorted the clergyman, "if you impart to others the sum of your own knowledge merely, it will be but a brief lesson methinks; and if you deem your qualifications equal to the work of the Gospel ministry, I can only say that your estimate of the duties of that important station differs very widely from mine; for, notwithstanding that I have devoted two-thirds of my life to intense study, I yet seriously meditate a retirement from the ministry for a few years, that I may have more leisure for adding to my too scanty stock of knowledge. You have my judgment, therefore, relative to your call to the ministry."

It is far from my purpose to discourage young men of small attainments, and good talents, from entering the ministry; my wish is rather to incite them to urge forward in the path of improvement—to "study to show themselves approved unto God, workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Commencing in ignorance, they may plead in their excuse, a zeal to extend to others a knowledge of principles dear to themselves; but no plea will justify their remaining in ignorance; because no class of men have better opportunities for improvement than ministers of the Gospel. They usually have access to the best society—have leisure for reading and study—are often required to interchange opinions with others on different subjects—have much opportunity to gather knowledge from observation—and in remaining ignorant, they violate their obligations to the church of which they are members—to mankind at large, and to God. Many Methodist ministers have made very praiseworthy advances from the state of ignorance in which they set out, and hold a very respectable standing for learning, in the ranks of the clergy. Universalist preachers, generally, commence trading with a larger stock, but, do they as generally realize as large an advance upon the capital?

I cannot tell you with how much interest I regard the Liberal Institute, which, without subjecting a student to the bonds of a sect, still affords all opportunities for acquiring knowledge. I hope many years will not elapse, ere the West will be favored with a similar establishment. I hope, too, that in the same term, that at Clinton will be doubled in size, students and advantages. A well educated ministry will greatly elevate the standing of our denomination, and in the same proportion, extend its influence. Every preacher amongst us, should charge himself to promote this object to the utmost of his abilities. We have a larger interest in the matter than any other body of Christians, inasmuch as every branch of literature aids in furnishing the elements of proof, by which error may be refuted, and truth established. And, although I would not recommend blocking up the way to the ministry with prescribed tests of literary qualification, yet I must unite with the poet in his cautionary advice, to "Lay not careless hands

On scrolls that cannot teach and will not learn."

RECONCILIATION.
BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

The obvious meaning of reconciliation is agreement, oneness, satisfaction, and peace. Consequently, unreconciliation signifies disagreement, enmity, dissatisfaction, and misery. And it is apparent that in all cases where a disagreement exists, either one or the other party must be in the wrong. The difference is the cause of dissatisfaction and enmity. It should also be remarked, that the wrong may generally be found, where the greatest uneasiness prevails; for he who is in the right, cannot be dissatisfied with his own righteousness, though he may regret the unrighteousness of others. The party, therefore, that is in the wrong, should be brought to an agreement with the one that is right. There should be a change from evil to good. This is what justice requires. Should the one that is right become reconciled and agreed to the other party, without any moral change from evil to good, both parties would be in the wrong. Hence, it appears, that the opinion, which declares that Christ came into the world, suffered, and died, to reconcile God to man, supposes that he was either in the wrong, while man was in the right; or else, that man was wrong, while the perfect Creator required a change or reconciliation to this evil character for his own satisfaction. If God should be reconciled to the unreconciliation of his children, so as to produce an agreement in the work of evil, it would be an unfortunate change for the happiness of the world. Therefore, it is evident, that if the mind and character of God be right, at any time, a subsequent change would establish his unrighteousness. To anticipate any change in the Deity, is nothing less than to expect the reign of infinite evil throughout all worlds. And the idea, that Christ came into the world to appease the wrath of God, and change the determination of infinite wisdom, supposes, at least, that the object of his mission, was to remedy an imperfection in the character of God, and thereby save the world from that wretchedness, which this imperfection would occasion. Before adopting a supposition, involving the character of God in that light, which requires a change to make it right, and necessarily supposing a dependence of his will on circumstances, instead of circumstances being dependent on his will, we should inquire, diligently, for the evidence of this hypothesis. We should boldly challenge the declaration, that God is unreconciled, and an enemy to man, and demand the most indubitable proof before we acknowledge an idea, which, if true, would shake the universe into annihilation. What a tremendous thought is that, which ascribes unreconciliation to an infinite being! Wherever the mind extends, infinite dissatisfaction prevails. But where, my soul inquires, is the evidence for this mournful sentiment? Does the voice of nature declare its truth? Do those rolling orbs in the deep ocean of infinity indicate the unreconciliation of their Maker? Does the atmosphere withhold its showers, the earth its abundance, and the seasons their beauty? Have we not been satisfied, day by day and year after year, with the goodness of God? Has he taken away those means of moral improvement—the exercise of our reason, the invaluable blessings of revelation, and the interchange of social affections? Has he not returned mercy for our ingratitude, goodness for our unthankfulness, and commended his love to us, while we were sinners, in the gift of eternal life, by the Saviour of the world? Would an unreconciled Being—a foe to mankind—confer such unmerited favors as these on those whom he hated? Would an enemy do this—undertake the salvation of a world by Jesus Christ? Surely, if this be the effect of the unreconciliation and enmity of God, I am unable to appreciate the importance, which this supposed reconciliation and friendship through his Son, was intended to secure. The truth is, God is good and right in all his ways; and, hence, the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus was not intended to obtain or secure the divine favor, but to commend the immutable love of God to his unreconciled and sinful children. We should not indulge the thought, that our Father in heaven is our enemy, as the doctrine of endless sin and suffering supposes.—While we view God as the friend of all mankind, we must infer, that he is an enemy to all causes that will, in the slightest degree, contribute to ceaseless sin and misery. The fact, that God is a foe to unlimited evil, is proof that he will not suffer its existence. It is also proof of his reconciliation to all men. It is absurd to contend for perpetual sin and suffering, unless we are able to show that God is agreed to such an evil. To effect this, would require the annihilation of infinite Benevolence, and a radical change in all his holy perfections. But, if God be reconciled to mankind—a friend to our endless felicity, and an enemy to the eternal misery of all souls, the inquiry is made, for what purpose did our Saviour lay down his life? I answer, to bear testimony to the truth which maketh free, to commend the love of his Father to the world, and to bring life and immortality to light. It was to open the eyes of our understanding, to make our souls acquainted with the grace and mercy of Heaven, and thereby reconcile us to the moral administration of his holy government. Though God was the friend of man, yet man was the enemy of God by wicked works. Our Lord made his appearance, suffered, and died, to do the will of his Father, to slay this enmity on the part of man, and this wicked opposition to the character of the Holy One, who doeth only good; thus reconciling the world to the holiness of God, and producing an agreement of moral character between them. The reconciliation of mankind signifies the destruction of all opposition to God—all enmity to his government, and a perfect agreement of our motives, feelings, and actions, with the mind and character of God. All sin is an evidence of unreconciliation on our part. There can be no possible agreement between the character of a holy God and a sinful man. To produce oneness and satisfaction, agreement and peace, the sinful character of man must be destroyed. To accomplish the destruction of sin and the reconciliation of the world, a Saviour became necessary. In Christ we behold the image of God, and when our souls behold the love of God as it is manifest in the character and death of the Redeemer, it destroys the wickedness of man, by leading him to repentance, and dispels the darkness of his mind, by a correct understanding of the peaceful ways of wisdom.

In support of the doctrine of universal reconciliation, the apostle affirms, 2 Cor. v: 18–20, that "all things are of God, who hath reconciled us unto himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed to us the word of reconciliation. Now then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." From this, we learn that the burden of the apostle's ministry was to reconcile, by the preaching of the word, the unreconciled to God. This word was the power of God unto salvation to every one that believed. It was a proclamation of the infinite love of God—that he is the unchangeable Father of all mankind, and that we are brethren of one family. This word produces reconciliation to God—to the benevolence of his character, and, consequently, to one another. "For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and having made peace by the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things to himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. And you that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled." Col. i: 19, 20. When this great and glorious work shall be accomplished, and all shall be redeemed from sin, God will be all in all. The enmity which ignorance has occasioned, will cease, and the ransomed world will be united in the holiness of God. How happy is the thought, that all an end will be made to all transgression, that all the causes of repining and sorrow will be removed, and the difference of opinion and practice, which prevail among mankind, shall be lost in universal harmony and satisfaction.

UNIVERSALISM IN MASSACHUSETTS.
BY REV. J. GREGORY.

The cause of God's impartial grace is onward in Massachusetts, and we trust the day is not far distant when the principles we have embraced shall be happily felt throughout the land. The believers in a world's salvation are warm-hearted and zealous. Every man who professes love for the cause, thinks it his duty to do something toward spreading the truth of a Redeemer's love. The soldier who enlists under the banner of the "Prince of Peace," thinks it his indispensable duty to be sober, vigilant and watchful—for he well knoweth that his enemy "is going about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour"—and he realizes that his station is responsible. Should he desert his post, he is aware that he would forfeit those high and ennobling privileges he now enjoys.—Hence, instead of "grounding arms," or playing the coward in his Master's service, he "buckles on the whole armor of God," and wrestles mightily "with spiritual wickedness in high places."

Our good brethren in the Abrahamic faith are growing in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. "Concerts of Praise" and Conferences are multiplying, and those who were once opposed are constrained to acknowledge their great utility and usefulness in arousing the lukewarm, the cold and indifferent to the performance of their duty: and I sincerely hope that the time will soon come, when Universalists will show as much zeal and devotion in supporting a good cause, as our opponents do, in the upbuilding of a bad one. Surely, my brethren, there can be no danger in Universalists being zealous. Why I never saw a Universalist half zealous enough. Did you ever find a man professing faith in our sentiments, who paid too much attention to the preached word? that went to meeting too often—that paid too much for preaching, etc.? On the other hand, have you not seen a lack in these things? a total neglect in supporting the truth?

We believe God will in his own good time bring every creature of the human family to the participation of endless happiness. We believe he makes use of means in bringing about his glorious purposes. And that the more zealous we are in spreading the triumphs of grace and glory, the sooner shall we bring about the emancipation of the human race. Brethren, we need more zeal. More of that fervor of devotion which characterized the followers of the Lamb.

I recollect hearing, when residing in your State, that a certain Methodist clergyman remarked that he would rather "wear out, than rust out." And I imagine that if our brethren, every where, would come out and renew their zeal in the dear and beloved cause of a world's reconciliation, it would receive a new impulse—disarm opposition—soften down the prejudices of mankind, "and put the lying lip to shame."

Let us then, my brethren, examine ourselves, and ask the question, Have we done our duty in spreading the light and glory of Heaven's eternal truth? If not, let us begin now—"now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.....PART. II. INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ V. My Dear Friend, I now present you with a translation of the tenth chapter of the book of Proverbs; in executing which I have endeavored to express and convey the very same impressions and propositions in English, of which the Hebrew words are, to me, the vehicle. There are in this chapter many excellent sentiments and observations: may they be to us themes of delightful meditation, and springs of profit and upward progress!

PROVERBS, CHAP. X: Verse 1. A prudent son maketh a glad father, but a reckless son is the grief of his mother.

2. Treasures of unfairness (i. e. unfairly gotten treasures) shall not tend to profit; but fair dealings shall tend to deliver from death.

3. Jehovah will not permit the life of the just to suffer from want; but he shall drive away (or scatter) the means of subsistence of the unjust.

4. He becometh poor who dealeth with a prodigal hand (fraudulent hand. PARKHURST.); but the hand of the frugal shall make rich.

5. He that gathereth in Summer is a prudent; but he that sleepeth in harvest is a son that causeth shame.

6. Blessings (are) for the head of the just; but violence (opposition) shall overwhelm the mouth of the unjust (i. e. their self-justification).

7. The remembrance of the just bringeth a blessing; but the character or fame of the unjust doth corrupt.

8. The wise in heart shall make use of his knowledge; but he that is foolish with his lips shall fall.

9. He that walketh in integrity walketh with confidence; but he that distorteth his ways shall be made to feel.*

10. He that winketh with his eye giveth pain; and he that is foolish with his lips shall fall.

11. The mouth of the just is a fountain of life (lit. of lives); but the mouth of the unjust containeth only fraudulence.

12. Ill-will stirreth up contention; but over every transgression good-will throweth a veil.

13. Sagacity is to be found in the sayings of him who hath become discerning (i. e. who has been taught by experience); but a rod is for the back of him who wants prudence.

14. The wise shall conceal what they devise; but the mouth of the imprudent is continually smoking (pouring) forth his inmost thoughts.

15. The wealth of the rich man is his strong city; the destitution of the poor is his destruction.

16. The conduct of the just (upright) tendeth to the true enjoyment of life (lit. of lives); but the conduct of the unfair tendeth to a fall.

17. He is in the way of life who profiteth by (lit. observeth) discipline; but he that dismisseth reproof goeth astray.

18. He that hideth hatred with lips of falsehood, and he that uttereth slander is unwise.

19. In a multitude of words there wanteth not transgression; but he who restraineth his lips is prudent.

20. The tongue of the upright is as choice silver; but as a thing of little value, is even the heart of the unfair (or unjust).

21. The lips of the righteous shall feed many; but for want of wisdom shall the foolish die.

22. Veneration of Jehovah maketh rich; and with it he addeth no labor (or sorrow).

23. It is like sport to a thoughtless person to execute a mischievous plot; but prudent actions suit the man that hath discernment.

24. The corn-deposit of the unjust shall leave him; but the desire of the just shall be granted.

25. As the wind passeth, so of the unjust there is no trace; but the just is established for an age (or for ever—Hebrew olim).

26. As vinegar to the teeth and smoke to the eyes; so is a sluggard to those that send him.

27. Veneration of Jehovah addeth days; but the years of the unjust shall be curtailed.

28. The expectation of the upright shall result in gladness; but the hope of the unfair shall perish.

29. Strength shall be given to those who are perfecting themselves in the way of Jehovah; but destruction shall be to the doers of wrong.

30. The just shall not remove (or be removed) for ever (lit. for an age) but the unjust shall not inhabit the earth.

31. The mouth of the upright shall bring forth prudence; but the tongue of liars shall be cut off.

32. The lips of the just know what is suitable; but the mouth of the unjust lies, only.

THE WATERER.....No. I.

"I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase."

So said Paul to the church at Corinth, 1 Cor. iii: 6. The figure here employed, is a happy one, being drawn from horticulture, a branch of industry more generally understood and practiced than any other, save housewifery.

There is a natural and unforced analogy between propagating the Gospel and cultivating a garden or a vineyard. In gardening, you dig out the roots, and mellow the earth, and then put in the seeds. The seeds germinate in the earth, and soon the leaves appear above the soil; and then comes on the task of watering.

So in cultivating the garden of the mind. The roots of bitterness and prejudice (the remains of a former growth,) must be eradicated, and the heart in some degree, made mellow, by the spirit of charity and good will. It is then prepared, like the good ground in the parable, for the reception of the seeds—the principles of Jesus. These are implanted, and come forth. They must now be watered, or they will languish. When the sun is up, they will be scorched and wither away.

Fortunately, the laborers in the Gospel vineyard have "diversities of gifts"—some for planting and some for watering. The work of planting requires, indeed, more strength and vigor; but that of watering, more care and circumspection. The proper "times and seasons" to apply the water—how much to put on this and how much on that species of plant—to distinguish between the humid nature of one kind of soil and the arid quality of another, require a discrimination of judgment and acuteness of attention, as rarely found, perhaps, as that commanding strength which makes the successful planter.

Now your humble servant is conscious that the small gift he has allotted him, is better adapted to watering than planting. Even when a boy, he never loved so well to use the hoe and spade, as the water-pot. To dig out roots and mellow up the ground, was a task too heavy for his effeminate frame, and had no charms for him. But when the vines came up, and began to look green and thrifty, he delighted to walk along the aisles and sprinkle on the water—to watch their growth from day to day, see them unfold their blossoms, and set for fruit. And when at length the cucumbers and melons appeared, and began to assume a form, he took a boyish satisfaction in reflecting that he had had a hand in bringing about the harvest.

And when I came to riper years and had thoughts of entering the vineyard of the Gospel, the inclination of my mind was to be a waterer. True, I have sometimes taken up the hoe, where there was planting to be done, and no one else to do it, but have found in general, most success in watering and training the vines to run in the right direction.

Now, as most of my beloved brethren are engaged in planting, I have had it in my mind to bring you in, occasionally, a pot of water for the benefit of the vines in the various portions of our Master's vineyard. I doubt not there are many dry and barren places, where the seed my faithful brethren have sown, does not thrive so greenly as it should. But the time is coming when "the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water;" and I should be happy in being an instrument in bringing about that blissful period.

I say an instrument. God works by means.—The seed must be planted and the herbage watered by human hands; but it is God that giveth the increase. He is the author of those physical laws which bring forth vegetation in the natural garden, and cause it to multiply an hundred fold; and of these mental laws which bring forth piety in the moral garden, and cause its fruits to overspread society.

In either case, man can do no more than plant and water. What then is he that planteth or he that watereth? Give God the praise. I envy not my brother Paul that more gigantic and overpowering intellect—that superior strength of purpose and unyielding perseverance, which enable him to pioneer the way through perils, toils, and persecutions. Be mine the humbler, more obscure and quiet, but not less useful task, to rear the vine and teach its tendrils to entwine around, adorn, and beautify the pillars of the Christian temple.

ANECDOTES.

It is supposed by many, that the publication of anecdotes, which are calculated to make our opposers appear ridiculous, is a powerful aid in promoting the triumph of Universalism. That such anecdotes have an effect on weak minds, or on those who are pleased with any thing that opposes what is termed orthodoxy, I do not deny; but I do believe that many, who would otherwise have become our warmest and best friends, have become disgusted on account of reading them. The precept, "do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you," we profess to adopt as a guide in all our actions; yet what should we think were we to take up a Presbyterian paper, and read, that Mr. —, a Universalist deacon, had concluded an exhortation in a public meeting, by advising the congregation that he would sell rum as cheap as any other man in his village? Should we not at once pronounce it a base fabrication—manufactured by some one who could think of no better arguments to bear against Universalism? Methinks we should; and if so, have we any reason to believe, that the publication of similar anecdotes by us, will have any better effect on our opposers? After solving these queries, it would, perhaps be well for us to reflect, that it is not only our duty to exercise the same charity for others that we claim for ourselves, but that, by so doing, we should manifest to the world that Universalism is, in reality, a better system of religion than its opposite, because it requires and enables its believers to be more charitable, more benevolent, and more honorable than its opposite.

A THOUGHT.

Suppose every individual living were a practical Universalist; how much need of prisons, jails, and peace officers would there be? Verily, what an awful thing it would be to have all men "trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men," and have nothing to deter them from crime, but love to God and their fellow-men.

BRIEF DIALOGUES.....No. II.

BY REV. GEORGE SANDERSON.

DEMONOLOGY.

Universalist. Good evening, neighbor—you are punctual to your appointment.

Partialist. I have ever found punctuality to be the best policy. I think I am better prepared to discuss with you, on the subject of religion, than when we last conversed.

U. You still think, then, that religion has some connexion with the devil, or the devil with religion?

P. Can there be a religion without a devil?

U. There can be no religion without a God.

P. It were blasphemy to presume otherwise.

U. According to your statement, however, religion owes its origin as much to the devil, as to God! Why should you not feel as much indebted to the devil, as to God, for all the good which religion does?

P. I am not in the least indebted to the devil—he is a tempter—an arch deceiver—the enemy of man.

U. Let us see whether you are not indebted to the one you villify. Suppose you were to deny the existence of a personal devil, would your church retain you in fellowship? would they not denounce you as a heretic?

P. It would be perfectly right if they did.

U. Suppose you were to deny the existence of God—would they do any more than excommunicate you?

P. No.

U. Then, surely you are indebted to the devil, as well as to God, for your religion; for you confess that unbelief in the former subverts religion; atheism can do no more; and this looks to me like cause and effect. It is a fact, which you cannot conceal, that, as it regards faith, God is but little more honored than the devil. You make a belief in him, a vital principle of religion; and the purity of religion becomes elevated, or depressed, according as the devil has a share of your faith.

P. You forget the moral influence which the existence of a personal devil exercises.

U. Which do you imagine has the most and best influence, to attribute all sin that is in the world to some unseen spirit; or to say, that man is, himself, the author of it.

P. We will let all this go; I observed, when I came in, that I was better prepared than I had been, to discuss this subject. Milton's Paradise Lost has been placed in my hands; I have been highly delighted, and I think instructed by the perusal of it; and have studied the passages of Scripture to which the work refers.

U. If I were to speak my mind, I should say you are less prepared to investigate the subject, than before you perused Milton. Did you never search the Scriptures, to ascertain if they taught the existence of a personal devil, until you read Milton? how came you to believe there was such a being?

P. The church requires me to believe it

U. So you believe any thing the church requires?

P. If I did not, they would cast me out.

U. How tamely some throw the coronet of the mind, at the feet of designing men. As for Milton, his Paradise Lost is no more to be relied upon, than any other production of a fruitful imagination. Whenever I think of Milton's fallen angels, it reminds me of what the poet says,—

"Imagination bodies forth
The forms of things, the poet's pen
Turns them to shape, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."

P. I have always heard Milton quoted as good authority; especially as having been successful in elucidating the doctrine of fallen angels.

U. That he has been successful in pleasing and convincing the lovers of the marvellous, I do not dispute; he was an uninspired man, as liable to err as other men—the Scriptures are our only sure guide.

P. True. But you admit the existence of devils—from whence did you derive your opinion?

U. Not from Milton. Nor have I admitted any such devils as he speaks of. Because Peter "savored of the things of this world," Jesus called him satan—Judas was called a devil, doubtless for the same reason. The word devil strictly means, a deceiver, a slanderer; and the word satan, an adversary; and although frequent use is made of these words in the Scriptures, and that often in relation to the traditions of the Jews, and superstitions of other nations, not by way of upholding them; still Jesus and the writers of the New Testament, made rather an accommodated use of them, to distinguish the adversaries of the Gospel, and the personification of evil; and the incorporation of the common notions derived from the Heathen, is wholly without authority.

P. It appears to me that you misunderstand the word of God. What! no real, personal devil: what, then, became of the angels that fell from heaven?

U. I have first to learn that any fell, before I can answer your question.

P. Do you deny also that angels fell from heaven; and profess to believe the Christian religion?

U. As you appear to know so much about this matter, will you inform me who these angels were? how came they to fall? and where did they fall to?

P. Why, it is generally believed, they were once perfectly holy; that ambition, or pride, instigated them to usurp the throne of God; so they engaged in rebellion against the Almighty, and a war in heaven was the consequence; but the rebels were overcome, and cast from heaven down to hell. The leader of the rebels, Lucifer, as he is sometimes called, then became the devil, and has never ceased his opposition to God and his works. But an engagement which I am under this evening, prevents my tarrying to hear your answer; to-morrow evening I'll call again.

DONATION PARTIES.

BY REV. W. BULLARD.

The practice of making donation parties for the minister, is very common among Partialists, (especially Presbyterians,) but of rare occurrence among Universalists. The inhabitants of the parish being duly notified, these parties generally meet at the minister's house, and on such occasions, it is not unoften the case, that articles to the amount of from fifty to one hundred dollars are brought in. And this is in addition to a salary, of perhaps from five to seven hundred dollars, paid by the donors. These articles consist of such necessities as the minister needs in his family, and such as his people have to spare. A merchant will send in a pound of tea, another a few pounds of sugar, a third, perhaps a variety of still smaller, though equally necessary articles. A farmer will send in a few bushels of grain, another a cheese, a third a few pounds of butter, etc., etc. And the mechanics will also think of something in their line, which they will not hesitate to turn in. While the women, the last to be behind in matters of this nature, will be busy in furnishing the good minister's family with articles of clothing—such as stockings, mittens, etc., and perhaps the child, if not its mother, with a frock, to say nothing of a cloak, or suit for the minister himself, which is sometimes added.

Now, whatever others may say, I think the above practice commendable, and praiseworthy in those who engage in it. It shows, in the first place, that they judge correctly of the necessary expenses of a minister, which, in this country, are generally above his salary, subjecting him to embarrassments, such as no public speaker, especially a clergyman, ought to be encumbered with; that is, if the people of his charge wish him to preach acceptably. Secondly, it shows that they are mindful of the necessities of their pastor—that they feel an interest in his welfare; and wish him to live comfortably and respectably. In short, that they consider him as one of their own family, and that as such, they intend his wants shall be supplied.

Now if any one supposes that I am about to recommend this practice among Universalists, he is mistaken. I would not be the first to advise on a subject thus delicate. Nay, I would recommend to Universalists, first, to be just—before they undertake to be charitable, even to their preachers. I would have Universalists pay their preachers according to contract—pay them faithfully, and punctually—pay them in full, and not withhold a farthing. And I would hold up this practice of the Partialists, of making their preachers donations over and above their salaries, to admonish Universalists of the importance of making out to their preachers, at least, the amount of their salaries in full.

If Partialists are liberal with their preachers, Universalists ought at least to be just with theirs. If Partialist preachers can but live with their salaries and donations, how can Universalist preachers live with less than their salaries? especially when it is considered that their salaries, in general, are much smaller than the salaries of preachers of other denominations.

It often happens, as thousands can testify, that a society of Universalists engage a preacher to labor with them a portion of the time, for a certain sum, on which the preacher depends for the support of his family. But, at the end of the year, through the carelessness of the trustees—the illiberality of some in subscribing, and the failure of others to pay their subscription, the society comes short of the amount—and the consequence is, the poor preacher sustains the loss, which is to him a loss indeed. He is thus deprived of his living; and his family, or creditors, or both, must suffer, and he perhaps be disgraced, and that, too, by his ungenerous employers.

Brethren, are these things right? are they honest? are they consistent with the doctrine and profession of Universalists? None will pretend this. Then, as you respect the cause which you have espoused, let these things never happen again among you. Remember that preachers are flesh and blood—that they must live. Let those societies, who are in arrearsages, unite and supply the preacher or preachers to whom they are indebted, with such necessities as they need in their families. Let it be done speedily—nor stop to blame the writer, for putting you in mind of an imperious duty—a duty, the last to be neglected. While Partialists are liberal with their preachers, let not Universalists forget at least to be just with theirs.

THE DIFFERENCE.....No. III.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

Justice, according to Partialism, is a principle whose office is to guard the divine law—to magnify it and make it honorable, by securing the infliction of all the penalty it denounces against transgression. This justice, they say, is scrupulously exact as to the quantity of pain or penalty to be inflicted; but it is not scrupulous who suffers this penalty. It is somewhat exorbitant in its demands, one would think—who ventured to think at all upon this subject—for it strenuously maintains that all mankind deserve endless woe, and it insists upon its right to inflict this penalty, and it would, in spite of sister mercy, execute this cruel sentence upon the whole race of man; were it not for the substitute who has been provided, viz., Jesus Christ. Now, all who believe in him, and embrace him as their Saviour and substitute, however black their guilt may be, are permitted to escape all punishment; and by the order of mercy, justice proceeds to inflict an equivalent to the penalty deserved by the guilty, upon the innocent and offending substitute! And it is understood that this justice is as well satisfied by inflicting the penalty upon the innocent, as it could have been by seeing the guilty suffer it. This is Partialist justice in heaven! We are thankful that such proceedings would not be considered just upon earth!

Partialists, themselves, seem to think that justice, according to their views, is opposed to the interests and welfare of mankind; for when we urge the benevolence and mercy of God, as evidence of universal salvation, they almost uniformly reply by saying, "But you should remember that God is just as well as good and merciful!" This implies, that if it were not for the justice of God, his benevolence and mercy would secure the salvation of all; so that their ideas of justice plainly lead them to believe it opposed to the interests of our race.

According to our view of the subject, justice is as essential to our present and future well-being as any attribute of God, or principle of the divine government. We think it the law of immutable equity, by which the divine mind regulates the affairs of the moral world, and that it is as essential to its well-being, as the law of gravitation is to the harmony of the physical universe.

We think it requires universal justice among all moral beings; and that this would contribute to universal happiness, few will deny. It never requires the infliction of a penalty as an end, but only as a mean or medium of securing its requisitions, as stated above. So it will never be satisfied short of all it requires, and that is universal and unbounded justice. The infliction of all the pains and penalties imaginable, would not meet the requirements of justice; so no attribute of Jehovah can be more radically and unconquerably opposed to the infliction of endless misery, than the glorious attribute of justice, as nothing could be more unjust than the infliction of useless, cruel, unmerciful, endless pain!

GOVERNMENT OF THE PASSIONS.

"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city."—Solomon.

Human happiness depends very much on the proper regulation of the passions. The most fruitful cause of misery is, in suffering the passions to control the reason, instead of allowing reason to guide the passions. Some eminent moralists have indulged the sentiment, that the passions are the cause of more evil than good. But the God of nature has designed every power, moral, physical, and intellectual, for some reasonable end. Dr. Good, speaking on this subject, has the following very just remarks, expressed in his happiest style: "In sailing over the sea of life, the passions are the gales that swell the canvass of the mental barque: they obstruct, or accelerate its course, and render the voyage favorable, or full of danger, in proportion as they blow steadily from a proper point, or are adverse and tempestuous. Like the wind itself, they are an engine of high importance and mighty power. Without them we cannot proceed, but with them, we may be shipwrecked and lost.—Reined in, and attempered, they constitute our happiness, but let loose at random, they distract and ruin us." Without passion to arouse us to action, we should be inactive and dormant; like the ship lying on the slumbering ocean, richly freighted for her voyage, but without the propitious gale to waft her to the desired haven.

The regulation of the passions depends much on the proper cultivation of the mind in early life. They are very luxuriant in their growth, and if not placed under proper restraints, they will grow stronger and more vigorous than the moral powers, and then their whole tendency is toward acts of oppression and injustice.

It should ever be borne in mind, that it is a far greater victory to conquer ourselves, than to gain a conquest over the mightiest empire on earth. We mistake true greatness. We weave the laurel and prepare the garland for the conqueror of nations: whereas he alone deserves these honors who conquers himself. There is, perhaps, less real greatness in the field of battle, than in any other situation on earth. There the conflicting passions are in full exercise, while the affections are scarcely seen in a single act. The historian and the poet have been employed in immortalizing the heroic deeds of the warlike and ferocious, while the virtues of the more peaceful and humble, the real heroes, have been overlooked. It was a good remark of a celebrated writer, that "History ought to be rewritten."

Let us all remember, if we would be truly great, we must be truly wise and good. Greatness and goodness should never be dissociated in the moral world. Here a large field opens before us all, where we may extend our conquests, and every new victory will be an addition to our happiness.

REBUKE.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

"Wherefore rebuke them sharply." Tit. i: 13.

No duty is more intimately connected with the social interests, or a mutual good understanding between man and man, than that enjoined in the language here quoted. We are all prone to jealousy. Whatever tends to strengthen our suspicions, will, of course, alienate our affections and widen the breach which might have been prevented, or readily healed.

I might also remark, that there appears to be a prevailing error amongst mankind, in reference to the management of these suspicions. A man may be wrong, or he may not: but when jealousy is allowed to range uncontrolled, it is all the same. Evidence rushes in on all hands, to confirm our suspicions. Incidents before disregarded or forgotten, come up afresh, and are now of the most convincing character. A long train of evils is the inevitable consequence. The subject of suspicion is disgraced, and not unfrequently driven to the performance of acts he before abhorred, and of which he might never have been guilty.

Others too, partake of these evils, for "crime dwells not alone." Like the stone thrown into the water, wave succeeds to wave, till each surrounding object has felt the movement of the troubled surface. The force of example, the power of sympathy on one side or the other, or the love of retaliation, spread, increase, and enlarge beyond measure the unhappy consequences of neglected duty. "Behold what a great matter a little fire kindleth."

All these evils and more, may easily be prevented by a due observance of the instruction of the apostle. Let any person act considerately in forming an estimate of the conduct of others, and when satisfied that his neighbor has done wrong, go like a brother, and tell him of his fault, in a good spirit, and I will venture my judgment, he will either be convinced himself that he has been mistaken, or else will convince his offending brother, that the sooner he makes a reconciliation the better. Every man who does wrong is capable of knowing it.—And when he finds that others know it, he will begin to look about him, to find a way to wipe the stain from his character. Hence the reason why we should "rebuke sharply" those who do wrong.

Many people mistake the true meaning of a rebuke. They think it synonymous with "to blame"—for this reason, perhaps, that few people openly and frankly rebuke those who err; but, evidently in a bad spirit, under the excitement of passion, begin to find fault, upbraid, and reproach them for their errors; than which, nothing can be farther from the true nature of a rebuke.

Rebuke is not fault finding. It is to reprove one for his faults, to the intent that he may be convinced of them, see the error of his ways, and be reformed. It can never be properly done, but with the strong emotions of love. The angel of the church at Laodicea is commanded to write—"As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore, and repent."

Too often is this important duty neglected by Christians. Great evils are the consequences. Instead of assuming high and honorable ground, and going boldly and manfully forward to the injurer, (supposed or real, no matter,) and frankly telling him his supposed faults, we smile to his face, and become busy in his absence, spreading far and wide the evils of his conduct. No good can result from such a course. On the other hand, had we stated our suspicions to him, he might have corrected our mistake, or his own faults.

Paul once had trouble with another brother, but unlike modern Christians, he "withstood him to his face"—not behind his back.

Let us, brethren, endeavor to imitate the apostle, and obey his instruction. We shall feel satisfied of having done our duty.

A SUNDAY AT HOME.

Having an appointment abroad, which we were prevented from attending by the state of travelling—a circumstance which will sometimes occur during a Winter that would do credit to Siberia—it was our lot to spend a Sunday at home. Thus situated, it was natural to reflect on the importance of a day of general rest, of religious observances, of social greetings; and on the influence of an habitual disregard of its institution.

It is very well known that we make little pretension to a superstitious veneration of the first day of the week, usually called Sunday—neither regarding it as holy time, nor set apart by divine appointment either for rest, or for public worship. Nor can any man view the subject in any other light, who rests his convictions on the evidence of fact, instead of the determinations of a false education, and deep-rooted prejudice. For nothing is plainer, than that the New Testament is entirely silent respecting the obligations of Christians to observe the Jewish Sabbath, or to institute another in its place. No intimation is given by our Saviour, that the first day of the week was ever to become the Christian Sabbath—and no directions are given to that effect, by the apostles. So far from this, it is certain that, as Jews, they conformed to Jewish usages in this particular; and that consequently, they kept the seventh day of the week, or Saturday—and that they neither did nor could observe any other.

The first approaches toward the establishment of the first day of the week, as a day sacred to religion, were made by the primitive Christians in meeting early in the morning of that day, for religious worship. And this practice evidently originated in their exclusion from the synagogues on the Sabbath, and from the necessity of holding their meetings in the most private manner, to avoid the cruelty of their persecutors. In the selection of a suitable time, the commemoration of the resurrection of Christ, and consequently, the first day of the week would be naturally suggested. But then there is not the shadow of evidence, that it was any part of their plan, to substitute that day in place of the Jewish Sabbath. Nor is there the least ground for supposing, that they observed the day as one of rest.

In this manner the day appears to have been observed during the whole period of time, from the days of the apostles down to the reign of Constantine the great, in the fourth century. He ordered Sunday (solis die) to be kept as a day of devotion, and that his subjects should abstain from labor—except husbandry. It is therefore certain that to perform such labor, was not then regarded as an infraction of the Sabbath; for had it been so considered, the overweening fondness of this emperor, for every thing which would gratify his bishops, would have included this among others which were interdicted. From his time down to the present, Sunday has been set apart as a day of religious offices, and of rest, in all Christian countries.

But notwithstanding the observation of Sunday as the Christian Sabbath, is of human rather than of divine institution, there are many considerations which sanction its establishment for purposes of rest and devotion. And these reasons commend themselves to the acceptance of every member of society—being adapted to the wants, the social and moral condition of each in every country and in every age.

1. As the great majority of every community are necessarily engaged in laborious employments, the appropriation of a portion of time to rest and relaxation, is indispensable to health and to the most successful prosecution of business. And that portion set apart in Christian countries, appears to be the true proportion. One-seventh being a sacrifice of time which men can more than redeem by their increased ability to labor—while a less proportion devoted to relaxation, would subject them to protracted weariness, from which a single day would be insufficient for their recovery. Let any one notice the progress of his sensations during a full week of arduous toil—compare these with the renovated vigor with which he commences the labor of the subsequent week, and he will generally find reason to respect the institution of a day of rest. And he will also feel, that the present arrangements respecting the amount of time thus devoted, are on the whole, the best that could be devised. In this he should consult his reason, as well as pay respect to the appointment of one seventh part of time by the Creator and Governor of the world, under a former dispensation.

2. A day of rest and of public worship is essential to the social character of mankind. And this is connected with a number of particular considerations. Such as the time and opportunity it furnishes—the cleanly and respectable appearance which it encourages, and the acquaintance which persons insensibly form with each other.

The history of mankind is replete with evidence that the social principle is capable of great improvement; and that the highest advances in social refinement, are uniformly made in Christian countries. It is not to be doubted, that several other considerations exert an influence over this subject; but we must still count the fact, that the Sunday furnishes the leisure and the actual combinations which promote social intercourse. He who doubts this, should go to church, and there see the cordial greetings and shaking of hands between persons who had else forever remained strangers—he should hear the kind and affectionate inquiries—the friendly social expressions which are reciprocated, and he will soon learn that he was mistaken.

Another fact apparently of little moment, holds a respectable, if not an important place in connexion with this subject. The social feelings of most persons, are affected by their appearance. There are comparatively few, who on ordinary occasions, feel that they are in suitable plight to enter the social circle, in the dress and dust which are familiar and unavoidable to their respective avocations. Call this pride, if you please—but whatever be its name, it is something which attaches very properly to most people, and which seldom fails to bring them to church in their most comfortable and cleanly attire.

The direct influence of this circumstance is, to make every one feel his right to the respect, or at least the civility, of every one else—and it very generally secures both. Besides, it really does much towards abolishing those factitious distinctions which wealth or station creates in society. But abolish the institution of the Sabbath, and all—or nearly all these influences will cease. The man who is well and fashionably dressed, who can and does conform to the usual routine of civilities, and who has obtained a moderate share of information on subjects of general importance, can never be made to feel himself essentially inferior to any other man. Nor, in the circles of our country, will others think him so, while he sustains a decent moral character. And the kind of equality thus induced, augments the freedom and the blessings of social intercourse.

3. The institution of public worship, in connexion with a day of general cessation from labor, is essential to the religious knowledge, and moral improvement of mankind.

There are no doubt, ways and means for imparting sound theological knowledge in community, independent of pulpit instruction. And among these, the best and the most successful, are periodical publications. Yet the habit of regarding these as the means of religious news, and the apparent difficulty experienced by the great mass of readers, in following out long trains of reasoning, prevent the great benefits which would else occur from these means. These difficulties are obviated to a great extent, by the labors of the pulpit. There is something in the intonations of the human voice, that renders that quite intelligible, which had been obscure or incomprehensible on paper. And think as we will on this subject, it is both true and obvious, that most people derive their religious views—or model and mature them—from the instructions of a living speaker, delivered from the pulpit.

The same is true of the power and influence of the moral principles of the Gospel. Nothing ever did or can enforce these, with the energy and effect of the human voice. Men may read moral precepts, illustrated by every form of imagery—enforced by every possible consideration that hope, or fear, or obligation can furnish, and yet be scarcely moved. The same persons will feel the importance of these very principles much more forcibly, when driven home upon the conscience and the heart in “words that burn,” as they are uttered by the living speaker.

And the permanency of the impressions thus made, and their influence over the conduct of the week, are as different as are the means by which they have been made. The deepest impressions, if not corrupted by enthusiasm, retain and exert the most permanent power. And as these are always made from the pulpit, their influence is proportionate. Nothing ever prevents the moral influence of the pulpit to a greater or less extent, but the propagation of unreasonable dogmas, or the levities and immoralities of the preacher.

Nor should it be forgotten, that much of the reading leisure afforded to most people, is furnished by the Sunday. And with most, even a punctilious attendance on church will leave sufficient time for looking over their Bibles, and carefully reading the periodical papers. From both of which much additional pleasure and instruction would be derived by each family, if its members were to sit down together, and all give attention to the subject at the same time—reading over such parts as are not distinctly understood, and from time to time making such remarks as are suggested by the subject.

These considerations are, by no means, all that present themselves in connexion with this subject. But these are abundantly sufficient to show, that the Sunday—so often and so shamefully spent in a state of torpor only befitting a bear—as often prostituted to the lazy sports of hunting and fishing, or to lounging from house to house in search of company to assist in killing time—is one of the most valuable of all institutions. Much as it is neglected—it is yet the immediate source of great and lasting good to man. It equally promotes his health and improves his appearance. It cherishes his social feelings, binds his heart in the bonds of friendship, which but for this, he had never known, purifies and directs his moral feelings and practices, and at the same time, while it makes him “wise unto salvation,” comforts and sustains him with the most glorious and cheering hopes of life, perfection and blessedness.

How much enjoyment, how many means of rational and valuable improvement are thrown away, by some few mistakes respecting Sunday. The man fatigued by intense toil, is generally as much refreshed by attending church, as by any other mode of relaxation which he can adopt. The sedentary man is brought into the open air, and made to change the tenor of his thoughts—to forget in friendship and devotion, the themes and the theses that withdrew him from man, and once more to feel that he is a member of that great family whose home is heaven, whose life is immortality, whose destiny is happiness, and whose father is our God.

UNIVERSALISM IN GERMANY.

In reply to Br. Williamson's declaration that most of the Lutheran clergymen in this country, (among whom Dr. Mayer, of Albany, was included by name,) and that the great majority of evangelical divines in Germany, (including Professor Tholuck, of Halle,) rejected the dogma of endless and unmerciful punishment, the Editor of the Lutheran Observer, declared, in that paper of November 27, that such were not the facts—that Professor Sears and Mr. Dwight were mistaken in relation to Germany, etc. This denial was copied into a Presbyterian paper, (the Southern Telegraph,) from whence it was copied by the Baptist Register in this city. Br. Williamson has started noble game, as will be seen by the following abstract and extracts from a letter by Professor Sears, published in the Baptist Register of this city, of the 11th inst. I regret that our limits this week will not allow us to make more remarks, nor yet give Professor Sears' letter entire. Here are the extracts and summary.

PROF. THOLUCK, AND UNIVERSALISM IN GERMANY.

EDITOR OF THE N. Y. BAPTIST REGISTER:—Your last paper contains an article from the Southern Telegraph, in which my name is introduced in the following manner, viz.—“It has been repeatedly stated in this country that Professor Tholuck, and many of the more evangelical Christians in Germany, are Universalists. Some of the statements of the late Henry E. Dwight seemed to countenance this report, which has since been confirmed by Professor Sears, of Hamilton, N. Y. The Editor of the Lutheran Observer, who has had more favorable opportunities of knowing the sentiments which prevailed in that country, contradicts the report. He says: ‘We ourselves have made the tour of Germany, with the superior advantage of understanding the language of the country perfectly—an advantage not enjoyed by either of the learned gentlemen in question. Moreover, we travelled more extensively than either, or both, of these gentlemen, and became intimately acquainted with a much larger portion of the evangelical divines in that country; and now we publicly affirm, that we did not, to our knowledge, fall in company with a single one who was a Universalist, in the American sense of the term. Have Professors Dwight and Sears, then, knowingly testified to a falsehood on this subject? By no means. But there certainly is misunderstanding in the matter.’”

There is a certain class of men who have the faculty of travelling in a country without learning anything except what lies on the surface of society—who cannot penetrate deep into the spirit of a people, nor obtain a clear insight into their systems of philosophy or religion. I do not say that the Editor of the Lutheran Observer should have a place assigned to him in that class. * * * *

Professor Olshausen is the most popular commentator on the New Testament of the modern evangelical school. Let us hear what he says on this subject. In the new edition of 1833, vol. i, p. 412, he observes, that “there have been many Universalists in all ages, but there are more in this age, than there ever were before. Although this may often be owing to a sickly and torpid state of the moral feelings, yet it is without doubt deeply rooted in noble minds; it is the longing of the soul after a complete harmony in the universe.” (Slightly abridged from the original.) Does Olshausen allude here to those “rank infidels,” who are “Universalists with a vengeance,” or to such amiable and noble spirited men as Tholuck, and possibly to himself?

Professor Sears then states his advantages. He was “particularly intimate with Professor Tholuck for six months, hearing his lectures,” visiting him and with him, “accompanying him in his daily walks”—he “heard from him four courses of lectures,” and “in one of these lectures he” (Dr. Tholuck) “took up at great length the subject of universal salvation in the American sense of the term, and declared his belief in the doctrine in the most unequivocal manner. We have our manuscript [i. e. of the lecture taken down on the spot, G.] by us still."

As to language, Professor Sears, in addition to some facility of understanding the German, says, "we constantly attended Professor Tholuck's seminarium..... One whole evening was devoted to the discussion [in Latin] of the subject now under consideration. Through the whole debate every one could see to which side the Doctor was leaning; and in summing up the arguments at last, he came out distinctly on the side of Universalism; but at the same time" cautioned the students not to preach it to the people, for fear it might have a bad effect on their minds! Professor T. and the rest of our German brethren, forgot that God "abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence" when he REVEALED this very doctrine—this "mystery of his will." See Eph. i: 8, 9, 10. Oh, how will these good men rejoice when a correspondence between the brethren of two countries shall certify that the reverse of what they fear, are the happy effects of preaching this "good news" to the people!

But Professor Sears not only heard Dr. Tholuck in German and in Latin, but conversed with him in English on the subject—and Dr. T. is a good English speaker.

One evening, at his house, there was a debate between us on this subject, in the presence of two American gentlemen, now in this country. It made such a painful impression upon the mind of the writer, that he can remember, not only the ideas, but many of the identical words and phrases, employed at the time. The following is the substance of that conversation, which was held in English:—

Tholuck. I suppose my American brethren would consider me Orthodox in general, except in my Universalism.

Sears. They would, most certainly. But with them that one point would be a serious matter. With this sentiment you could not hold a standing in our Orthodox churches. Now, where did you find this doctrine—in the Bible, or in your philosophy?

T. In both.

S. What are the passages of Scripture on which you principally rely?

T. My main passage is 1 Cor. xv: 28, Christ shall overcome all, and bring them in complete subjection to God, who to all men will be their all—their every thing. Such language cannot well be applied to those who still remain his enemies.—Also Rom. xi: 36, For out of him, and through him, and into him, are all things; that is, all things proceed out of him as the source of being; by him they are conducted to their proper destination; and into him they all return, as their eternal resting-place. It follows, of course, that they will all be happy, for happiness consists in being in God. Another passage is, "Every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess," etc.

S. Do you find no passages of Scripture which positively declare the everlasting punishment of the wicked?

T. Yes: Matt. xxv: 46, and others like it.

S. Can those passages, which you think favor Universalism, be understood in any other sense without violating the fundamental laws of interpretation?

T. Yes, they can, but the construction would not be so easy and natural.

S. Can the other passages, which speak of endless punishment, possibly bear any other construction?

T. I do not see how they can.

S. Well what are you going to do with them?

T. That is my only difficulty. These two classes of texts seem to me contradictory; I cannot reconcile them. But when I reflect upon the character of God, as a being of love, I lose all my doubts. Those passages are dark, but here all is light. Man has not utterly lost God's image; there is something holy in him still—the flaming eye of God, the conscience; and whenever there is this foothold, God will gain the heart at last. Were it not for this traitor in the enemy's camp, it would be impossible for God to save sinners.

S. Americans do not use the word, holy, in such a connexion. We do not apply it to one's essential nature, which cannot be changed, but to moral character, which is susceptible of change. To say that man has a conscience, is only to say that he is man. This is what, in the nature of things, can never be lost. Devils have consciences, and are moral agents as much as men; and if there is something holy where there is conscience, there is something holy in devils, and there is this foothold for God, this traitor in the camp, there, and consequently they also can, and will, be saved.

T. To be sure: this is what I hold.

Nor will he allow to this "travelled" Lutheran the possibility of a mistake in the sentiment. "Does he suppose," says Professor Sears, "that one who resided in the German universities two years as a theologian, with his mind wholly occupied with these subjects, and discussing them over and over again with men whose influence moulds the public sentiment in Germany, needs to have such a blunder corrected by a traveller?"

In regard to this painful subject, we have conversed much with Professor Neander, who wishes to tread cautiously on this ground; with Professor Hengstenberg, who deeply laments that Tholuck and so many others should stand where they do; with Professor (now pastor) Von Gerlach, and with his brother, Lewis Von Gerlach, formerly of Halle, now Supreme Judge of the court at Frankfurt, the two principal coadjutors of Hengstenberg in his religious periodical, who gave us much information in regard to the present state of Universalism in Germany; with the Baron Von Thottewitz, the spiritual father of Tholuck; with Pastor Dering, of Elberfeld; with Mr. Oncken, of Hamburg, who is personally acquainted with the great majority of evangelical preachers in Germany; and, finally, with different American and English gentlemen, whose observation and feeling in this matter corresponded with ours.

There is no loop left to hang a doubt upon, and the Lutheran Observer will do well to retract its unblushing denial, remembering, in the emphatic close of Professor Sears' letter, "that there are men, who, when they visit a foreign country, acquire their information not quite so much by accident as himself; and whom he, upon the whole, might as well not provoke to a public comparison of notes."

We have much to say on the foregoing excellent, explicit information, for which we are indebted deeply to Professor Sears: but our readers must think it for us. Three things they will particularly notice. 1. The general spread of the sentiment among even the Pietists of Germany, who are acknowledgedly the most rigid portion of Christians in Germany. 2. The great amiability, piety and learning of those who hold it, as acknowledged even by an opposer of the sentiment. 3. The absence of those lucid, beautiful and conclusive views with which we regard those passages alleged against Universalism, and whereby those very passages are frequently made undeniably to sustain the final restoration of all men to holiness and bliss—and by which the Bible is so completely harmonized. But we have no more room—more in our next. A. B. G.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

An esteemed brother suggests the propriety of publishing all that can be said in favor of or against this measure, because "the time is near at hand when the Associations will be called on to vote for or against it."

I differ doubly from our brother. 1st. I do not deem it advisable to occupy our columns with disquisitions on this or any other subject on which Universalists differ, so long as we have greater subjects without, demanding all our energies and time. 2d. The United States Convention of Universalists did not refer the question to the Associations, but to "the people." True—Br. King in his Circular said something about the different State Conventions deciding it—but the resolution said, "the people"—not the representatives of the people, nor yet the representatives of their representatives. When "the people" call for the discussion of the subject, our columns will be opened to it. When they instruct their delegates to bring it before the Associations, it will be time enough for the Associations to prepare to vote as the people shall direct. Till then, let the subject rest in peace. It will have a real Rip Van Winkle nap!

ITEMS.

TO READERS.—To make room for the very pleasing information contained in Professor Sears' account of Universalism in Germany, several editorial articles, deferred from last week, are omitted.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Br. J. M. Austin's proposition is gratefully accepted.

The several favors laid over are not and will not be forgotten.

We do not consider the publication of Br. Babcock's letter either necessary or advisable. The Chenango Association, in our opinion, settled that matter to his credit.

CONCERTS OF PRAISE, ETC.—I had, some time ago, written a long notice of some excessive enthusiasm under this name; but delayed publishing it, hoping to get further information. It appears by the last Union, that Br. Sawyer has taken them in hand; and he being nearer in locality to the evil, I shall leave it to him. Have our brethren at the East read Brigham on the Influence of Religion? or noted the lamentable reactions which always follow excessive feeling among our neighbors? They can get the former at Marsh, Capen and Lyon's—and an excellent work it is—and for a history of the latter, we are surrounded by it. It is written in the very blackness of desolation, and manifested in the sluggishness of skeptical apathy. If we wish to follow in their wake, we must be certified that we are either less than men, or more than men, or expect finally to sink into the same overwrought, worn out state. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. T. J. SMITH at Fort Plain and Br. BROWN at Richfield Springs (last appointment)—Br. M. B. NEWELL at Bridgewater—Br. BIDDLECOM at Shaver's schoolhouse, Rome, at 10, A. M., and at New-London at 2 and half past 6, P. M.—Br. EATON at Wolcott and Br. COOK at Fulton—Br. BODEN at Jacksonborough—Br. S. R. SMITH in Madison, text in the morning, by request, Heb. iv: 7.—Br. WAGGONER at Middleville, and at Herkimer in the evening—Br. WHITNEY at Salisbury.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in April, by Br. NEWELL at Sharon—Br. WHITNEY at Eatonville, and at Herkimer in the evening.

Br. WHITNEY will preach on the evenings of Monday, 28th inst., at Ingham's settlement—29th, at Esq. Snell's—30th, at Middleville.

Br. WAGGONER will lecture at Trenton Falls on Wednesday evening, 23d inst.

Br. NEWELL will lecture at West Sangerfield on Sunday evening, 27th inst.

Br. J. E. HOLMES will preach on Sunday, April 3, at Springfield X roads, Pa.—Tuesday 5, at Saybrook, O.—Wednesday 6, Geneva—Friday, 8, Chagrin—Sunday, 10, Cleveland. More next week.

The second quarterly Conference of the Cayuga Association, will be held at Peruville, (Groton,) Tompkins county, on the 23d and 24th inst. O. WHISTON.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE YOUNG EMIGRANT'S LAMENT.

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSEVILLE.

They tell me that this is my home—
But ah! how unlike is the spot
To the valley I once called my own,
Encircling my dear native cot!

Oh, where is that bright sunny stream,
Whose meanders so often I've traced;
Where daisies bespangled the green,
And its borders rich violets graced?

And where is the rose bush that grew
So proudly my window beneath;
The lilac so tinted with blue,
And woodbine expanding her wreath?

Where, too, is my robin so red,
Yearly building her nest on the thorn,
That so often aroused me from bed
By her sweetest and earliest song?

And friends?—oh, ye lovely and true,
Whose joys and whose sorrows are mine—
O, e'er in fond memory's view,
Ye'll like stars in yon firmament shine!

I gaze on the sun's golden light
And think that ye, too, share his beams,
And lay me down sweetly at night
To meet you in fancy's bright dreams.

And tell me—am I quite forgot?
Oh! never in sadness or gloom
Do ye cherish an isolate thought,
Nor send one fond wish about me?

Ah, yes!—to that solace I'll cling,
Though vanity prompt the belief,
'Twill absence deprive of its sting
And give this lone heart sure relief.

When I pray to "our Father" on high,
That ye rest in the sunshine of heaven,
In fancy I'll list to the sigh,
Let peace to the wanderer be given!

ANTICIPATION.

Perhaps there is not a moment in the life of man more replete with unembittered bliss, than when the contemplative mind indulges itself in sweet anticipation—when the soul stretches forth its energies to extract the joys of indulgent hope yet to be realized, and to feast in the ideal pleasures of the heart's glowing fancy. 'Tis then we feel that this cold world with all its multiplicity of ills, is not without its redeeming intervals of happiness. There is an oasis in the drear wilderness of sorrow—a ray of heavenly sunshine that gleams occasionally through the "wo-befclouded darkness of human wanderings."

Have we parted from those we love—love dearer—yes, dearer than life itself? And has the separation isolated us—cut us off from every earthly felicity, and left us sad and alone, though in the midst of cheerful faces? Has it made us aliens and strangers amidst the crowd that surrounds us, with no other hope upon its good feelings than the stranger's claim to stranger's kindness? There are still bright spots in the sombre shadowings of the scene, for the isolated heart has found in every acquaintance a friend, and in every bosom the evidence of kind feeling! But above all, there is, in the gloomiest hour of its loneliness, a mellow tint in the rainbow of hope, which nothing except despair can obscure. It is the hope of meeting again the object of all that the heart prizes in its affection, and all that it dwells upon in its blest anticipation. Anticipation! Thou art the sweetener of this bitter life! 'Tis thou that drivest that gloom from gloomy heart, and chasest away the sorrows that intrude themselves upon the sorrowful! 'Tis thou that takest that learnest us to forget the burning bitterness of the last "farewell, and God bless you," in the accompanying redemption of the valedictory—"we shall meet ere long."

"The sting from Adieu,"

"'Tis thou that learnest the heart its flight
From present wo to hoped delight."

'Tis thou that nerved the warrior's arm, and biddest him hope that those dear friends whom he has left shall ere long greet him as a conqueror, when the foe is vanquished, and the broad banner of peace is unfurled, like some ensign of royalty; to wave its plumes in a diadem of glory over the fair face of his loved country. 'Tis thou that elatest the Christian's heart while sojourning in this vale of wo, and leadest his mind to bless that day when mortality shall be dissolved, and the immortal spirit shall forever bask in the sunshine of God's unchanging love.

Take away from man the anticipation of brighter and more blissful hours beyond the limits of the present, and you strip him of all inducements to exertion, you make life a miserable and heavy load which he would willingly resign in order to escape from its sufferings and sorrows. But light up within the soul the fires of hope, and how enlivening its influence; the spirit's present pain is forgotten, and life becomes a scene of action and glorious exertion. Illusory as is hope, we would not banish it from earth, for thus we should extinguish the only lamp that illumines the darkness of futurity, and thus the duties, and pleasures, and improvements of life would alike be disregarded or forgotten.—Standard and Democrat.

MEETING-HOUSES.

THEIR COMFORTS AND DISCOMFORTS.

Houses of worship are usually much larger than are necessary, and much of the interior is not occupied with seats as it might be.

I should recommend that more care be taken to build churches well, with thick walls of brick or stone; the latter is preferable, and being very abundant in most parts of this country, churches can be built of it for a less expense than of brick. The windows should be but few, and so constructed that they can be easily opened and shut, and they should have both inside and outside shutters or blinds. No doors should open from the outside directly into the church, but there should be a large ante-room, and in Winter the doors should be well closed. The seats should be cushioned, the floor carpeted, and the house in Winter, well warmed. Great care should be used to insure proper ventilation. In fine, more pains should be taken to make houses of worship comfortable, and thus comfort will contribute to a love of devotion, and the church will become a pleasant place of resort, instead of being, as it has often been, associated in the mind with much that is dreary and painful.

A good location is necessary, where the house will be protected from bleak winds; and all churches should be surrounded with a grove of shade trees. In the country a number of small warm barns should be built around the churches to protect the horses. Sheds open in front are not sufficiently warm for this purpose. Public opinion should not permit any man to leave a horse unprotected from the storm and cold, while he attends church.

All houses of worship should have an ante-room, fitted up to receive extra garments, to be put off, and on, when going in or out of the meeting.

I deem this subject a very important one in this country. In most parts of New-England, are numerous night meetings, both in Winter and Summer. They are attended by women—indeed, to my observation, more women than men—and especially of the younger portion of this sex, attend them. It is this class that are more particularly disposed to consumption and complaints of the lungs. I have no doubt a great number of cases of this kind may be traced to the erroneous customs of which I have spoken.

Clergymen in this country are very unhealthy; a great many suffer from inflammation about the throat, which in several instances I have known to originate from preaching in over-heated houses, and then going into the cold air.—Brigham on the Influence of Religion upon Health.

RESURRECTION.

The metamorphosis in butterflies is formed in so remarkable a manner, that we see therein the resurrection painted before our eyes, exemplified, so as to be examined with our hands. To see indeed a caterpillar crawling upon the earth, sustained by the most ordinary kinds of food, which, when it has existed a few weeks or months under this humble form, its appointed work being finished, passes into an intermediate state of seeming death, when it is wound up in a kind of shroud, and encased in a coffin, (though sometimes its sepulchre is in the water, and at others, in various substances in the air,) and after this creature and others of its tribe, have remained their destined time in this death-like state, to behold earth, air and water, give up their several prisoners; to survey them, when called by warmth of the solar beam, they burst from their sepulchres, cast off their cerements, from this state of torpid activity, come forth as a bride out of her chamber; to survey them, I say arrayed in their glory, prepared to enjoy a new and more exalted condition of life, in which all their powers are developed, and they are arrived at the perfection of their nature, when no longer confined to earth, they can traverse the fields of air, their food is the nectar of flowers, and love begins his blissful reign; who that witnesseth this interesting scene can help seeing in it a lively representation of man in his threefold state of existence, and more especially of that happy day, when at the call, all that are in their graves shall come forth, sea shall give up her dead, and death being swallowed up of life, the nations of the earth shall live and love to the ages of eternity.—New-England Galaxy.

MARRIAGES.

In Lebanon, January 25, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. SAMUEL SIMONS, to Miss — NILES.

In Hamilton, February 24, by the same, Mr. MOSES M. NASH, to Miss ESTHER E. PORTER.

In same place, February 3, by the same, Mr. JOHN L. VAN RENSSLAER, of Greene county, to Miss EMILY ACKLEY, of the former place.

In Wilna, February 24, by Rev. A. Wood, of Antwerp, CHARLES SARVAY, to Miss ORILLA INGOLS, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Deerfield on the 3d inst., of a disease of the heart, Miss SARAH COX, youngest daughter of Mr. Joseph Cox, aged 23. Of a mild and amiable disposition, possessing intellectual faculties of a superior order, and leading a life of exemplary virtue, she was beloved by all who knew her. For sometime previous to her death, her mind was much exercised on the subject of religion, and she enjoyed the peculiar happiness flowing from a firm and unwavering faith in God as the universal Father, Benefactor and Saviour of mankind, and that hope in the doctrine of life and immortality for herself and a ransomed world which was as an anchor to her soul both sure and steadfast. As she had lived so she died—calm and happy in her faith, joyful in her hope, she called each of the family and her numerous friends who stood weeping around her bed, by name, affectionately took her final leave of them, telling them not to weep for her—that their separation would be but short—that they should all meet again in a happier and better world. Thus did she fall asleep in Jesus. Her funeral was attended on the 5th inst. by a large concourse of people, who truly sympathized with the bereaved family in their loss, to whom the consolations of the Gospel were tendered in a discourse adapted to the occasion. D. S.

Of consumption, at the residence of his son, Lindol Sprague, in Wooster, Ohio, on the 1st inst., Major JOSEPH SPRAGUE, late of Otsego, N. Y.

The deceased was a native of Smithfield, R. I., from whence he emigrated to Otsego, N. Y., in 1790, and was one of the first pioneers of that then wilderness county, where he has ever since resided until his recent removal to Wooster.

In Gray, January 25, JANE, daughter of Lyman and Julia Hyde, in the 15th year of her age. Thus have her tender parents been called on to follow to the house of death the eldest of their little band, and see their loved one laid low in the dust. But they sorrow not without hope. Their grief is mitigated by the assurance of a better inheritance for their child beyond the grave. On earth she was their's but for a time—in heaven she is their's for eternity.

The consolations of the Gospel were tendered in the Methodist meeting-house in Fulton, by the writer, on Sunday morning, February 14, I having been absent at the time of her burial. The kindness of our Methodist brethren is gratefully acknowledged and duly appreciated by our friends. T. C. EATON.

In Greig, February 25, Mr. GARRET SPRINGSTEEN, aged 91 years, formerly of Albany county. He did not belong to any particular denomination, yet he had no fears about futurity, but awaited the approach of death with resignation. The funeral was attended at the residence of his son, James Springsteen, on the 27th, by his friends and neighbors; and although no clergyman attended, in consequence of the bad travelling, yet the services were performed by reading the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, an address to the throne of grace, singing, and reading a sermon from the Magazine, contained in No. 24, volume iv., new series, by Br. Charles Hammond. Our Partialist brethren joined in the services with a commendable liberality, and we trust this act of good feeling will not be soon forgotten by the liberal portion of community in this vicinity.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.....PART II.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ VI. HEBREW POETRY.—I promised to give you a sketch of this subject, and although unprepared to give you such full and lengthy details as I could wish, I think, my dear Adelia, that you will, by a little exertion of your own, make out from the subjoined outline, a satisfactory and useful idea or conception of the whole subject. When master of this key to the poetical portions of the Old and New Testaments, you will discover many beauties, which must remain unseen and unobserved by the reader who has not this clue to the peculiar construction of these books and detached passages.

The division of the "writings usually accounted sacred," which are known by the name of the poetical books, comprises five in number, namely, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, or the Song of Solomon. In point of date, much of them is earlier than many of the historical books; but they are classed by themselves, being almost wholly composed in Hebrew verse. In the Jewish canon of scripture they are called Hagiographa, or holy writings. Besides these books, there are many parts of the historical and prophetic books which are composed after the same peculiar style and manner. And in the New Testament there are many passages in which this peculiar style can be recognized, owing, doubtless, to the familiarity of the writers with their own Scriptures and sacred songs. (Jebb's Sacred Literature.)

The peculiar excellence of Hebrew poetry appears, when we consider that its origin and earliest applications are clearly to be traced to the service of religion. To celebrate the praises of JEHOVAH in hymns and songs, to decorate the worship of the Most High with all the charms and graces of harmony, to give liveliness and energy to the devout affections, was the sublime employment of their poets, and contributed in a great degree to the peculiar character of their poetry. In the Old Testament we have abundant proof that music and poetry were cultivated from the earliest ages among the Hebrews. But in the reign of David, these were carried to the greatest perfection.

The great, and indeed the sole characteristic of Hebrew poetry which can now be traced, is parallelism, or such an arrangement of parts of a sentence that things shall answer to things, and words to words, as if fitted by a kind of rule or measure. Such is the general strain of the Hebrew poetry, instances of which are to be found in almost every part of the Old Testament, particularly in the Psalms and Proverbs. Perhaps you will perceive the character of it as easily and as evidently in the ninety-sixth psalm, or in some of the antithetical proverbs, as anywhere. Our authorized or common version, owing to this form of composition, and to its close adherence to the original, retains much of a poetical cast, distinct from the common style and tone of prose. Being almost word for word after the original, the form and order of the sentences are preserved, and we plainly perceive a departure from the common style of prose.

The origin of this form of composition among the Hebrews, has been satisfactorily deduced by Bishop Lowth, from the manner in which they were accustomed to chant their sacred hymns: they were sung alternately, by opposite choirs. Sometimes one choir performed the hymn itself, while the other sang a particular distich. You will perceive that it was in this manner that the ode, chanted at the Red Sea, and recorded in the fifteenth chapter of Exodus, was performed. The 20th and 21st verses make this evident. Some of the psalms were likewise chanted in this way. On some occasions, one of the choirs sang a single verse to the other, to which that other added a verse in some respect analogous or correspondent. Of this the following distich is an example:—

"Sing praises to Jehovah, because he is good!"—

"For his mercy endureth forever." (Ps. cxxxvi: 1.)

This, Ezra informs us, was sung by the priests and Levites in alternate choirs; as indeed may be collected from the psalm itself, in which the latter verse sung by the latter choir forms a perpetual epode. Of the same nature is the song of the women concerning Saul and David (1 Sam. xviii: 7); and in the very same manner does Isaiah describe the seraphim as chanting the praises of Jehovah—"they cried to one another"—that is, alternately—

"Holy, holy, holy, Jehovah, God of hosts,

The whole earth is filled with his glory." (Isa. vi: 3.)

But the fullest example, perhaps, of this style of composition, is to be found in the twenty-fourth psalm, composed on the occasion of the induction of the ark to Mount Zion; the mode of performing which is particularly illustrated by Bishop Lowth, (lecture 27.) Bishop Horsey, in his translation of the Psalms, has so divided and arranged them as to exhibit the manner of their construction to the best possible advantage.

I shall now give one example of Hebrew or parallel poetry, and I think from this example you will very readily understand the nature of parallelism. I shall take it from the New Testament, in which are many beautiful examples.

Read Luke i: 52, 53. In this passage the same sentiment is expressed, viz., that God changes the conditions of men; and this same sentiment is expressed in corresponding members that represent it in various points of view. The sentiment is this:—The Almighty changes adversity into prosperity, and prosperity into adversity. As stated by Luke, you will observe that the words correspond or answer to each other; the mighty—those of low degree; put down—exalted; the hungry (or poor)—the rich; filled with good things—sent empty away. You will, moreover, observe that the things or subjects stated, answer or correspond to each other by a contrast sufficiently obvious: the former (the powerful or rich) are depressed; the latter (the humble or poor) are exalted.

This style of composition,—this poetical or parallel arrangement of words and phrases, or sentiments, is sometimes continuous and unmixed, as in the Psalms, Proverbs and Canticles; sometimes it characterizes the main body of a work, with a prosaic introduction and conclusion, as in the book of Job; sometimes it predominates throughout a whole book with an occasional mixture of prose, as in most of the prophetic books; sometimes the general texture is prose with an occasional mixture of verse, as in the historical books, and the book of Ecclesiastes. Bishop Jebb has demonstrated that this grand characteristic of Hebrew poetry—parallelism—pervades the New Testament as well as the Old.

The poetical parallelism may be said to consist of four species, viz., Parallel lines gradational, (called by Lowth, synonymous; by Jebb, cognate,) parallel lines antithetic, parallel lines synthetic, and parallel lines introverted.

I. PARALLEL LINES GRADATIONAL are those in which the second or responsive clause so diversifies the preceding clause as generally to rise above it: In all cases, at least, it has a marked distinction of meaning. This species of parallelism is that which occurs with by far the greatest frequency.

It prevails in the shorter poems, in many of the psalms, and very frequently in the prophecies of Isaiah. Psalm i: 1 is an instance of this species of parallelism, see § ii, of these Notes, etc. Also the following:—

Who shall ascend the mountain of Jehovah?

And who shall stand within his holy place?

The clean of hands, and the pure of heart. (Ps. xxiv: 3, 4.)

On this passage Bishop Jebb remarks, that to ascend, marks progress; to stand, stability and confirmation; the mountain of Jehovah, the site of the divine sanctuary; his holy place, the divine sanctuary itself; and in correspondence with the advance of the two lines which form the first couplet; there is an advance in the members of the third line—the clean of hands, and the pure in heart:—the clean of hands shall ascend the mountain of Jehovah, the pure in heart shall stand within his holy place. (Jebb's Sacred Literature, pp. 37, 38.)

Let us take another example:—

O Jehovah, in thy strength the king shall rejoice;

And in thy salvation how greatly shall he exult!

The desire of his heart thou hast granted him;

And the request of his lips thou hast not denied.

Psalm xxi: 1, 2.

Salvation is an advance upon strength; how greatly shall he exult is an advance upon shall rejoice; again, the request is an advance upon the desire of his heart, a something beyond it—it is desire brought into action. Hast not denied is much stronger in this negative than in the positive form, thou hast granted; for it is a canon or rule of biblical philology, that verbs of negation, or what amounts to the same thing, adverbs of negation prefixed to verbs, have, in such cases, the force of expressing the opposite affirmative with peculiar emphasis: for example, will not hold him guiltless, (Exod. xx: 7,) that is, will assuredly hold him guilty.

Seek ye Jehovah, while he may be found;

Call ye upon him, while he is near;

Let the wicked forsake his way;

And the unrighteous man his thoughts;

And let him return to Jehovah, and he will compassionate him.

And unto our God, for he aboundeth in forgiveness.

Isaiah lv: 6, 7.

In the first line men are invited to seek Jehovah, not knowing where he is, and on the bare intelligence that he may be found; in the second line, having found Jehovah, they are encouraged to call upon him by the assurance that he is near. In the third line, the wicked—the positive and presumptuous sinner—is warned to forsake his way, his habitual course of iniquity; in the fourth line, the unrighteous—the negatively wicked—is called upon to renounce the very thought of sinning. While in the last line, the appropriate and encouraging title our God is substituted for the awful name of JEHOVAH; and simple compassion is heightened into overflowing mercy and forgiveness. (Jebb.)

Another:—

Like mighty men shall they rush on;

Like warriors shall they mount upon the wall;

And, every one in his way, shall they march;

And they shall not turn aside from their paths. (Joel ii: 7.)

The prophet is denouncing a terrible judgment on the land of Judea, by the destruction of locusts; and all naturalists and travellers who have witnessed the desolation caused by these destructive insects, attest and confirm the fidelity of Joel's description of their progress and ravages.

Isaiah is, with justice, supposed to be the most poetical and sublime of the prophetic writers, and scattered throughout his writings you will find abundant and beautiful examples of this species of parallelism. In Bishop Lowth's translation of Isaiah, you will recognize them more readily than in our common version. But I know not a more beautiful and admirable exposition of any of Isaiah's writings, than some of Bishop Jebb's illustrations, particularly that of Isa. li: 1, 4, 7. Isaiah however is not unrivalled in this species of composition, and with the following beautiful passage from Hosea, I conclude this section:—

How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim?
Abandon thee, O Israel?
How shall I make thee as Admah,
Place thee in the condition of Zebolim?
My heart is turned upon me;
My bowels yearn all together.
I will not execute the fury of mine anger;
I will not return to make destruction of Ephraim;
For God I am, and not man;
The Holy One in the midst of thee, although I am no frequenter of cities. (Hosea xi: 8, 9.)

You can very readily perceive the difference and the rise in the sense of every second or respective clause in this very pathetic piece of poetry, and beautiful specimen of Hebrew parallelism and song.

II. PARALLEL LINES ANTITHETIC correspond by an opposition of terms and sentiments. As examples, you may take almost the whole book of Proverbs; but I would beg the attention of a beginner, particularly, to the following examples:—Prov. x: 1, 7, xi: 24, xvi: 33 and xxix: 26; 1 Sam. ii: 4-7; Ps. xx: 7, 8, xxx: 5 and xxxvii: 10, 11; Isa. liv: 10, ix: 10 and lxxv: 13, 14.

III. PARALLEL LINES CONSTRUCTIVE are those in which the parallelism consists only in a similarity in the form of construction. The variety of this form is very great; the parallelism being sometimes more, sometimes less exact, and sometimes hardly at all perceptible or apparent. Psalm xix: 7-11 is a beautiful instance of this species of parallelism. It may be readily made out, also, in the following passages:—Ps. cxlviii: 7-13; Job xii: 13-16; Isa. xiv: 4-9 and lviii: 5-8.

To illustrate the nature and varieties of this species of parallel lines would require more space than can, with propriety, be afforded to the subject in this rapid sketch and outline of an extensive subject. If I should ever illustrate at greater length the more important parts of the subject, I may also dedicate some leisure and space to the elucidation of this more difficult and abstruse portion of it. I shall do no more, at present, than give a specimen of one of the varieties of this species, viz., that in which the parallels are formed by a repetition of part of the first clause or verse:—

My voice is unto God, and I cry aloud;
My voice unto God, and he will hearken unto me:—
I will remember the works of Jehovah;
Yea I will remember thy works of old:—
The waters saw thee, O God;
The waters saw thee; they were seized with anguish.
Psalm lxxviii: 1, 11, 16.

IV. PARALLEL LINES INVERTED. In this species the first line is parallel with the last, the second with the penultimate, and so on. Thus:—

My son, if thy heart be wise;
My heart also shall rejoice;
Yea my reins shall rejoice
When thy lips speak right things. (Prov. xxiii: 15, 16.)

And in the subjoined:—

And it shall come to pass in that day;
Jehovah shall make a gathering of his fruit
From the flood of the river,
To the stream of Egypt:
And ye shall be gathered one by one,
O ye sons of Israel.
And it shall come to pass in that day;
The great trumpet shall be sounded; [Assyria,
And those shall come who were perishing in the land of
And who were dispersed in the land of Egypt;
And they shall bow themselves before Jehovah,
In the holy mountain in Jerusalem. (Isaiah xxvii: 12, 13.)

Such is a very meagre outline of an extensive subject; but, if it serves to point out or reveal any beauties which were before unnoticed and unregarded, it has accomplished the chief purpose for which it was written, and added some pleasurable moments to a life which I love.

THE RAMBLER.....No. VI.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

RELIGION.

"Religion is the best armor in the world, but the worst cloak."

"Religion is exalted reason, refined from the grosser parts of it. It is both the foundation and crown of all virtues. It is morality raised and improved to its height, by being carried nearer to heaven, the only place where perfection resideth."

Religion is much talked of, but very little understood. Pretensions abound every where, but practice is seldom seen. Some wear their religion much as they do their fine clothes. It is put on for the Sabbath, and as carefully laid aside at the close of the day. As the one is designed to attract the gaze of the multitude, so is the other. As the one wears out, and becomes unfashionable, so does the other. But the religion of Jesus Christ never needs any alteration. It is ever new, bright, and fair. It will be as full of excellencies, when millions of ages have rolled away in eternity, as when angels first chanted their songs to its praise. Religion is the loveliest object in creation. Were all the splendors of the universe brought to a single point, the charms and beauties of religion would outvie the glories of the whole.

Unfortunately for the world, man has mistaken superstition for religion. The fruits of the one, are, discontent, fear, sorrow, and despair. Of the other, benevolence, hope, and joy. The one destroys reason, the other aids her in her efforts. The one sees no excellencies in God, nor beauties in his works; the other finds in them immortality and eternal blessedness, and countless charms in every object. Superstition is like the darkness and dreariness of midnight. Religion is like the glory and brightness of noon. As the night presents unnumbered spectres and hideous forms, that have no real existence, so does the former: and as the sun brings to view the wonders and glories of the creative power of Omnipotence, so does the latter. The one is like poison in its insidious progress, breaking down, when infused, all the powers and strength of manhood. The other is a healing plant: it is bread to the hungry, and drink to the thirsty; it is like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land; it is light, joy, rest, and peace. Superstition is like the mighty torrent, sweeping down, in its awful progress, every thing fair, bright, or lovely. Religion is like the gentle river, flowing peacefully in its wonted course, rendering all the lands within its reach more fruitful and luxuriant.

In fine, such are the glories of religion, no power can heighten her beauties: no pencil can bring out upon the canvass the lovely features of her countenance. She is brighter than ten thousand suns: purer than the snows of heaven: fairer than the moon; the most excellent of all things, save God himself!

Oh, then, let vain, deluded man leave the fleeting pleasures of a transitory existence—let him turn to glory, beauty, truth, and virtue. Here is an object worthy the attention of the whole creation. Here are unfading and everlasting pleasures, flowing from the right hand of the Most High.

Were men sensible of the happiness that results from true religion, the voluptuous man would there seek his pleasure, the covetous man his wealth, and the ambitious man his glory.

THE DIFFERENCE.....No. IV.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

I have never seen the utility of speculating about the locality of heaven; nor have I ever felt the force of the supposed objections against the truth of a future state, founded on our want of knowledge respecting the location or relative situation of the heaven Christians hope for. Where is it, and what is it? exclaims the vulgar and ignorant infidel. We answer, that we believe the Almighty capable of improving the nature and perpetuating the existence of human beings; and we believe this, too, for reasons and evidence satisfactory to our own minds. And while we believe it, we feel no desire to exchange our hope of future life and felicity for the mere animal creed of the unbeliever, whose only heaven is to consist of a few years eating and drinking, with a few other animal gratifications, and then succeeds the endless night. It almost gives one the horrors to think, even of the infidel's views.

I use the word heaven to express the state, or place, or both, (let it be where it will or when it will,) that I hope to participate in immortality, with all our race, beyond the grave. I trust it will be a state (and I know not why it may not be a place, too,) of perfection in every sense of the word. But the subject was introduced for the purpose of showing how vastly our ideas of the perfection of heaven exceed those of the Partialists.

1. In order to be happy in heaven, they must, in the first place, be totally ignorant of the fate of that vast number of their fellow-creatures who are, mean while, suffering the torments of hell; or else those sufferings would detract from their heavenly joys. On this plan, their heaven would rest in part upon ignorance.

2. They might know the condition of the wretched, and feel no sort of sympathy for them. In this case, their heaven must depend in part upon apathy, or an inexcusable indifference to the welfare of fellow-beings. No joy can be in their heaven over the conversion and salvation of sinners; for the necessary indifference precludes a sufficiency of interest to render its occurrence a matter of enjoyment.

3. It is again supposable, that, knowing the sufferings of the damned, the saved might, by some transformation of character or disposition, so approve of the justice of their doom, as to exult in their torment, and derive a part of their heaven from the miseries of hell. But this is too fiendish to be admissible.

It is clear that some one of these difficulties must forever detract from the heaven of the Partialists.

With us, nothing intervenes to eclipse or obscure the lustre of the heaven for which we hope. We believe that all the sources of human misery will have been destroyed—annihilated. Sin, and infirmity, which open a thousand avenues to human pain, will have been obliterated—the one blotted out forever, the other superseded by an undefeatable constitution that shall never fade away. There will be none left in misery to mar the bliss of our eternity, or to prove the want of benevolence, among the heavenly inhabitants. CHARITY shall still survive!

How widely different must be the effect of the hope of these differing heavens! The Universalist feasts his mind with such anticipations of sublime perfection. The Partialist feels that he must become ignorant, or selfish, or indifferent, or fiendish, in order to relish his heaven. He feels how the glories of the Divine character are tarnished by his views; and knows that his love of God must be graduated by the perfection of his character.

The admiration of the Universalist is feasted by his views; and he feels constrained to all that is charitable, and all that is good, by the hope he cherishes. The heaven he hopes for is all sweetness; and his temper and disposition are constantly improving under its influence.

ORGANIZATION AND DISCIPLINE.

"In whom ye also are builded together, for a habitation of God, through the Spirit."

So says Br. Paul to the church at Ephesus—ii: 22. Would that this could be said more generally of our congregations in the western portion of the vineyard; but, alas, too few of them are "builded together," by any form of organization or social compact. Our congregations too generally remain at loose ends. They do not seem, in general, to realize the importance of organization and discipline; or if they acknowledge their importance, they are too negligent and dilatory in adopting measures.

I would by no means assume to dictate; but believe me, brethren, our cause suffers wefully, from the absence of these regulations. "Who is that red faced fellow, coming down the street from the tavern yonder?" "Why, that is Mr. Cuplove. He had a religious education, was brought up under the prayers of a pious mother, and was for many years an active member of our church, but he became intemperate, and we dismissed him; and now, he is a Universalist." This is very natural. Mr. Cuplove has no faith in Universalism, and probably no established principles of any kind. But by joining in support of our cause, he can spite his Unitarian brethren, who have spoiled and then dismissed him; and at the same time, get into good company.

"But is it not uncharitable to call Mr. C. a Universalist?" Whether uncharitable or not, it will be done, so long as you have no means of contradicting it. So long as you have no system of organization or discipline, Mr. Cuplove, with his scarlet bound eyes, crimson nose, bloated countenance, and breath fragrant with the perfumes of the distillery, will be ranked as a Universalist; and selected by your ungodly opposers, as the first specimen of your denominational character. The next specimen will be, that cup-mate of his, whose mouth is a flood-gate of profanity. And the only way to refute the slander, is to adopt some compact, and let the true believers of the truth as it is in Jesus, who are willing, as much as in them lieth, to "live soberly, righteously, and godly," subscribe their names. "Wherefore, come ye out from among them, and be ye separate."

"But there will arise a division among us, in regard to this matter. We cannot all agree what form to adopt—how much discipline we shall have, and how it shall be administered." People whose hearts are really united by a unity of faith, and a common interest for the success of the cause of truth, can easily compromise these minor differences, and adopt some system, not ultra in its restrictions, which will be satisfactory, if not unexceptionable, to all—especially when they have the New Testament itself to instruct them.

Call a meeting, brethren, and appoint a committee to draft a constitution and form of discipline, and adjourn to another day; and then meet, hear the report of the committee; consider, and amend the instrument, if necessary, and then adopt it—and live up to it, and ENFORCE IT. APOLLOS.

UNIVERSALISM vs. PROFANITY.

BY REV. J. FRENCH.

While on one of my preaching tours last Winter, as I was riding one bitter cold day, through a new looking settlement in the county of Oswego, I called at a snug looking log house to warm. On entering the house, I observed a parcel of papers hanging on a wire hook, on the opposite side of the room, and I thought the size corresponded very near to that of the Magazine and Advocate. Having a good deal of the Yankee about me, I felt inquisitive to know to whose hospitality I was indebted for the favor of a good fire, which soon made me warm and comfortable; and as I knew no better way of coming at it, I commenced by telling my own name, and that I was a preacher of the Universalist denomination. This had the desired effect. I at once found myself among warm-hearted and zealous believers, and by their urgent solicitations, I was induced to tarry an hour or two, and take dinner with them.

In the course of the conversation, Br. T. (my host,) gave me a sketch of his experience. He said there had been a great excitement in that vicinity, a few years previous, conducted by the Methodists—that his feelings were powerfully wrought up, and he resolved to have religion if he could get it—that he attended the meetings, and prayed, and tried, with all his might, to get the Methodist religion, but all to no purpose. He could not get such religion as they described. So finding every effort unavailing, he at length became discouraged; concluded that his case was a hopeless one; and abandoned himself to his fate; and so doing, he threw off all restraint, and gave himself up to profanity. Every thing that moved, vexed and provoked him, and he swore at every thing.

At length some friend persuaded him to subscribe for the Magazine and Advocate. The paper came, and by a careful perusal of its pages, he became convinced that the doctrine it inculcated, was the doctrine of divine truth. His soul was filled with joy, and his heart overflowed with gratitude; and as to his habits, he thought it hardly proper to say, that he left off swearing, but that swearing left him! "For," said he, "when I was brought to view God as the fountain of boundless benevolence, so governing all events as to cause all to result in universal good, to the everlasting joy of every creature, I had nothing left to swear about."

INFORMATION GIVEN.

The following is the concluding part of a conversation, which took place some time ago, between Rev. Mr. Ingersoll, that warm and bitter opposer of Universalism, and a believer in that sentiment.

Ingersoll. Come, what are you—a Universalist, or a Restorationist? Come now, tell me.

Universalist. I believe that God will, "in the dispensation of the fulness of times, gather together in one, all—"

I. That—that—that's it.

Poor man, he knew that was it, and too much of it to answer his purpose, for it was the revelation of God, and who can successfully contend against that?

SLANDER OF THE DEAD—REFUTED.

Mendon, January 18th, 1836.

This may certify that we, the undersigned inhabitants of the town of Mendon, were present at the funeral of William Shelterses, in Mendon, last August, and heard the Rev. I. Fulton say, that Elder Tucker of Buffalo, told him that Rev. W. I. Reese, (deceased,) of the same place, renounced his sentiments on his death bed, and that he (Tucker) was present at the time of his death, and heard it, and that he warned the people against it.

WILLIAM M. AVERY,

A. P. DOLBEER.

The substance of the above was verbally communicated to me in August last, and measures taken to ascertain, if possible, the foundation of the above named report, which has elicited the following correspondence.

K. TOWNSEND.

September 2, 1835.

TO THE REV. MR. TUCKER, BUFFALO.

DEAR SIR—The object of this communication is such, I trust that it will need no apology from me for troubling you with the same; for it is to solicit information which no one but yourself is, strictly speaking, qualified to give. The information is in relation to our late lamented Br. Reese, who died in this city about one year since. You was with him previous to and until his death, (if I have been rightly informed,) and can answer all the questions I shall ask to obtain the above information.

Was he resigned to the will of his heavenly Father, in view of his death? Did he renounce his faith in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind, upon his dying pillow?

I ask these questions, dear Sir, not so much to gratify myself, as for the gratification of his friends at the East, who have heard that he did renounce his faith in the above named doctrine, and have solicited information from me concerning it. Will you, therefore, have the kindness to state the facts in the case? By so doing, you will not only confer a favor upon me, but upon a large circle of friends, who were warmly attached to our deceased friend and brother.

Yours, etc.

R. TOMLINSON.

REV. MR. TOMLINSON—DEAR SIR—Yours of this date has been received. In answer, I have to say that I visited several times at the house of Rev. Mr. Reese, during his last sickness. As it regards his views of the final salvation of all men, I had no conversation with him whatever—it formed no part of my object in visiting him. I conversed with him upon the consolations which religion affords the dying believer, and to which he responded by affirming, that these consolations were his only stay, and that he realized their preciousness in that trying hour. His faith about other men was not once mentioned in my presence. I prayed with him at his own request, and when I left him, I did so, impressed with the conviction, that his own faith was such as overcomes the world.

Your brother,

ELISHA TUCKER.

Victor, September 10, 1835.

To Elder I. Fulton, Mendon, Monroe county.

DEAR SIR—Since the death of William I. Reese, various reports have been in circulation in relation to his change of views, in his last sickness. I am at length informed that you had said, that Elder Tucker told you, that he did, before he died, renounce his faith in Universalism. The object of this letter is to inquire, did you make the above statement, or the substance of it? did you state that you derived your information from Elder Tucker? and was it by a written or a verbal communication?

A wish to be informed of the truth, is the only apology I deem necessary for these queries.

I am yours, etc.,

K. TOWNSEND.

Victor, February 1, 1836.

To Elder I. Fulton, Mendon.

SIR—I wrote you on the 10th September last, in relation to a declaration you was said to have made, referring to Rev. W. I. Reese. I have lately received a communication from some inhabitants of your town, setting forth that they heard you say, that Elder Tucker told you, that W. I. Reese did, in his presence, renounce his sentiments upon his death bed and warned people against them. I am anxious that any misunderstanding should now be corrected, that if your declaration was in any particular misunderstood, it should be known before I proceed farther in the business. Although my first letter remains unanswered, I shall, for this purpose, delay any farther proceedings until next Saturday, and no longer.

I remain yours, etc.

K. TOWNSEND.

Br. Grosh—Neither of these communications having been answered, they are, with the rest of the correspondence, forwarded to you for publication, and the public, to whom they are submitted, will form their own judgment of the reasons of Elder Fulton's silence. Although I cannot say there was any positive statement made by the clergymen who attended Br. R.'s funeral, yet the inferences I drew from their conversation are in accordance with the statement of Elder Tucker.

Yours, etc.,

K. TOWNSEND.

Victor, March, 1836.

The foregoing correspondence, with Br. Townsend's pertinent and brief remarks, explains itself. Elder Fulton relied too much on the doctrine of the old serpent, "Ye shall not surely die," and not only now, but always—not only in this, but in every transgression of the laws of God—will find out its utter falsity. The carnal mind is a liar from the beginning, and though it may promise fairly to the ear, Elder F. may rely upon it, it will break it to the hope.

I cannot close without kindly commending to the reader's notice the truly Christian spirit of Elder Tucker, of Buffalo, and his gentlemanly courtesy, (heightened by contrast with that of Elder Fulton's lack of it,) in replying so immediately and explicitly to a respectful letter, which by too many would have been treated with neglect because the writer believed not as they did on an important question of religious doctrine. Such a spirit, even if its possessor's creed is the very antipode of my own, I delight to fellowship—for it is charity rather than faith, that is the great essential of Christianity. A. B. G.

OBJECTIONS TO UNIVERSALISM CONSIDERED.....No. 1.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

As it is generally admitted that a tree may be known by its fruit, the doctrine of Universalism has been condemned as erroneous by its opposers, not because it could not be sustained by the character of God and the record of his will, but because it does not operate agreeably to what their perverted minds suppose to be the invariable consequence of divine truth. And as the mode of instruction adopted by Universalists, and their arguments, are addressed to the judgments, instead of the passions of their hearers, thereby producing none of those animal excitements, occasioned by preaching the endless wrath of God and misery of hell, but which have been blasphemously ascribed to the Holy Spirit; it is urged against Universalism, that it is not the doctrine of the Bible. Why? Because it does not produce revivals of religion—because it does not make men cry out “what shall I do to be saved from the endless pains of a future world?” If by revivals of religion be meant the spiritual exercise of Christianity—the reformation of sinners, or the conversion of unbelievers “to the faith once delivered to the saints,” the objection cannot be sustained by facts; but if by revivals of religion be meant those pernicious excitements of fear, those ungovernable tornadoes of fanaticism, that cast out all love in our souls toward God and man, and banish all the joys of the Gospel from our mind, we cheerfully grant all the advantage which this objection can claim. While we admit that Universalism does not produce a revival of fear and doubts—of unjust apprehension and uncharitable zeal—we contend that a belief in this doctrine will raise up the bowed down, and revive the faith of the desponding. It will revive gratitude in our hearts towards God, and inspire charity in our bosoms towards our brethren of the human family. Such revivals are consistent with Gospel truth, and may be supported by sacred history; but the popular excitements of the present day can claim no authority from these sources. Hence the objection, that Universalism does not produce a modern revival, (which is not unfrequently a retrograde reformation,) should be considered an argument in its favor. That modern revivals are beneficial to the moral health of those churches in which they originate, will admit of more than a doubt. For one, I am satisfied that the moral character of those churches, where the special influence of revival operations has been felt, is very far from being as good as those that are strangers to this proselyting policy. Nor is the influence less unhappy on community. Many who have heard those sentiments advanced which are inconsistent with the character of the Deity, and repugnant to sound reason, and who have taken those sentiments and their wretched effects, for those of the Christian religion, have relinquished all faith in the Scriptures, and gone over to the ranks of infidelity. Thus, people of sober minds, who have always had a favorable opinion of Christianity, have been pushed by the supposed authority and manifest impiety of revival operations, into the starless midnight of unbelief. Even those who are the subjects of hopeful conversion, are but little, if any better, than they were before. And, in a very few months, the moral characters of a great many are not as good. It is true, that many converts made at revival meetings, break off from some of their sinful habits and practices; and, it is no less true, that they contract others that are equally as wicked. Children are taught disobedience to parental advice and authority, and the church, to frown down opposition, by a total disregard to good manners, private rights, and Christian duty. And what is still worse, all the arrogance, abuse, and incivility, which are apparent in the conduct of those employed in keeping up these revivals, are charged to the Holy Spirit. Those who are in the greatest distress of mind through fear of hell, are said to be under its immediate influence, when the truth is, they are suffering the poisonous effects of that deceptive error, which annihilates all hope in God, and faith in his word, remaining in the human heart. Shall it then be considered an objection to Universalism, because it will not tolerate these evils—because it does not make maniacs of thousands, skeptics of tens of thousands, and suffer disorder, riot, and blasphemy, to pass for divine worship and the influence of the Holy Ghost? Let the objector either withdraw his complaint, or vindicate revival operations by better authority than their effects on the moral character of society.

WINTER AND DEATH.

BY MISS EMILINE ROUNSEVILLE.

“The wintry blasts of death kill not the buds of virtue.”

On whatever side we turn our eyes we behold the stern ravages of Winter. The feathered songster is joyless and mute—the purling stream hath ceased its low and gentle murmurings, and even the soft whispings of zephyr have given place to the fierce rushings of unrelenting boreas. The chilling blast swept through the vale, and the tender floweret drooped and died. Vegetation in all her various forms sinks beneath the direful stroke, lifeless and wan, while the snowy winding-sheet steals o’er nature’s faded form, and hides from our view, even the last relic of Summer’s fleeting beauty!

Hark!—We hear no sighs of lamentation and wo, nor the deep wailings of dark despair. All is calm, quiet, and still!—And why? why do we thus cheerfully gather around the festive hearth, and while away our days in social glee, when we behold the very source of animal existence cut off, as it were, in a moment, and for aught we know, for ever? Because we look forward with faith and hope to the time, when the Spring shall again put forth her loveliness, fully confiding in the divine promise, that seed time and harvest shall continue to the end of all things.

Even so, when we behold the “loving and the loved,” withering beneath the wintry blast of death, resigning their beauteous forms back to their native dust, might we not calmly rest on the sure and steadfast anchor of hope, cheerfully looking forward with faith’s unwavering eye to that glorious era, when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal, immortality, and death, that last enemy, be swallowed up in victory.

Oh! that doubts of the fulfillment of this glorious and soul-cheering assurance, should ever have arisen in the minds of our heavenly Father’s offspring! And think ye the soul—that drop, exuded from the great ocean of truth—that spark, emitted from the Light of lights—that germ, emanating from the inexhaustible Source of all good, will be irretrievably lost? Will infinite Wisdom, its author and creator, in anger thrust it from his presence? Will He torture, as it were, a part of himself, formed in his own image, with never-ending wo? Blasphemous thought! Oh, thou God of love! not thus may we degrade thy character, or dishonor thy holy name! But may we ever realize that by thee we are, and were created—that in thee we live, move, and have our being—and whether we live or die, we are wholly thine—that thy tender mercies extend to all, and that thou wilt never leave us nor forsake us.

BRIEF DIALOGUES.....No. III.

BY REV. GEORGE SANDERSON.

DEMONOLOGY.

Universalist. You came this evening, I presume, expecting to hear a solution of your statement concerning fallen angels; which you no doubt think difficult.

Partialist. I regret that so essential part of the Christian system is denied by you; I have not so much however to fear from the manner you will answer my statement, as from the apprehension that the devil is deceiving you, and will draw you down to ruin. But let me hear you.

U. You can save yourself any such apprehension. It remains to be shown whether your statement has any connexion with the Christian system, before you accuse me of denying any part of it. Can you tell me in what way a perfectly holy being could sin? for such you say, the fallen angels once were.

P. If they were not free moral agents, they could not.

U. If they were liable to commit sin, they were not perfectly holy.

P. All holy beings are free agents, and being perfectly free from sin, makes them holy—but holiness does not presuppose no liability to err.

U. Is God holy?

P. Yes.

U. A free moral agent, too; and liable to err, I presume?

P. (Silent).

U. Why is God holy? Is it not because he is so completely averse to evil, and in love with goodness, as to be invulnerable to temptation—yes, beyond the power even of being tempted?

P. It would appear so.

U. You say these angels were once perfectly holy; but they sinned. Were they tempted by the suggestions of a corrupt disposition.

P. No—for a holy being has not a corrupt disposition.

U. They must, then, have been tempted by outward objects of a seductive nature.

P. No—for this would imply evil or seducing spirits in heaven; where dwells perfect purity.

U. What way, then, could they have been tempted? You say they were not tempted by corruption within; nor by objects without; then they could not have been tempted.

P. (Silent).

U. Do you still believe this fable of Milton’s and that all the sin that is committed, is through the agency of the devil?

P. I do.

U. Who tempted the devil? for it appears there was a time when he did not exist.

P. You are carrying the inquiry too far.

U. Not farther than your statement leads me. You must admit, that the devil had no hand in tempting the angels; for it was one of them that became the devil.

P. I perceive you are familiar with such discussions, and I am not. This is connected with your profession. Our minister could easily answer your questions.

U. The truth is, you think too much of your minister and John Milton. Hang upon no man’s sleeve; read the Scriptures for yourself.

P. I am of opinion we trust to our reason too much. The Scriptures do certainly speak of fallen angels. I will shortly call again.

U. Better prepared, I presume, to prove your doctrine from Scripture, than you are from reason. By the way, I am apprehensive that you would not find fault with reason, unless it found fault with you. Let us not forget that we are seeking after truth.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.

Br. Grosz—The following letter, addressed to several clergymen in the city of Albany, I copy from the Albany Evening Journal. If you should think it in any ways calculated to lend the public to watch the movements of priestly “money changers”—of those who make merchandize of the Gospel of Jesus Christ—you will please give it a place in the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, and oblige
W. R.

To the Rev. Messrs. Prindle, Sherman, Meeker, and Clark:—

GENTLEMEN—I have heard a notice read in one of the churches of this city, over your signatures, of a meeting to be held in the Methodist Episcopal church in Division-street, this evening, for the purpose of making an effort to aid the Methodist Episcopal church in the establishment of their printing and book concern, recently destroyed by fire in the city of New York, in which you appeal to the community in general to aid in relief. The amount destroyed has been stated to be more than $200,000, which undoubtedly ought to be considered a calamity. We think it is due to be informed of the probable amount of the remaining property of the concern, in the hands of agents scattered throughout the United States, Canada, and elsewhere, in books and debts; which information will enable us to judge how far you have a right to appeal to our sympathy for relief. It is supposed, and not without just grounds, that the amount destroyed is but a small part of the property of the institution, when it is known that the numerous ministry of that church are its accredited agents, and it is presumed that all have books and funds, more or less, in their hands, belonging to the Concern, which, together with the heavy deposit of books, within the several conference districts, making in all, several times the amount destroyed, and when called in will abundantly enable the institution to sustain its loss, and to re-establish its operations. Is it not also due the community to be informed by what means that institution, commonly called the Methodist Book Concern, which took its rise from a very small beginning, should have grown to such a gigantic monster? It has been frequently announced to the public that the profits of that institution were designed and appropriated to the support of the superannuated and worn-out ministers, widows, and fatherless children of those ministers who have died in the service of the church; which provision is certainly laudable, benevolent, and praiseworthy; but doubts exist in the minds of the community, that the benevolent provisions of the institution have been religiously and faithfully observed, and appropriated, while hundreds of cases have existed, of distress, penury, and want, which were entitled to the benefits of its provisions, and which the institution was abundantly able to relieve; but rather withheld, for the purpose of aiding its growth; by which means it is supposed it hath gained its enormous bulk. Should this be the case, (and which we hope to be informed to the contrary,) the disaster may be considered a providential chastisement, rather than a calamity, and ought not to be sustained in its fraudulent impositions.

REASONS.....NO. VII.

FOR BELIEVING IN UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

• Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear. 1 Peter iii: 15.

Having in former numbers given some of the strong reasons that weigh in our mind against the doctrine of endless misery, we shall now proceed to the affirmative side of the question concerning the final destiny of our race, and present the reader with some of the many "strong reasons" for believing in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. It is certain no question can be of greater moment than the one now under consideration: and however much it may be neglected and despised by certain professors of religion at this day, and its importance undervalued, it must inevitably engage the attention of the thinking, the sober, the contemplative and the benevolent of all parties at the present time, and it must ere long be the all-engrossing question with the most learned and deeply read philosophers and theologians: for no other question can compare with it for importance and magnitude.

First. One principal foundation of our faith, or reason for our belief in the doctrine of universal salvation, is, the revealed and admitted (that is, by all theists) character of God. It is on all hands conceded that God is the best and most perfect being imaginable—that none other so perfect, so good, exists, or can exist in the universe—that he is not only possessed of every natural and moral excellency, but his character is free from every blemish. Such, then, being indisputably the character of God, the inquiry naturally arises, What would such a being be likely to do? Having power to do as he pleased, and possessing illimitable benignity, what motive stimulated, or what feelings and design actuated him in the creation of man—of our race in general, and of each individual in particular? As a means of aiding our inquiries with reference to this subject, it may not be improper to propose a similar question concerning a being which we will suppose directly the opposite of what God is in his moral attributes. What then would the very worst being we can imagine be likely to do with reference to the destiny of man if it were left at his disposal? Such a being must be clothed with omnipotent power, or the power of doing infinite evil, or else he could not be the worst imaginable being and the exact opposite to Jehovah. Clothe him then with infinite power, infinite subtlety, cunning or craft, infinite malignity, cruelty, injustice, unholiness, fraud, falsehood, implacability, hatred, and every conceivably odious and horrid attribute, and then say what would such a being be likely to do with our race if their destiny were at his disposal? No person can be at a loss in determining that under such circumstances the destiny of our race would be the most wretched and miserable that we can possibly imagine—or that an infinitely evil being could make it.

Well, then, if such would be the fate of man, if at the disposal of the very worst being imaginable, and it be conceded on all hands that man is not at the disposal of such a being, but at the disposal of the very best being we can possibly conceive—who will even do for us "excepting abundantly above all we can ask or think"—is it not a fair and legitimate conclusion that the destiny of our entire race will be the most glorious and happy which we can conceive, and therefore that all will ultimately be made holy and happy? Supposing the two beings to produce directly opposite results from the directly opposite nature and attributes possessed, this conclusion is inevitable.

We are aware that many take a middle ground, and maintain that the being who has the destiny of our race at his disposal, will make a part of his creatures perfectly and endlessly happy and the other part perfectly and endlessly miserable; and thus unite the two opposite characters of good and bad in the same being, or divide the one supreme Being against himself! To the same extent, therefore, that we maintain the perfect and endless happiness of man, we ascribe to the divine Being the character of goodness and excellence: and on the other hand, to the same extent that we maintain the endless misery of man, we detract from the excellency of the divine character and ascribe to him an evil, instead of a good nature. But as no one is willing to allow that God possesses an evil nature—as all allow him to possess a nature supremely excellent, we therefore believe he will bestow the greatest amount of happiness on the universe he has made: and as the greatest amount of happiness for the whole consists in the individual and eternal happiness of each intelligent being, therefore we believe in the ultimate, complete and eternal happiness of all mankind. To notice more particularly this ground of our faith, we say,

1. Of the wisdom of God. This attribute must exist in infinite perfection in him. All events, past, present and to come, are ever present to his mind. With him there can be nothing new and nothing old. His knowledge being absolutely perfect and intuitive, his plan of creating, governing and disposing of the universe must have been from the beginning perfect and infallible. All causes, primary and secondary, together with all possible results, must have been seen. With him there could be no contingency or doubtfulness, as to the final result, nor can anything new, or unforeseen ever occur with him to whom all things from the beginning are perfectly known. And it was doubtless with reference to the final ultimatum, that, when he had finished the creation, surveyed the whole, and seen the glorious end which was to result therefrom, he pronounced all that he had made very good. Had the all-seeing and intuitive wisdom of God looked through the vast chain of events flowing from the creation and seen that endless and immortal evil would have flowed therefrom, and that he could not devise a scheme to prevent such a result, could he have been infinitely wise in contrivance, or would he have pronounced all very good? Surely not.

2. Of his goodness. The goodness of God, by which we mean his benevolence, must be coeval and coextensive with his wisdom: and therefore must extend to every being he has ever created, and attend that being through every period of his existence. If there be, in the universe of intelligences, a solitary being to whom God is not benevolent or good, then his benevolence, being limited to less than the whole, is not infinite. But as all allow that the goodness of God is infinite, no other legitimate conclusion can follow than that his goodness extends to every being he has ever created. And that such is the fact, is clearly proved both by reason and revelation, especially the latter. The apostle John declares, "God is love"—i. e., benevolence is the very essence of his nature. David says, "The Lord is good unto all and his tender mercies are over all his works." Solomon says, "Thou lovest all the things that are and abhorrest nothing which thou hast made: for never wouldest thou have made anything to have hated it. And how could anything have endured, if it had not been thy will? or been preserved if not called by thee? But thou sparest all, for they are thine, O Lord, thou lover of souls."

The benevolence or goodness of the Deity being infinite, and extending to all, must prompt him to seek not only the collective good of the whole, but the individual good of each; and that not for time only, but for eternity. The greatest amount of good for the whole (which alone could be the design and aim of infinite goodness) must consist in the consummation of the perfect and eternal beatitude of each individual intelligence. Had the Deity foreseen that any individual of the human family would have been an endless sufferer by his existence, or would have failed of enjoying more good than he suffered of evil—more happiness than he endured of misery—his benevolence never would have created, nay, it must have withheld existence from such being. And if God was infinitely benevolent in the creation of each individual of the human family, he can never do otherwise than seek to promote the ultimate good, the final happiness of each. He can no more cease to love, or be good to that individual, than he can cease to be God; for God is love. The moment he ceases to be love to any being, that moment, therefore, he ceases to be God to that being; for God is love, and he cannot exist aside from his nature. Say, if you please, God was good to all in the creation, designed the happiness of all, and continued to love them all, till they rebelled against him, and then he ceases to love them and withdraws his goodness from them! But, we ask, has God changed because his creature has changed? Or was his wisdom, his knowledge imperfect, so that he did not know when he created man what he would be or how he would act? Was not every grade of moral character, through which each and every one of his children would pass, during their whole existence in time and eternity, present and perfectly known to God, ere the morning stars sang together at the creation of man, or the sons of God shouted for joy? Most certainly. Did God then create and at that time love those whom he knew he would shortly hate? Let reason or common sense decide. D. S.

UNIVERSALISM IN GERMANY.

In noticing Professor Sears' letter to the Editor of the Baptist Register, want of room compelled me to defer some remarks until now.

The Editor of the Register, Mr. Beebe, seems grieved in spirit at the good news in the letter, and casting about for consolation, finds the following precious drop.

"There is one relief in this affliction [i. e. Professor Tholuck's Universalism]—that, though a positive Universalist, the passages quoted by Professor Sears, in opposition to his doctrine were past his power to gainsay. Universalists, in the publicity of this matter, will find nothing to glory in."

It may seem cruel in us to dash this single, only and almost empty cup from the parched lips of Mr. Beebe—but I do it for his good—the consolation is false, and only tends to nourish the bitterness of spirit and littleness of soul that characterized the grieving elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal Son.

1. Professor Sears does not say he quoted any passage; much less that Dr. Tholuck was unable to answer his pupil.

2. Though Dr. Tholuck admitted that Matt. xxv: 46, and other passages like it, favored endless misery; and that he was unable to reconcile them, except by bringing the light of God's nature to bear on them to dissipate their darkness—yet it is evident to us, that his difficulty exists in applying that passage to time yet future, whereas Jesus spoke it in reference to events now past.

3. Professor Sears no more attempts to answer the passages quoted by Dr. Tholuck in favor of final universal holiness, than Tholuck attempted to show that Matt. xxv: 46 did not relate to endless woe! Baptists, "in the publicity of this matter will find nothing to glory in." Besides, the glory and excellency of these passages (1 Cor. xv: 28; Rom. xi: 36; Isaiah xlv: 22-25, and Philip. ii: 9-12) cannot be destroyed, but must be confirmed, by bringing the light of God's nature and character to bear upon them. Glory be to God!

Finally. We do find much to glory in, and to praise God for, "who giveth us the victory" over our opposers. For while the learned German Universalists, who fear to teach the people what God has revealed, are unable to rend the veil spread over passages like Matt. xxv: 46, by the false doctrines of the dark ages, we see them clear, harmonious, consistent with the character of God, and the plain word of his truth! Does Mr. Beebe doubt this? We tell him, the very word rendered punishment, in Matt. xxv: 46, (Kolasiu) proves that punishment is emendatory, and of course limits it to an object.

If Mr. Beebe, or any of his correspondents, will amicably discuss this passage with me, he shall be attended to—and if the affirmative and reply are published in the Register, I will give them place also in the Magazine and Advocate.

Or, if Mr. Beebe will publish a few brief essays on this subject, by a Universalist, we will undertake to prove to his readers that the language of Jesus in Matt. xxv., is grossly misunderstood by all who apply it to a period yet to come.

Will Mr. Beebe accept either of these offers? Will he furnish his readers an opportunity of reading BOTH sides of the question? I wait a reply. A. B. G.

THE INSANE, GOOD THEOLOGIANS.

This is truly an age of most astonishing discoveries and improvements. Genius and philanthropy have united forces, and are driving despair before them. Spurzheim—that noble instrument of God and benefactor of man—urged the employment of the insane in works suited to them, as a means of lessening the expense of their support—beguiling the tediousness of their time, and restoring them to the light of the mind, reason. It has been done. Those who watered the earth with the blood of their fellows in the fury of insanity, now till the ground together in peace and lore. The idiot loses his vacant stare in laboring with childish joy at some useful mechanical employment. The filthy madman, who raved in chains, handles some useful implement of art or labor, and is at least reasonable enough to do his task. And all, late gloomy and sad, rejoice in the creations of their own skill, and are happy in their unconscious usefulness to society and each other. Blessed be God, this worst of all calamities is losing its horrors and its loathsomeness—the insane are no longer below the brute in their external conditions and internal enjoyments.

But, rapid as are the improvements of philanthropic Phrenologists, our Baptist brethren bid fair far to excel them all. They make the insane, teachers of theology! I am serious, dear reader, so do not—do not, I beg of you, doubt my veracity. I am also able to prove my statement true. The insane, it is found, by experiment, are able to teach even the learned and able Baptist Professors of theology!

Do you still doubt? Then hear the proofs. About three years ago, Professor Sears, of the Baptist Theological Seminary, at Hamilton, Madison county, went to Germany to study theology under Professor Tholuck, a confirmed, "a positive Universalist." And Mr. Beebe, Editor of the Baptist Register, of this city, declared in his paper of September 4, 1835—

"Men who are decided Universalists are as much in a state of derangement as lunatics in an asylum."

Ergo—Professor Tholuck is insane—and it follows, as a necessary consequence, that a Baptist Professor of theology can be further instructed in theological learning by a person who is "as much in a state of derangement as lunatics in an asylum"! Well may friend Beebe cry out in wonder, "What a Professor of theology!"

Good—good! "I thank thee, Je—" Mr. Beebe, I mean—"for teaching me that word!" What a compliment have you prepared for the Baptist denomination whose teachers will be instructed by the pupil of an insane! What a compliment to your able and learned Professor Sears—to the Seminary over which he long presided—and to us poor "monomaniacs," whose "mental maladies" (as you declared last September) "God alone can relieve"!

I repeat my friendly caution to Mr. Beebe, (see Magazine and Advocate, vol. vi., p. 303, column 2,) to "take care, or he may awake some morning and find his head shaved and blistered by some 'deranged' M. D., D. D., or L. L. D., who is afflicted with the monomania called Universalism." Ahem! A. B. G.

REV. LUTHER LEE.

The readers of the fourth and fifth volumes of this paper probably remember this most twistical defender of Methodism, and his controversy with Br. Morse in those volumes. By the Western Banner, (a Methodist paper, published in Auburn,) we learn that he is about publishing a book against Universalism. His reasons for publishing are given thus:—

"In the Autumn of 1832 the writer was again called upon to meet Rev. Pitt Morse, in a debate which commenced on the 18th day of September, in Antwerp, N. Y., and which was continued for three days. This discussion was followed by an account of it, from Mr. Morse, published in the Universalist paper printed at Utica, so distorted and false as to demand a reply, which forthwith made its appearance. This called forth a rejoinder from Mr. M., and a protracted discussion ensued, which ended in an agreement for a written discussion in the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, the above mentioned Universalist paper, the Editor agreeing to publish both sides of the question, and to allow the disputants each an equal space. This controversy, however, was closed by the Universalist Editor's closing his columns against it, at the very moment it began to excite general attention and interest."

Now our readers of 1832-34, well know, that to point out and refute all the false impressions intended to be produced in the foregoing short extract, would require a page of our paper. For the sake of our new subscribers, however, I will notice a few of the most prominent.

1. So far from being false and distorted, Mr. Lee, in the correspondence respecting it, was convicted (and tacitly admitted his guilt) of no less than TWELVE "errors," (as Br. Morse mildly termed them,) which he had not the moral honesty to avoid, nor the magnanimity to retract, after he was compelled silently to drop them.

2. It did not end in an agreement for a written discussion in our columns. It was to be published—but Br. Morse was only bound to publish—no agreement said in what, or how. Its publication was not commenced in our paper, but in the Methodist Advocate and Journal. The Advocate and Journal first excluded Br. Morse's letters from its columns.

3. We agreed to give each party equal space in the discussion, and did give Mr. Lee more space than Mr.

Morse had, as any one will see who will count over their several articles.

4. Long before we closed our columns, and long after the controversy ceased to be interesting, Mr. Lee had abandoned the controversy, by discussing the subjects of future punishment and the existence of a personal devil! That this was an abandonment of the controversy, is evident from the very nature of the question, which was, "Will all men be finally holy and happy, or not?" It had nothing to do with personal devils, nor yet with ante-ultimate punishment.

Could I believe that the man's conscience would allow him to read it—or, if it did, that he would have conscience enough to profit by it—I would present Mr. Lee with a neat little work entitled, "Illustrations of Lying, in all its various branches; by Amelia Opie." It is an excellent work, and the great Methodist Mammoth Book Concern will advance morality considerably, by stereotyping it, and distributing it liberally among some of its preachers and members. Amen. A. B. G.

THE BAPTISTS AND THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

Another of the great sectarian mammoths has drawn its lines so close as to exclude some of its warm and devoted friends; and thus weaken its influence and power. Sometime since we saw a notice in some religious periodical that the British Bible society had refused to aid in the publication and distribution of some oriental version of the Bible which had been translated by the Baptists, because they rendered the Greek word baptizo by one which clearly signified to immerse. Shortly after we saw another notice that the American Bible society objected to giving any aid to publish a Siamese (or Burmese) version, translated by American Baptist missionaries, because they had rendered the same word in a similar manner. I said then, a storm was brewing. It burst out in the Baptist Register of this city, on the 26th ult. Br. Beebe is quite lachrymose, con furiosa on the subject. "Little things are great to little minds," and in Br. Beebe's judgment, immersion is about as important a point in Christianity, and as divine a subject, as the existence of a personal devil and an endless hell!

It appears that, for some months past, the American Bible society has been discussing the question of aiding foreign missionaries to print and publish the Bible in foreign languages. They talked considerably about their "rule," their "constitutional provision," that no copies should be circulated, except those "without note or comment"! when it is notorious that they often violate it—for what are their headings of chapters and columns but notes and comments? "Lord, how this world is given to —"! But to the subject.

They finally resolved that they would "encourage such versions only, as conform in the principles of their translation, to the common English version." That is, such as would transfer (instead of translate) the word baptizo, giving it merely the necessary idiomatic termination.

Br. Beebe precedes the resolution with the following remarks, which would be very ridiculous and grandiloquent if applied to such a very trying and uninteresting difference of opinion as exists between the Partialists and us—viz., whether the greater part of mankind shall be endlessly sinful and miserable, or whether all shall be holy and happy, God glorified in the highest sense, and Jesus fully satisfied. But when applied to the very great and important difference which exists between the Baptists and Pedobaptists—viz., whether a man shall be put into the water, or the water be poured or sprinkled over the man, it is very appropriate—in excellent keeping with the importance of the subject, and moving enough to soften a cobble stone into cobbler's wax! Hear Br. Beebe!

"We are excluded from an equality with Pedobaptists in their appropriations for the translation and publication of the Scriptures in foreign languages! The numerical strength of the denomination, the vast sums contributed by us, nor the force of Christian union, could prevent the afflicting decision!" Many hearts will bleed, and many tears will flow; for Baptists loved the American Bible society, sustained it with their gifts and prayers, and clung to it as "the prince of charities,"—the great instrumentality by which our own land should be supplied with the word of life, and the millions, also, among the Pagan nations of Asia and Africa. How sadly are all these hopes prostrated with this decision against us! How could our Pedobaptist brethren deal thus ungenerously, thus cruelly, with us? Oh! if their love were half as strong for us as ours for them, they never could have found it in their hearts to treat us thus."

However, Br. Doebbe still has some hope that, at the general meeting of the Board, in May next, this resolution will be annulled. He may see by their Bibles with "notes and comments" that they are not great rule keepers, and take courage. Or, he supposes, even if excluded, there is still consolation. Baptists are the "real Simon Pare"—and therefore it must be that God has some great design to accomplish by them! So God had great designs to effect by means of the close communion Pharisees of old—but, alas for them! they were little benefited in their bigoted, narrow and contracted schemes, after all. However, it is better living on hope, than dying in despair. A. B. G.

GERMAN THEOLOGY.

Extracts from the letters of Henry E. Dwight and Professor Sears have been published in all the Universalist papers—which extracts conclusively show that the literati of Germany reject the doctrine of endless torment, and rejoice in the assurance of eventual universal salvation.

I have recently become acquainted with a German scholar, a native of Germany, from whom I have received abundant confirmation of the above fact. He has consented to translate a number of German hymns, which I propose to render into English verse. He mentions Witchell's Morning and Evening Devotions as a work replete with Universalism, poetically expressed. The subjoined is a literal translation of a piece by that author. It is deficient in one of the constituent elements of poetry; namely, comparison—but the sentiment is so good, that I conclude to publish it. The Morning and Evening Devotions are equally sound in doctrine, and are presented in a much better dress. I will only add, that Witchell is a Lutheran clergyman in Bavaria.

"Christians, if you worship God, consider well what he is. He is holy, he is perfect. You deceive yourselves, and do not honor him, if you speak of Divine anger; if you think God cherishes, like you, abominable revenge in his heart; if you say that God will punish his children in all eternity with dreadful torments, or that the never-ending misery of hell shall proclaim his honor. If God were not love, eternal love, he would create an endless hell for those who blaspheme his holiness, by ascribing to him the feeling of their own corrupted hearts. The Holy One is love. If he does punish, if every sin is a fountain of misery, it is to make his children good, and by goodness happy. Universal happiness must yet be, or there would be no God, no Father of the human race; and all religion would be empty imagination."

The above is from the pen of Br. A. C. Thomas, of Philadelphia, and is copied from a late number of the Universalist Union. It is certainly worthy of the serious consideration of every reflecting mind. As confirmation of the position assumed, that the German theologians almost universally reject the dogma of endless misery, and maintain the doctrine of the final restitution of all men to holiness and happiness, I would mention a conversation I recently held on the subject with a learned German physician. He attended an evening lecture which I gave in October last, in Schoharie county, and, after the close of the meeting, entered into familiar conversation on the subject: in the course of which he remarked: That he was much surprised, on coming to this country, to find a sect or denomination of Christians, called Universalists, whose distinguishing tenet was the doctrine of the final purity and bliss of all our race; and who labored so incessantly to refute the opposite doctrine of endless misery. And his astonishment arose, not that there were people in this country who believed the doctrine of universal restoration, but that any enlightened Christian should for a moment doubt it, or require any argument or labor to prove it true—not that the doctrine of endless misery was rejected by some, but that any should pretend to believe in so monstrous a theory. For he knew of no people in Germany of any note, either clergy or laymen, who believed in the doctrine of endless misery or doubted that of universal salvation. [His acquaintance was generally with the Lutherans, the major sect of Germany.] Hence his surprise that there should be any necessity or room for the labors of such a denomination as the Universalists. Reader, recollect these things: and remember also that Mr. Dwight, mentioned above by Br. Thomas, acknowledges that the Germans are the most enlightened and deeply read nation in the world—that they are at least a century in advance of all other nations. D. S.

THE RECORD.

MEETING-HOUSES.—The last accounts from Pittsburg, Pa., state that the Universalist meeting-house "does not begin" to hold the congregations—neither will an addition to the end be sufficient—they are about taking measures to purchase another lot, and to build a new house on it next Summer. Good! I owe them no illwill, but I do most heartily wish that their congregations may increase so as to render even the new house insufficient, as soon as it is built. The society in North Yarmouth, on Cape Cod, have made arrangements to build a meeting-house. The site was presented by a Br. who lately was a deacon in the Congregationalist church. Br. Drew says he found the truth, but lost his deaconship! The Universalists in Ludlow, (adjoining Cavendish,) Vt., are preparing to erect a meeting-house. Br. Ackley says the society at Bristol, Ontario county, in this State, have made arrangements for erecting a house for worship this season. Br. Ashton, in a letter published in the Union, says that we shall have a house in Catawissa, Pa., next Summer, in consequence of an attempt by the Methodists to exclude the Universalists out of a meeting-house principally erected by the liberality of the latter. It is not more than a few months since Br. J. H. Gibson preached the first Universalist sermon in that place. A union house was lately dedicated at Barrington, N. H. Sermon on our part by Br. J. P. Atkinson, of Dover.

SOCIETIES.—A new society of Universalists was formed in Rushford, Allegany county, on February 27, as we learn by a letter from Br. L. Paine, published in the Herald of Truth. This is the ninth in that county; the most of which are prosperous. On February 29, another was formed in Richmond, Me. Br. Stevens supplies them one-fourth of the Sundays. Br. Chase says that in consequence of a protracted meeting held by the Methodists, the Universalist society in Geneva received an accession of twenty members, and as many more were expected soon. Can't Br. C. send a piece of that meeting to this city? It seems to be beneficial. By the Trumpet we learn that about twenty-five members were added to the Second Universalist church of Boston (Br. H. Ballou's), on last communion day—that the fifth society, worshipping in Boylston Hall in that city, is still increasing without subtracting from the other societies of brethren—and that several accessions have been made to the church at Cambridgeport, which is prospering under the pastoral care of Br. L. R. Paige. The societies in Lynn and Lowell, Mass., are also increasing so much as to render it advisable to set off colonies. Br. Rogers gives a very pleasing account of a society in Patriot, Ind., a pleasing village of about thirty houses, about fifty miles below Cincinnati, on the river. For several years, they have met every Sunday for singing, prayer and reading sermons, and have prospered. They have forty members—the Methodists, the only society beside in the place, have eight! Our friends there will soon build a house for worship. They deserve a good pastor also.

PREACHERS.—Many new laborers claim notice. Br. D. Tenny writes us that Harlow P. Sage, of Huntington, Loraine county, Ohio, has lately commenced preaching the glad tidings. "He is a gentleman of promising talents, and has commenced under circumstances that promise great usefulness in pulling down the strong holds of superstition and bigotry" in that region. Br. A. R. Gardner informs us that he has "lately formed an acquaintance with our excellent Br. Nathaniel Wright, formerly of Attleborough, Mass., who now resides in Tazewell county Ill., about sixty miles from Henderson." He adds that a brother named William H. Blair, is successfully preaching the Gospel at Quincy, Ill. "Br. Isaac Clements, of Fort Ann, Washington county, N. Y., has commenced speaking in defence of universal grace. He is a young man of unblemished character, and a recent convert from the Presbyterian church." So says Br. Williamson of the Union.

REMOVALS.—Br. George McCune, of Baltimore, Md., purposes journeying on an extensive southern mission. His address for the present will continue at Baltimore. Br. W. S. Balch, from Claremont, N. H., to Providence, R. I.; and Br. K. Haven, from Shoreham, Vt., to Claremont, N. H. The Claremont friends engage his whole time. Br. Stillman Clark removes to Winchester, N. H., but from whence the Trumpet saith not. Br. E. Gage, from DeRuyter, Madison county, to Northville, (Cayuga Postoffice,) Cayuga county, to which Postoffice he wishes his letters and papers directed in future.* Dr. Warren Skinner from Shaftesbury to Cavendish, Vt. Br. S. has thus been re-settled by those old and tried friends to whom he ministered before he removed to Shaftesbury. Proctorsville is the Postoffice at which he receives papers. Br. Orrin Roberts, of Verona, Oneida county, has accepted an invitation to settle with the society in Lakeville, Livingston county. Br. D. T. Stevens, of Hartford, removes to Lewiston Falls, Me. He will labor with that society one-half the time.

* Herald of Truth will please copy.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in April, by Br. NEWELL at Newville, instead of Sharon—(see second Sunday)—Br. WHITNEY at Eatonsville, and at Herkimer in the evening—Br. SKINNER in Boonville, and Br. GOSH in this city—Br. BODEN at Richfield Springs—Br. DeLONG at Gilbertsville—Br. BIDDYCOM at Rome—Br. FRENCH at Williamsstown—Br. T. C. Eaton in Baldwinsville—Br. WAGGONER at Middlefield Centre, and at Cooperstown in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in April by Br. WHITNEY at Russia, and at Newport in the evening—Br. BODEN at Fly Creek—Br. NEWELL at Sharon, instead of first Sunday—Br. WAGGONER at Little Lakes—Br. FRENCH at Field's settlement, and at Talcott's schoolhouse at 5 P. M.

Br. BODEN will preach in the evenings of April 4, at Paine's Hollow—6, at Little Lakes—7, at Hallsville.

Br. J. E. HOLMES will preach on Sunday, April 3, at Springfield X roads, Pa.—Tuesday 5, at Saybrook, O.—Wednesday 6, Geneva—Friday, 8, Chagrin—Sunday, 10, Cleveland—Tuesday, 12, at Olmstead—Wednesday, 13, at Carlisle—Sunday, 17, at Peru. He will remain in Huron county one or two weeks, and then proceed to Michigan. Friends in Ohio desirous of addressing him, can direct to Steuben, Huron county, Ohio—those in Michigan, to Ann Arbor, Michigan.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ALONE WITH THE DEAD.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

I kneel beside thee, "marble-seeming clay,"
Unseen by mortal eye. But dost thou not,
Oh shade of her that was in life so dear,
Look down to this wrong heart?

There is a smile,
A sweet, a placid, heaven-unkindling smile
Upon that angel face. Methinks it is,
O spirit blest, the shadow of thy wing,
Tracing soft sunshine on the home which erst
Gave out such noontide radiance—a beam
Shed from God's holy altar, which will warm
And renovate at length the prostrate dust,
And mould it into life.

I am alone—
Alone, with death and silence at my side,
And but a flickering lamp-beam to direct
Each wild and dream-like thought. Alon! Oh God!
What vision crowd upon me—tender, sad,
Sublime and beautiful; visions of thee
And of thy creature man. Life's bubbles burst,
Time's sands run slowly out, and countless worlds
Are thrown, like slight partitions, into one
Broad, boundless heaven of love, whose sun art thou,
Great Parent, and whose sweet melodious air
Is but the harp-like breathings of those hearts,
Kindled in life and death.

And what is death?
I kiss thee, gentle sister; thou art cold
And pale, and hast life's Winter on thy brow,
Its silence on thy lips. But Spring will come,
And thou shalt wear such garlands as the hand
Of time cannot derange.

I will arise
And go with joy about my household cares,
And give my soul to peace; for death is but
A kind and gentle servant, who unlocks
With noiseless hand life's flower-encircled door,
To show us those we love.

The following excellent article is taken from an old, worn out newspaper sent us some time since. It is generally supposed to be from the pen of Rev. T. Flint, better known as an eminent literary writer than as a Presbyterian preacher. Its bearing on the utility of Prize Tales will readily be perceived by our readers.

THE ADVANTAGES OF WORKS OF MORAL FICTION.

There has been an immense amount of idle declamation against this class of writings. The same fanatical spirit, which led weak or prejudiced people to attack the cheerful and agreeable affections of our nature, and to denounce the exercise of them as irreligious, has directed itself against works of moral fiction, and has declared a novel, as well as a "play book," to be "the primer of Beelzebub." It is the same sort of perverted feeling and of false and unnatural reasoning, that makes religionists of a certain description, condemn ornamental dresses and all decorations of the person, the amusements of dancing and social parties for mutual entertainment, the play of wit and fancy in conversation, the elegant and refined pleasures of the drama, the delightful emotions derived from the fine arts, and all the charms of taste and imagination. This war upon nature always has been kept up, and always will be, by the bigoted, the superstitious, the artificial, the morose and the fanatical. It is so easy to misapply the fair mode of reasoning from the constitution of human nature, and to make it justify vices, that a considerable advantage is given to the uncandid and perverse, when the argument is addressed to a tribunal which is without talent and without philosophical discrimination. There is a sense, in which all that is natural is right; and another, in which a great deal that is natural is wrong. Weak or designing men find no difficulty in confounding those two views of what is natural, and in thus bringing both into discredit with given sects or parties. Abuses are substituted for uses, and all sink together. A Quaker proscribes poetry, music and complaisance, for the same purposes that he cuts off the collar of his coat and puts himself in drab. The mob cap of the daughter, and the formal thee and thou, are the fruits of the same temper that gravely and devoutly transfers the works of moral fiction from the hands of the saints to the circles of the depraved and the heirs of perdition.

But this hostility to beauty and elegance, to fancy and accomplishment, is as inconsistent with true religion as it is with philosophy and common sense. Let us look at the real character of works of moral fiction, and ascertain how many kinds of writing are included under this title. It is not, with any propriety, limited to novels and romances, in the common acceptation of the terms, but extends to parables, fables, pastorals, dramatic productions, epic poems, and all other which are not scientific, historical, biographical, or devoted to an account of facts and events as they have actually happened in the course of things. The parables of the Bible are beautiful specimens of works of moral fiction, and are designed to illustrate truth and duty, as they do, in a manner which is more forcible than that of any direct address. Jotham's Bramble, Nathan's Eve Lamb, the Good Samaritan, Dives and Lazarus, the Prodigal Son, and many others, might be selected from the sacred Scriptures, as among the most impressive and effectual means of instructing and elevating the human mind. They are unanswerable examples for the justification of this species of writing, in all ages and nations, if any justification from acknowledged authority were wanting. The fables of Æsop, the idylls of Theocritus and Gessner, the invented scenes of Homer and Virgil, the pastorals of ancient and modern days, the Telemachus of the pious Fenelon, the Partheniad of Baggessin, the Fairy Queen of Spenser, the Utopia of Moore, the Corinna of de Stael, the admirable productions of Miss Edgeworth, and the unrivalled novels of Walter Scott, afford as lawful a kind of reading as do the avowed works of science and philosophy, or the pages of ethics and devotion. Religion does not exclusively consist in direct acts of worship, nor does instruction confine itself to the sober forms of discussion and argument, the severe and rigid application of analysis and synthesis to the subjects of human thought.

It is a miserable idea of poetry, that makes its essence consist in deception. It is an equally miserable idea of works of imagination, that deprives them of the soul of truth, and assigns to them the office of deluding the mind and the heart. The pleasure which is derived from such works, has its foundation in the best part of the nature of man. Were it not right and useful, it would not have been made essential to the mind. Religion itself calls out the same sort of emotion, and carries our hopes and anticipations to a still higher point. A state of existence now ideal, but which we are able to fancy, and which we love to follow out into all the necessary details, is presented to us both in novels and in sermons. A perfection of character which we have not yet witnessed, is described to us in both kinds of works, and is held up as a standard at which we are bound to aim. We are, at some future period, to reach this point of perfection, and to enjoy this finished state of society. It is absurd to suppose, that our imagination can delineate a mode of existence which is superior to what the Deity can actually accomplish. Who will dare to say, that our Maker has given us powers of conception beyond his own? But if his conceptions are superior to ours, his works must be also, for his plans are as perfectly executed as they are contrived. It is a radical error in our faith to think that reality must finally fall short of imagination. Reality is continually exciting imagination. No man studies nature and its laws much, without finding his imagination growing upon him as he advances in knowledge, and as he discovers the wonderful unity of design in the midst of the infinite variety of means, by which the design is effected. Tell me that a cold and lifeless statue is better than a living man with soul, sentiment, feeling, and friendship, and I will ask a place for you in some lunatic asylum. It is equally maniacal to tell me, that the wonders of God's works are not as great as the meagre productions of a human fancy.

The lively interest excited by the perusal of well written books of moral fiction, is itself a boon, and calls for our gratitude in return for the constitution of nature, by which we are made capable of receiving this pleasure. Many persons seem to be afraid to be happy. They cannot keep their consciences at ease, except in a state of suffering. There is a wickedness in smiles and good fortune. A soft bed is one of the tricks of satan to lull the soul into a fatal security. In this mode of thinking, a happy human face is a most alarming heresy. Beautiful and sweet children are little fiends, and have embryo claws, growing in secret to tear out the eyes of those who love and protect them.

Follies of this extent are capable of being implanted under the direction of an artificial education in religion, or that which is called by this sacred name. To have a lively interest excited is a good thing. The world need not be at all frightened on this score. There is no necessity of putting out our eyes because a beautiful landscape is before them. There is, after all, no such terrible wickedness in the prismatic colors, and in the pleasures they give. The Maker of beauty does not hate it; the Author of elegance is not shocked at it; and the Painter of the flowers of the fields is no Quaker to censure them for vanity and levity, and to excommunicate them from the ranks of the faithful. There is no more virtue in drawing down the corners of the mouth, than there is in allowing them to rise up in a smile. Coarse linen has no more religion in it than fine. A taste for nauseous liquors, bad music, hobbling poetry, nasal sounds, or books without genius and interest, is not necessary to piety, nor to any of the Christian graces. An accomplished and elegant man may be a saint, as well as an awkward and clownish one. Yet this is at times disputed, or appears to be so. If, however, any reader insists upon believing that taste and enjoyment are criminal, let him remain in his boorishness and suffering. He is scarcely worth the pains necessary to his conversion.

Works of moral fiction furnish better views of life and character than can be found in any other kind of writing. History and biography must be a detail of facts, but novels, comedies, allegories, fables, can take the just such personages as the author wishes, and as his object demands. The events may be selected, scenes may be imagined, occasions may be summoned, and characters drawn out, as the plan of the work requires. Comedy is a cure for a multitude of follies, that no other treatment can remedy. Ridicule is sometimes the best of all weapons, and is an admirable means of discrimination between truth and falsehood. Superstition is sure of being laughed down, where argument would be ineffectual. Innumerable are the defects of temper and of life, which an apologue or a story would far more successfully attack than a sermon would. Both kinds of influence are good in their places.

When it is said that false representations of human nature are drawn out in works of moral fiction, it is not true of the majority of them, at least of the majority of those which are read by intelligent persons. The books of this character, which are now offered to the world, are remarkable for holding the mirror up to nature. One of the most decided advantages of modern literature over ancient, is the improved form of novels, and the admirable fidelity of our good comedies to the actual state of society and to the variety of characters and manners. A discriminating reader of these classes of productions from the different countries of Europe, may acquire a wonderfully accurate knowledge of manners, customs, modes of thinking, virtues, vices, and peculiarities, without the expense of travelling. Indeed, if anything can supersede the necessity of travelling for the purpose of liberalizing the mind, it is this sort of reasoning. The prescription, which I would offer to the prejudiced, the narrow, the superstitious, the formal and the tedious, to cure their faults, would be, next to travelling, that of reading good novels, good comedies and good satires. Nonsense and artifice cannot stand against such a remedy, if it be followed up with perseverance. The disguises which patients of this description put on, and by which they are kept from a knowledge of themselves, are stripped off, and their diseases of character are brought out in symptoms that cannot be mistaken. A selfish formalist, a perverse religionist, a canting hypocrite, could not read a series of such comedies as the Tartuffe of Moliere, without soon becoming convalescent. Quixotism was not more successfully assailed by Cervantes, than Cameronianism is by the author of Waverley. How admirably is manoeuvring cut up by Miss Edgeworth, and the slang of selfishness and puritanism exposed in Matrim's "Peur et Contre!"

EPISCOPALIANISM.....No. V.

THE CLERGY.

That the Episcopalian church is distinguished by the same orders or grades among the clergy, in general, as those of the Roman Catholic, is too well known and too obvious to require proof. It need little, besides a pope, and a few mendicant monks to complete the resemblance. And indeed, his grace of Canterbury, is no contemptible epitome of the dignified state of his holiness—while his majesty, the king, is much more than his equal in temporal, if not in spiritual power. The archbishop of Canterbury is the first peer of England—takes precedence of all dignitaries, civil or ecclesiastical—crowns the monarchs, and is in fact, second only to the king's most sacred majesty.

The Episcopal priesthood consists of three orders—bishops, priests and deacons. But these orders admit of a vast number of modifications, which materially effect both their power and their consequence. Thus an archbishop claims and exercises certain powers and prerogatives to which no mere bishop may aspire, except through the attainment of the office. An archdeacon is a priest who literally performs the drudgery of the bishop, and is in fact, the visiting representative of that dignity. And a dean is the head or president of the chapter—the bishop's council, composed of ten canons or prebendaries; and these are certain priests whose livings are provided for by a revenue, set apart for the purpose of paying those who perform the service in a cathedral, or bishop's church.

A bishop is a priest, who is supposed to have both the right and the power of governing the other clergy, and of directing the spiritual, and to a certain extent, the temporal concerns of the church within a given district. This district, or territorial jurisdiction is called a diocese. Thus in England, there are twenty-four dioceses, besides two of less dignity; and in the United States, we have the diocese of Pennsylvania, New-York, or some other division, and which is usually limited to a particular State. The bishop also, is the special functionary who confers ordination on the inferior clergy. These are denominated priests, or deacons. A deacon is a priest in his noviciate; and while he is permitted to perform public service, he is not allowed to fulfil all the duties of a priest. His orders imply that he is on probation for a given time, at the expiration of which, he receives ordination as a matter of course, provided the bishop approves of his talents, his qualifications and his conduct.

Besides these, there are a number of peculiar names and appropriate offices and distinctions, of more or less importance; such as vicars, rectors—and last, but by no means least, comes the list of humble curates. Vicars are priests who have not the right of the parish tithes; but are employed by the person or community owning that right, to perform the service. Rectors are parish ministers who receive its tithes; and Episcopal clergymen with settlements over particular congregations, generally bear this appellation in the United States. And curates are persons in orders, employed to discharge the duties of the ministry, by those and for those, who are too luxurious, too idle, or too impotent to perform the labor for themselves. In England, curates are most emphatically the workingmen of the establishment. They are proverbially the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the superior, or the more wealthy clergy; and are the centres on which are suspended nearly all the affections and sympathies which the church has to spare.

As every grade from the curate up to the archbishop, implies an increase of power and emolument, the respective places are sought in England, with the same avidity, and by the same general means, as are the places of honor or profit in the civil department. The progress of disease in a gouty or hectic bishop, is watched by a swarm of eager expectants—who have already put in their claims as successors to the declining incumbent. Vicarages and other places are held in reversion; and are not unfrequently purchased in the same manner, and for the same reasons, as commissions in the army or navy. And even in this country, the election of a bishop is usually attended by all the preliminary aspirations, canvassing and finesse that mark our political struggles; and as much management is exhibited in a quiet way, to secure the appellation of Right Reverend, as is usually practiced to obtain that of his excellency. These measures commonly result either in the election of some powerful and talented aspirant, whose energy of character secures his triumph—or in the exaltation of a nose of wax, which the wise ones design to mould and direct at pleasure.

What can any sober Christian find in the New Testament, which will warrant such a stretch of ecclesiastical power as is claimed and exercised by the clergy of the Episcopal church? Where, in all the history of the apostles, shall he look for the names of office, and the almost superhuman dignities attached to these numerous appellatives? He may, indeed, look—but he may look in vain! He will, it is true, find the word bishop, in several instances; but when he remembers that the public version of the Bible was translated into English by Episcopalians—that they performed the work under all the predilections for a favorite system, which law, interest and prejudice are calculated to inspire, he will cease to wonder that elder or presbyter is metamorphosed into bishop. At what time—in what place did the apostles assume the magisterial tone of a modern bishop? when and where did they lord it over the heritage of their Master? No men were ever further from such pretensions; notwithstanding the multiplied and undeniable evidences that their ministry was of divine appointment. They advised, recommended and entreated; but they only did this, and in the most becoming and conciliatory way. The injunction of their teacher, to call no man master, was neither forgotten nor disregarded; and they denominated themselves and their coadjutors the servants of the church and ministers of the new covenant.

Who could have anticipated the numerous lucrative offices—high-sounding titles, and equally high and positive powers of the Episcopal hierarchy, from the labors, the poverty, the instructions and the example of the first Christian ministers! And what must have been the feelings of those patriarchs of Christian simplicity and meekness, to have been addressed by the silly and disgusting epithets, so sedulously courted by their pretended successors? Could they have foreseen this, a remedy had probably been applied, which would have saved the church from much ridiculous vanity, as well as from many absurd distinctions.

But under Episcopacy, these appellatives are the objects of attraction, because they are accompanied with power. They entitle their possessors to a higher seat—to greetings in the markets, and to the interdicted salutation of Rabbi. Instead of the servants, they are most emphatically the masters of the church, saying to one go, and he goeth—and to another come, and he cometh. Nor is this power exclusively confined to the spiritual world—it grasps at temporalities; and attempts to amalgamate, or at least, compound the interests of earth and heaven. Continued efforts are made to reconcile things the most opposite and contradictory—those which Christ and his apostles carefully separated, are curiously combined, and temporal dignity and power linked and identified with spiritual domination.

That Episcopacy has not been annihilated in the course of the controversy respecting its institution by the apostles, is principally owing to the position held by the bishops in English society. It was firmly seated in the habits of many centuries, and was sustained by the utmost energy of the civil code. Backed by authority, by precedent, and by prejudice, it rode securely upon the shoulders of a people alike indisposed to investigate, and in consequence, incapable of understanding the subject. While the existing powers found both their interest and their safety, in permitting the affairs of the establishment to roll on as quietly as possible. This would prevent the unsettling and uprooting of a state of things—whose foundations once removed, it might cost both toil and blood to re-establish; and even then, might involve the sacrifice of valued places, and cherished institutions.

Nor can it be supposed that men situated as were the clergy of the English church, would abdicate their honors, and resign their places without a struggle. They entered the controversy in self-defence; as men combating for their possessions and their household gods. The institutions of Episcopacy constituted their all. And their appeals and arguments, though addressed to open and skilful opponents, were designed rather to preserve their existing possessions, than to acquire others by new conquests.

It may be admitted that they supposed there was no great impropriety in any form of church government; and that as Episcopacy was already established, there could be no objection to its perpetuation. Habit had rendered the system familiar, if not convenient to the people; and power and indulgence made it desirable to the clergy. And thus interest became the great sanctifier of a state of things, forever incompatible with the purity and simplicity of the Gospel.

But the admission of the perfect integrity of the advocates of Episcopacy, will by no means lessen the injury sustained by the church in its existence. The results of the supposition that the forms of church government, are the same, whether men aim at power and attain its exercise by honest convictions, or love of influence. There is, indeed, a great difference in the moral character of the men—and for a time, there may be a perceptible difference in the mode and spirit of the exercise of authority. But they eventually merge in the same consummation. On this elementary system of indifference to the mode of ecclesiastical government, was based Episcopacy—and popery followed out the plan, by the constitution of its universal bishop. And we are yet to learn, that the temporal and spiritual claims of the one, are not as genuine and well-founded, as the other. In reality, the one almost necessarily implies the other—and it has been a matter of no small sensibility to the English clergy, when the incongruous fact has stared them in the face, that a layman was actually the head of the establishment. And we shall accordingly see in its proper place, that the Episcopalian church acknowledges the divine authority—even of the pope. Nor is this a matter of mere courtesy—it is indispensable to the very existence of English Episcopalianism. So intimately connected are the two systems; which for the sake of consistency should constitute but one!

But it will naturally occur to the reader, that Episcopacy exists in the United States; and that as men are not compelled by statute to become Episcopalians here—it is good evidence that they are so, because they prefer the institutions of that denomination. Right—we never doubted that there were bigots to Episcopacy, as well as to every other system of religion. But the manner of its introduction and establishment in this country should never be forgotten.

When King James I, gave a code of laws to the colony of Virginia, in A. D. 1606; he provided that the word and service of God should be maintained according to the institutions of the church of England. Thus the first English settlement on the continent of America, was blessed with the legal establishment of Episcopacy.

In A. D. 1609, a new charter was given to the proprietors of the colony of Virginia, in which it was provided, that no emigrants should be permitted to go over to the plantations, who would not take the oath of supremacy—that is, that the king of England was the head of the church. And this very provident measure was taken for the express purpose of preventing the introduction of popery. For it was no doubt foreseen, that those whose religious observances depended alone upon an oath, would as readily take one to the pope as to the king. In 1639 these requisitions of the charter, were enforced against the Puritans, who were thus compelled to settle in Maryland, and were protected by the Roman Catholics.

An abortive attempt was made by Charles I, to regulate the emigration to New England, by the spiritual provisions of the charter of Virginia. In A. D. 1637, he ordered by proclamation, that none should emigrate without licence; and that licence should only be given to those who took the oath of supremacy, and conformed to the ritual of the English church.

This order was never enforced—as the poor king soon had other matters to engage his attention, but its failure serves one very important purpose—it shows to this day in the relative religious institutions of New England and Virginia, the influence which the civil code has upon the prosperity of Episcopalianism.

These references might be greatly multiplied during the progress of a whole century from the foregoing dates—but they are unnecessary. Let it be recollected, that when once established, Episcopacy would naturally propagate itself by the operation of ordinary causes, irrespective of the propriety or impropriety of its peculiar institutions. Many sects with whom we have no disposition to compare Episcopalians—and certainly, with whom they would not wish to be compared—have been propagated in this manner, and in this country, without losing a particle of their original character. Nor have the clergy of the establishment descended an inch below their European contemporaries in character, costume, or pretension, except where compelled by the nature of the institutions under which we live. And the fact, that the English church is now voluntarily sustained in the United States, no more implies any real change in its character and institutions, than that popery is not popery still, wherever it may be found.

VERAX.

ADDENDA.—Monied Episcopalians in England, have offered Bishop Chase, of this country, fifty thousand dollars to erect an Episcopal Theological Seminary in Illinois—and they will purchase the lands on which to locate it, and with which to endow it, besides building on those lands an Episcopal church and an Episcopal schoolhouse in every township in that State! Do they mean to buy the State as a colony for his majesty the king? See Utica Gospel Messenger of February 6, 1833, page 2, column 1. Where are those who cry out against the attempts of foreign Catholics to establish chapels and schools in this country? Here is as bold an interference by the Daughter as ever was made by the Mother!

The difference between the Episcopal character of the several Eastern States, is stated in the same number of the Gospel Messenger, as follows:—"Rhode Island has about one clergyman of our church for each seven thousand of her inhabitants; Massachusetts one for each sixteen thousand; New-Hampshire one for each forty-seven thousand; and Maine one for each ninety thousand." There are but five in Maine, and but three that officiate. The writer says, also:—"What a large and fair field does Maine present for missionary labor?.....And the fact already noticed of her having kindly received the missionaries of the mother church is encouraging to us as Episcopalians."

Verax will please excuse these addenda—I believed they would add a little information to his large contribution of the same.

THE WATERER.....No. 111.

STATED PREACHING.

"How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?" Rom. x: 14.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN—You are now, as it were, planted. Paul has visited your portion of our Master's heritage, scattering the seed, which has apparently fallen on good ground; and ye are sprang up as vines of his planting. You have also formed a congregation, respectable in numbers; but, as yet, are destitute of regular and stated preaching.

I perceive the measures you are contemplating will not sustain and keep you together, much less enable you to prosper and increase. You are not able to procure or pay for the labors of a distinguished preacher, steadily, for any portion of the time; but you intend holding meetings occasionally—whenever you can obtain the services of Paul or Peter.

Brethren, this course will ruin you, as it has always ruined other societies. "But the opposition," you say, "is strong and crafty, and you must have great preaching or none." You may perhaps obtain the services of Peter, Paul, and Barnabas, to the amount of six times during the year, for which you will probably expend one hundred dollars. For this sum you might procure the labors of Timothy, Theophilus, or Titus, (all good and capable young brethren,) one-third part of the time. Your brethren in the two adjacent towns might employ him, each another third; and thus, in comfortable weather, you might, by attending each others' meetings, enjoy the benefit of constant preaching.

Besides, you might thus reap the advantages of having an exemplary preacher reside among you. He would attend the funerals and marriages in your society, form many acquaintances, acquire many friends, answer many questions, remove many prejudices, and add many believers to your number, "of such as shall be saved."

I cannot too forcibly urge the necessity of supplying yourselves, immediately, with regular preaching, for at least a portion of the time. If you do not, the opposition, which you say, is "strong and crafty," will undermine you by their superior zeal. They will draw your children into their Sabbath schools, and teach them error—they will entice away your singers, and destroy your choir—they will get up protracted meetings, work upon the sympathies of the nervous and sensitive, and make bigots, if not maniacs of your wives and daughters—they will misrepresent your sentiments, and there will be no one to answer them.

These are not the only evils that will result from the course you are contemplating. As these distinguished brethren reside at a distance, and their services are in great demand in strong and numerous congregations, such as at Ephesus and Corinth, there may come a time when you cannot obtain them; and then, having been accustomed to great preaching, you will not be able to sit under the less eloquent labors of other disciples, and your society will go down. But even if you could procure these eloquent brethren constantly, I doubt whether, in the end, it would prove most beneficial. Their praise being in all the churches, from the activity they have exhibited in the cause, and preaching, as they, consequently, always must, in the face of expectation, they are compelled to deal out their gold. After a time, their mental purses will be reduced to silver, and finally to copper—unless they should manage to live along by borrowing.

On the other hand, if you settle some worthy and tractable young brother among you, you will not only have a preacher you can call your own, who will be ready to serve you, "in season and out of season;" but, not having his time taken up in itinerating, by application to the means of improvement, though he begin with copper, he will soon advance to silver, thence to gold, which will grow brighter and purer, the longer you retain and cherish him.

"But why not do without a preacher, and every man be his own preacher?" says an eccentric, half-skeptical, and somewhat penurious brother. For the same reason that every one cannot be his own mechanic, his own physician, or his own advocate at the bar—simply, because every one has not the leisure nor the means of paying that undivided attention to the subject, which its nature and importance, and the well-being of society demand.

We here anticipate the objections in regard to priestcraft and corruption; and not having time to answer these objections, minutely, we shall pass by them, by admitting, that clergymen, like statesmen, have, in different ages of the world, grossly violated the integrity of their calling; and though we approve of that reforming spirit which watches over and scrutinizes the conduct and the motives both of its religious teachers and its civil rulers, we do not believe community can more profitably dispense with the services of the one class than with those of the other.

I therefore exhort you, brethren, that you have among you some one, whose whole time and attention shall be devoted to the investigation and communication of religious truth—who will have an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with the subject than you, individually, can be, and, therefore, competent to instruct and edify you—to build you up in faith and practice, promote your growth in grace; and in the knowledge of the truth.

APOLLOS.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TEMPERANCE.....No. IX.

BY A. W. BENTON, M. D.

But some think the traffic in ardent spirit is not immoral, because the "motive," and not "the consequences," determine the character of an action. And they cannot think that the "venders of ardent spirit are actuated by a wish to debase human nature, and fill our land with paupers, and our prisons with victims." It is true that the motive determines, as regards our own accountability, the character of our deeds. But still, it is extremely difficult for some, to see how a traffic productive of the greatest immoralities, without any over-balancing good, can in itself be moral. The truth is, it is not always necessary that a man should design the evil that results from his conduct, or act for the sole purpose of effecting that result, in order to stamp his conduct with immorality. There is a kind of selfish carelessness for the welfare of others, sufficiently criminal to give the characteristic of immorality to a man's actions. It is a principle recognized and acted upon by the "Judge of all the earth," who cannot do otherwise than right, that "if an ox were wont to push with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and the owner shall also be put to death."¹⁹

¹⁹ I object to the apparent meaning of this sentence. Not that I disbelieve in the existence of a similar principle of judgment, in relation to carelessness and indifference; but because I deem the injunction of the passage here quoted, wholly confined to the Jewish dispensation. Many of the Mosaic laws are calculated merely to allow a lesser evil, in order, by it, to prevent or extirpate a greater one. Such were the laws relating to undesignated or accidental homicide, making of vows, granting divorces, and the injunction in question. They were allowed to satisfy a greater spirit of revenge—"because of the hardness of" their "hearts." A. B. G.

Indeed it would seem rather paradoxical, that a man whose "ruling principle is self-interest," whose motive is "the love of money," which is "the root of all evil," should claim that his deeds were moral, just, or upright. "Can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit?" Has it not been testified to the venders of alcohol, in a voice as loud as ten thousand thunders, that it is wont to push with its horn? Are its effects not written in characters as luminous as the lightning's glare? If so, and they still continue to act for their own pecuniary interest alone, regardless of the welfare of others, can they be said to "sin innocently?" It is certainly our duty to do all the good we can in the world. We should embrace every opportunity which presents itself of benefiting others. If then we behold a man engaged in a traffic which is productive of more evil than good; which is injuring not only individuals, but the community at large; it is our duty to endeavor to turn him from his evil ways. We should appeal to his reason, his humanity, his patriotism, and his religion. We should use every means of persuasion. But if his heart is barred to all these avenues of goodness and piety; if none of these principles exert a controlling influence over him; if self-interest proves to be his only ruling principle, then should we approach him through that medium. If that be the only channel through which we can pour into his bosom the waters of life, which shall purify his conduct; if this be the only chord that vibrates to his heart; if this presents the only opportunity of doing him good, and through him an incalculable good to others, surely we ought not to neglect it. It is true, if there were no drinkers, there would be no venders. It is equally true, that if there were no venders, there could be no drinkers. They are mutual supports to each other, and to intemperance. The vender holds out the temptation to drink, and the drinker, unable to resist the temptation, yields. Now, shall he who yields to temptation bear all the responsibility, while he who holds forth the bribe is counted guiltless? No; every dictate of justice, "of human kindness, of reason and philanthropy, and every precept of Heaven is against it." It is to be feared, that as long as there are those base enough to sell, there will be some weak enough to buy. Is it safer to exhort men to resist temptation, than to remove the temptation when it is possible? But admit that it is impossible to prevent the making and selling of intoxicating drinks so long as they are called for. This does not prove that no benefit can be achieved by inducing respectable men to abandon the traffic in it. The respectability of the vender goes far toward keeping up the respectability of drinking. Many cannot see why it should be wrong or degrading to buy, what it is right and honorable to sell. Let all our merchants abandon the traffic in ardent spirit, and let it be confined entirely to the filthy grogshop, and the bar-room, and you will see many, if not all respectable drinkers abandon the glass; not from compulsion, but from a sense of honor. Ought we not, then, as Christians—as friends to good order and peace in society—as friends to virtue and humanity, to patronize a merchant who keeps no intoxicating drinks for sale, in preference to one who spreads it like a blighting mildew over the fairest portion of the moral world? But we must not attempt "with an iron heel" to crush the man. It is not the man, but his conduct that we oppose. We need not shut him out from all sympathy; we need not "cut off all connexion," nor refuse all intercourse. This doctrine has not, to my knowledge, been taught by the "leading members of temperance societies." "But," very

* I regret to say, that the Executive Committee of the New-York State Society, in the American Quarterly Temperance Magazine, No. 1, for February, 1834, recommends members of temperance societies to "shun the very sight" of venders and makers of ardent spirits, whom they designate as worse than pirates and murderers—"to withhold their feet from their doors"—to treat them as they would "assassins and highway robbers." And Dr. Hewitt, the General Agent of the American Temperance Society—the "Apostle of temperance," as he is termed—recommends to hang all who make, vend, or use ardent spirits. Later writers include all who will not sign the pledge. If Dr. Benton is ignorant of these facts, he is not yet initiated into all the mysteries of this most intemperate combination of combinations. A. B. G.

gravely says one, "have you the authority to fix bounds to the actions of our merchants, and say, 'thus far mayest thou go and no farther?' Must they abandon the dictates of their own consciences and be measured by the standard of yours?"—Reader, is it fixing bounds to a man's actions to refuse to buy what he offers for sale? Must a man trade with every merchant, the rum-selling merchant in particular, to avoid infringing upon his rights and conscience? How many men do you suppose sell rum for conscience' sake? Finally, which most resembles the language, "Stand by thyself, for I am holier than thou," to say to a man, "I cannot conscientiously encourage you in selling ardent spirit; but, wishing to discountenance the traffic, I feel it my duty to patronize your neighbor, who keeps no intoxicating drink to sell, in preference to yourself;" or to say to him, "you a hypocrite, an ultraist, an exclusive, a wiseacre, and a puppet?"

THE DIFFERENCE.....No. V.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

Say what they will to the contrary, the Partialists do hold that our future state depends upon our works in this life. Ask one of them, if a good man will plead his goodness as a title to bliss in heaven, and they say, "by no means, all his goodness is but filthy rags." But ask them again, why any man will be sent to hell? and they make answer, "for his wicked works." Ask them once more, Will any man be saved who has done no good? and they answer, "it is impossible." Now, by all this it is clear, that they hold there is no merit in good works, yet no man can be saved without them, meritorious as they are. And though it is self-evident, that as much may be merited by good works as can be demerited by bad works, yet they hold, in their talk, but not in fact, that though a man cannot merit any thing by good works, yet he can and does demerit endless misery by evil works! What an absurdity!

Universalists have more rational ideas. They hold that good works are highly meritorious, but not that they entitle one to endless felicity. They limit the merit and the reward in exact ratio. And while they do not believe that the sins of a mortal state can involve them in immortal misery, they earnestly believe that every sin will be equitably punished. They hold that immortal bliss will be the unmerited gift of God to all.

DOUBTS.

Messrs. EDITORS—I have been a believer in universal salvation for more than forty years:—but a circumstance has recently taken place in a village not far from where I reside, that would cause any reflecting mind to examine strictly into the truth of the doctrine. The case is this:—

The Presbyterians of the village aforesaid, contrived to make up a donation party, to be held at the residence of their priest. Each member, and as many infidels as they could induce to join their party, [for be it known, that Presbyterian priests will sit down and eat and drink with publicans and sinners—if they can make any thing by it,] should carry provisions for the feast, and presents for the priest and his lady. The party was held—and I am informed, presents to a considerable amount were given to the clergyman and his wife. It should be known, too, that this priest has nobody to support but himself and wife, and receives for that purpose a very liberal salary.

Now, in this same village lives a very poor widow, with two or three children to support. The Winter has been so severe that this poor widow has nearly perished with cold and hunger. Not a cent have these good Presbyterians contributed for the support of this forlorn woman—none but such as these good folks call infidels, have helped the widow and orphan children! In the name of heaven-born charity, what are we to think of such conduct?—Why, I begin to think that such Presbyterians will all go to hell. TOWSEY.

Not so slow, friend Towsey, they are there already, if their practice, (for hell is the only place in the universe where there is no mercy,) their faith, (surely hell is the most orthodox, if endless woe be the true doctrine, for they know its truth,) and their prayers, (for more despairing and agonizing supplications cannot be made any where else,) may be believed. Let us pray, brother, that God may deliver them from it, then will the orphan's tears of joy overflow, and the widow's heart sing for joy—for then will these people be charitable to others, as well as to their preacher—then will they lend to the poor, as well as give to the rich. Oh, God, save them from hardness of heart and hardness of faith! A. B. G.

LETTER TO THE EDITORS.

Mrs. SKINNER AND GROSH—I must be allowed to express the joy I feel at the growing excellence of your paper; for I sincerely think that the present volume transcends any of its predecessors. It contains articles of great value, which go to illustrate and enforce the practical excellencies of the doctrine of impartial grace, and show the "ten thousand ways" in which it should "mix, mingle, and unite" with all the common affairs, and every day duties of life.

The articles in the last volume in vindication of the validity of the Scriptures, are able and good; and what makes them the more valuable to me, is the fact, that they have exerted a salutary influence on the minds of some of my friends who have long been troubled with skeptical habits of thinking. It is truly a source of much joy to me, when I can see anything done for the relief of those unhappy men, who grope their way through life in darkness and doubt; and whose best enjoyments are constantly embittered, with the chilling reflection, that they are every moment liable to be torn from all they hold dear, and be consigned to the cold night of everlasting nonexistence. So deeply distressing is such a state of mind, that some while thus afflicted, have freely declared to me, when conversing on that subject, that their views of the future were not, in their estimation, much, if any better or more comforting, than to believe in endless misery for one's self. I hope that you will republish those articles in a separate work. I should think it would not fail to sell in sufficient numbers to justify the undertaking.

I have within the last year travelled and preached over a great part of Jefferson and Oswego counties, and am happy to say that the good cause is manifestly gaining ground in a two fold sense, in this region; i. e., there is a constant increase of advocates, and the friends of the cause are improving in the purity of their moral conduct, and in the cultivation of that spirit of pure devotion which the doctrine of the illimitable goodness of our heavenly Father is so eminently calculated to inspire.

BRIEF DIALOGUES.....No. IV.

BY REV. GEORGE SANDERSON.

DEMONOLOGY.

Partialist. Since I was here, last evening, I have found a number of passages, in the Scriptures, which tell of fallen angels—I cannot give up the Scriptures, because some of their doctrines are unaccountable to my mind.

Universalist. Then you admit the doctrine of fallen angels to be inexplicable! If the Scriptures cannot be understood, they might as well be written in an unknown tongue. Whatever of Scripture you quote on this subject, I think it can be made to appear intelligible.

P. It is reported of the Universalists, that they pervert the Scriptures, selecting passages at random, and do not take a whole chapter, or several verses; I know not how true this is; but here is a passage which is understood to teach, that angels fell. Isa. xiv: 12—"How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning." Lucifer is only another name for the devil; he must have been in heaven, or he could not have fallen from there.

U. How do you know Lucifer is another name for the devil?

P. It is so understood.

U. Singular authority, truly. Who understood it so, but Milton—the author of this creature of the imagination? Let us see whether we understand Scripture by isolated passages. Had you quoted the whole of your passage, one of your statements, viz., that the devil was cast down to hell, would have been exploded. The passage continues thus "how art thou cut down to the ground," not to hell, "which didst weaken the nations," this was his offence, but you say he rebelled in heaven.

P. But how could he have fallen from heaven, if he had not been there?

U. He could not—but what heaven was he in?

P. There cannot be but one heaven.

U. Let us read farther. "For thou (Lucifer) hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven." It appears then, that he ascended into heaven first. Where was he previous to his ascension, and when he said, "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God"—"I will be like the Most High"?

P. I had not observed that.

U. The prophet adds, "Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit"—consequently it had not then taken place.

P. Must we not make some allowance for the manner of expression, since it is prophetic?

U. Yes; and because it is prophetic, it cannot relate to the past. There is no doubt that this language is highly figurative. If you will, at your leisure, read the whole chapter, you will see that the king of Babylon is referred to. He is represented as a haughty monarch, full of pride and ambition; so much so as to say in his heart, "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne," etc. But he was brought down from the height to which his pride had exalted him. The vanquished kings of the nations, are represented as saying to him, after he had fallen, "Art thou also become as weak as we? art thou become like unto us?" verse 10. Others are represented as saying to him, "Is this the man (not angel,) that made the earth (not heaven,) to tremble, that did shake kingdoms?" verse 16. Such conversation as this you cannot suppose took place any where else than on the earth?

P. Still I do not understand how he could have fallen from heaven, if it was the king of Babylon.

U. Heaven must here mean the height to which he had exalted himself.

P. What proof have you of it?

U. No other than similar language, applied in the same way.

P. I recollect no such instances.

U. Jesus says, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shall be thrust down to hell." Luke x: 15. Was Capernaum literally exalted to heaven?

P. I suppose not.

U. Heaven must here mean a state of exaltation, pride, and opulence. As heaven is here used figuratively, so is hell (hades)—which signifies degradation, infamy, and weakness. Capernaum was to be brought down from her exalted condition, to a state of infamy and degradation.

P. Read a little farther, and you will see that Jesus speaks of "satan falling like lightning from heaven." verse 18.

U. This passage had not escaped my notice. We are informed in the commencement of the chapter, that Jesus had commissioned the seventy, to go into every city and preach. After giving them their directions, he mentioned such cities as he foresaw would reject them and the Gospel; among them he mentions Capernaum, and then observes, "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me." verse 16. "The seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name." verse 17. You do not suppose the devils, according to your views, are subject unto the Gospel?

P. I had never supposed they were.

U. Our Saviour then adds, "I beheld satan as lightning fall from heaven," i. e. he foresaw Capernaum, for instance, which was exalted to heaven, fall therefrom; he foresaw that city would reject the seventy and fall. Peter, you recollect, was satan, because he "savored of the things of this world," and such no doubt was Capernaum.

P. Your explanation looks plausible—I do not know but that it is right. Before I go, however, I should like to know, what connexion all this has with the fall of Lucifer.

U. It serves to illustrate his case; Lucifer was exalted to heaven, in the same, or a similar sense that Capernaum was. It was his pride and ambition. In the same way was this haughty king brought down to hell, degradation and reproach.

P. I will confess one thing, that you have an easy method of getting along with your side of the question! I have taken notes of your explanation, and will think of it at my leisure.

U. Truth is much more easily vindicated than error.

LETTER VII.

To Rev. Josiah Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." Rom. xiii: 14.

DEAR SIR—In your attempts "to show" that man's circumstances have entirely changed by the fall of Adam, you next proceed and say—"St. Paul, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, expresses himself on this subject, in the most definite language, 'For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive:' (1 Cor. xv: 21, 22.) In this chapter, the apostle is treating expressly, and exclusively, of the resurrection of the just—of them 'who are fallen asleep in Christ;' therefore, no part of this chapter has any reference to the resurrection of the unjust. This is spoken of and described in other parts of the Bible. That the apostle has reference to the resurrection of the body in the text we have quoted, no one will deny, who examines the chapter candidly. But it is the life of the body that is to be restored at the resurrection; that is temporal life. Yet the life that is to be restored at the resurrection, is the same life that Adam, by transgression, forfeited for himself and all his posterity."

That the apostle, in this chapter, (1 Cor. xv:) is speaking of the resurrection of the dead, is not to be denied. And he lays it down as a truth incontrovertible, that the dead shall rise again; and as evidence conclusive of that truth, he brings forward the fact, that Christ rose from the dead. He argues, that the resurrection from the dead is as certain as the fact of Christ's resurrection. But that the dead, or their bodies, are restored to a temporal life in this resurrection, I deny. And I also deny that this body is to be restored. If this body be restored, as you unfoundedly suggest, then it is raised in "corruption—in dishonor—in weakness—a natural body;" which is directly contrary to the express declarations of the apostle. He declares it shall be raised "in incorruption—in glory—in power—a SPIRITUAL body."

If the body be restored again, a temporal body—or in other words, a "temporal life" be restored, as you vainly state; then, Sir, another temporal death must be a prospective consequence; and this would be directly contrary to the declarations of our Saviour, in speaking of those who should come forth at the resurrection, where he says—"Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels: and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx: 36.

So, Sir, the coming forth of the dead at the resurrection, is the coming forth entirely and totally changed—from corruption to incorruption—from dishonor to glory—from weakness to power—from a natural body to a spiritual body; "for the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." O, how happy the thought! What a pity it is, that you, Elder, or any other man, should be so unhappy as to feel that this glorious change awaits but a favored few. And what a happy thing it is, that believing in the limited resurrection to holiness and consequent happiness, by some, will not cause such partial limitation.

As proof of temporal death being brought into the world by Adam, you introduce the above passage, "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection from the dead." By this you would be understood, that natural death came by reason of Adam's transgression—or by his acts or sinful doings death was caused, or brought into existence; than which nothing can be more wrong. If it were thus, we should be compelled to say, that by man's acts, doings, or agency, "came also the resurrection of the dead," as by the connexion of the passage, we must of necessity say, he also raises himself from the dead. The proposition "by" in the passage, in both cases has the same meaning as in the following language. "The man came from New-York by water, and by water also he returned." It expresses a medium—way or manner; not a cause. And the succeeding part of your quoted passage gives the reason or explanation why death came by man, and the resurrection also—"For (because) as in Adam (i. e. the earthly man) all die, even so, in Christ (i. e. the heavenly man) shall all be made alive." By the word Adam, in this passage, you intend your readers to understand our first parent, and so make all to have died in him, in order that you may introduce your curse upon all. But, Sir, it has no more allusion to Adam in the garden of Eden, than it has to Elder Keyes in Cazenovia. By reference to the literal meaning in its original, you will find it means "earthly—of the earth—or red earth." In this passage it is not translated as it ought to be, to give the plainer meaning of the passage. Readers generally view it as the cognomen of our first father in the garden. In other parts of the chapter you will see sufficient to prove the truth of what I say. Verse 45—"The first man, Adam," (i. e. of the earth,) etc. Here the word is left as in verse 22, and has the same meaning and reference as in verse 47, which says, "The first man of the earth" (the word "is," the translators put in, and I leave it out). So the meaning of the language is—in the earthly man, which is of the dust, we shall all die (or do die); and in the heavenly man we shall all be made alive. "And as we have borne the image of the earthy, (Adam,) we shall also bear the image of the heavenly," (the Lord from heaven)—verse 49. In attentively reading verses 45–49, you cannot resist the conclusion, that the word Adam, in verse 22, ought to read the "earthly man." This being the case, you can find nothing in the chapter alluding to original sin as a curse, covering the whole posterity of our first parents.

You strongly state, in speaking of this chapter, that "the apostle is treating expressly and exclusively of the resurrection of the just." A person fa-familiar with the chapter, and knowing you are a professed teacher of the Scriptures, must be nearly inclined to doubt the honesty of your suggestion. No one can deny but that the apostle believed all to whom he was speaking would be raised, for he says, without excepting any present, verse 51—"Behold I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be CHANGED;" and then goes on to tell what that glorious change shall be. Fuller language he could not have used to embrace all to whom he was speaking, at least; still he was addressing some sinners and unbelievers; for in verse 34, he says, "Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God; I speak this to your shame" (not "to your endless death," Br. K.) He was addressing the Corinthians upon the great change that awaits all mortals in human flesh—the wonder workings of God in the resurrection.

If you confine the resurrection spoken of by the apostle, as you say, to those "who are fallen asleep in Christ," it only applies to those who had previously died; and you, Elder, cannot have any part in the matter. Do you say you are yet to die "in Christ"—or in other words, you "hope" so to die, and thus share in the resurrection "of the just"? What a mysterious, wonder working faith, the Arminian faith must be, thus to be the cause of a resurrection from the dead with the just. Do you suppose the Arminian faith to be the "mystery" the apostle declared and showed, in verse 51, of the chapter in question? Do I not speak with sufficient deference toward an Elder? Then it is because I conceive him to be one of that class of believers, who, not content that God in his own power, way, and time, should save all men from sin, and make them holy and happy; but would fain shut heaven against myriads on myriads, in part better than themselves, and monopolize even the resurrection from the dead, and make it to be a "change" for an Arminian few.

Did I, Sir, advocate a system partial in its application, and by which you would be shut out of heaven and I ushered into it, you might have cause to be displeased; but when you consider, that if I advocate a heaven for myself, I do also for you, nothing but a Pharisaical pride can excite your displeasure. My paper is filled.

LETTER.....No. I.

To Rev. Mr. Smith, Pastor of the Close Communion Baptist Church, at Boston, N. Y.

Br. SMITH—The particular occasion of this epistle, is your treatment of me last evening. My principal reason for writing, rather than seeking an interview with you, is, that should rumour misrepresent the matter of my communication to you, I shall possess the means of satisfactorily correcting such misrepresentation. Should this letter be addressed to you through a public, as well as a private medium, (which may possibly be the case,) it will be mostly on account that the treatment of which I complain, I received in a public meeting.

Am I to conclude that you think you treated me in a gentlemanly, not to say a Christianlike manner, in your remarks last evening, particularly when praying? I say treated me, for though you called no name, though in your description of the individual, you said little or nothing that applied to my case, except that he was a preacher, and had lived in the place about a year, yet your hearers understood you to mean a Universalist preacher, and of course me; and I presume that you will not deny that such was your meaning, any more than you will deny that you alluded to Mr. W, when you thanked God that the influence of one individual, in answer, as you claimed, to the prayers of God's people, had been removed (by his remaining absent from the place, as I understand it, much longer than was expected, and that too, in what you very justly denominated "a mysterious manner").

But to resume the subject. Am I to conclude that you consider it decorous, for a man engaged in the solemnities of devotion, and kneeling before the Majesty of heaven, to accuse another of preaching false doctrine, trying to lead people astray, being opposed to the work of God's spirit? etc. And to do it too, in so arrogant and overbearing a manner, and in the use of such expressions as you did, many of which were mere slang. As a sample, am I to conclude that you suppose it consistent with good-breeding, to represent, in so indirect and insinuating a manner, as you did, an individual as preaching this or that, and then add, "but we know, and God knows, that he is a liar?" (By the way, your supplications were such as I never heard in any man's preaching.) I entreat you for manners' sake, if for nothing more, that when you want to pray for me, as an individual, or to preach about my preaching, you would forbear the use of such language. "Evil communications," says the apostle, "corrupt good manners." If it is necessary to use my name on such occasions, it is at your service.

But you profess to be a Christian. Should you not, then, heed the exhortation of Jesus, "Learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart"? You are a religious teacher. Should you not, then, consider that, "if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his"? But you consider Universalists to be in a great error. Suppose it to be admitted that they are. Know you not that father Paul says, "The servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient; in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves;" etc.? You invoke the judgments of God upon those who differ from you in belief. So did some of Christ's disciples, while under the influence of Judaism in its corrupted state, propose calling down fire from heaven upon a village of the Samaritans. Would it not then, be worth your while to reflect seriously upon the words which our Saviour uttered in reply to their proposal, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of"?

You prayed, respecting the individual you so often alluded to, that God would either convert him, or destroy his influence, or remove him. I assure you, Sir, I have the most unwavering confidence in my heavenly Father, that he will never leave me to become a convert to your creed, much less to your feelings. That I have never been converted, in the sense which that expression usually bears in the Scriptures, you have no more authority to say, than I have to make the same assertion respecting yourself, or any other professed minister of Christ, possessing a good moral character. Should I fall into temptation, and either deny my faith in Christ, or disgrace my profession by immoral conduct, and thus lose my "influence," as you so earnestly prayed that I might, I hope I shall be converted as Peter was, that I may "strengthen my brethren," and in some degree repair the injury which the cause of truth and righteousness, as I deem it, would be likely to sustain by my aberrations.

How long it may be before my heavenly Father will see fit to "remove" me hence, I know not, nor am I in the least anxious about it. This much I can say, however, I would rather go to-morrow, than stay to bring a lasting stain upon the cause which I have espoused. But should I depart to-night, I have not the least idea that my exit will have been hastened, or in any way affected by your prayers.

You perceive I have used "great plainness of speech." I designed so to do. I think the occasion requires it. But far be it from me to return railing for railing. It is utterly inconsistent with my faith, and scarcely less so with my feelings. Be assured, Sir, I harbor towards you nought but the kindest sentiments, predominant among which is a feeling of pity for the man whose religion will allow him to sport thus wantonly with the feelings of others. Often, last evening, did the dying prayer of my crucified Master thrill through my mind, and as often did my heart respond to its melting language, as possessing a peculiar applicancy in the present case, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

I had thought of advertizing, briefly, to one or two other topics, as for example, your frequent misrepresentations of Universalist sentiments, your stories about Universalist ministers, etc.; but I forbear, at least for the present.

Yours, etc.,

JASON LEWIS.

CAUSES OF FANATICISM.

Every age of the world, and every generation of man, has produced fanatics. And it is a question of no ordinary import—What are the causes which impel mankind thus to abandon the dictates of reason for the practice of extravagance which puts them effectually at the mercy of every bold and presumptuous declaimer, by whom they are first driven to desperation, and then to fanaticism?

That these results always have occurred, and that they are daily taking place, will not be questioned by any one, who has cast his eyes over the moving and troubled mass with which he is every where surrounded. He must have seen from time to time, a raving and bewildered enthusiast tossed up from the heaving abyss of intellectual and moral misrule, and who equally degrades himself and abuses his species, by his perverted feelings and his extravagant zeal. A single hour of dispassionate thought would have laid the rising storm of passion, and satisfied the giddy actor—that however unseen by him, there were principles at work which were the remote or immediate causes of all these mighty movements. The development of these causes, will answer the previous question.

An overwhelming majority of the business men in our country, (it is with this class we are principally concerned,) consider religion as a subject altogether out of their sphere of operation. They presume it to be well adapted to the retired and sedentary habits of females, and to the morose and cheerless contemplations of old age; but have no idea that it is suited to the bustling activity of mid-life, where so much of the attention is engrossed by unavoidable cares, or necessary speculations. At the same time, unless absolutely disgusted by some strangely reprehensible form of extravagance, they piously resolve to examine the subject, and to become religious, when they are no longer capable of anything else. Thus overlooking the most important fact in relation to religion—that it was revealed to men for the express purpose of regulating their conduct in all their intercourse with each other; of soothing them under their unavoidable trials and perplexities; and of comforting them in the season of their sorrows.

The first consequence of this important error, is, that these men fill their houses with that species of religious reading, which the habits or the prejudices of their families induce them to prefer. And the women and children are encouraged to attend the meeting, and conform to the worship of that sect which these partialities had pointed out, or whose influence might be most powerful. Not an effort is made to inspire or encourage rational and correct views of the Christian doctrine—that is left to accident and the power of association. And not a thought is thrown away in considering the propriety or impropriety of this course, unless it be of contempt for the whole subject. Such men may be morally upright; they may be in general well informed, and they may be wise in all that appertains to them, except in what concerns religion. But it is not difficult to perceive that, in this important matter, they are mere children. They are utterly indifferent on this subject—and all they do or say in relation to it, is done as a part of their mere business operations, and with a view to a respectable appearance.

Indifference is the parent of inattention—and the remissness it inspires ends in ignorance. When religion is the subject, the evils which ignorance brings upon mankind are great and numerous beyond calculation.

Their first morbid influences are visible in the confused notions which are absurdly mingled in the mind of the individual. He acknowledges the importance of the Gospel, but it exerts no influence over his hopes, or the actions of his life. He protests against the imputation of infidelity, yet talks and acts in a way that convinces all but himself, that he scarcely understands the difference between the skeptic and the Christian.

Such are the men who constitute the fit and proper subjects of fanaticism. A few such, in any given community—especially if they happen to be men of moderate wealth and influence, will render it a suitable theatre for the labors of a religious mountebank. There he may plant his foot, erect his standard, and number the trophies of his power. There he may indulge his taste for vulgarity and blasphemy, with impunity; for they will be regarded as the hallowed instruments of revival operations, because unlike all other devotional exercises. There he may shake the animal passions to their centre, for there are no religious minds to move—and there, too, he may induce the disordered fancy to ascribe its unwanted exercises to the influence of the divine spirit. There midnight uproar will be consecrated as holy vigils—thundering denunciations and personal scandal, as the letting down of the terrors of the Lord—and vulgar stories and impudent assertions will pass for models of sermonizing talent, and chaste and overpowering eloquence.

A reaction of the feelings now takes place in those who had previously given little or no attention to religious subjects. They have now no time, and are permitted no opportunity, for the examination of the Gospel. Its principles are so presented—so carried out and acted upon—as to prevent all calm and dispassionate inquiry, by perpetual appeals to the already excited passions. An imaginary standard of perception and feeling is established as the criterion of Christian experience—and he who cannot bring his own up to its full measure, must exclude himself, or be rejected by the self-erected tribunal of others' views of truth and conscience. Many good and valuable men in other respects, are thus unconsciously coerced into a series of extravagances, of which even themselves would feel ashamed, but for the all-pervading power of fanaticism. At the foundation of all this, lies religious apathy—a cold and heartless indifference, which while it rendered them profoundly ignorant of the nature of the Gospel, prevented that attention to the subject and those investigations which had long since made them both sincere Christians and sober and virtuous men.

A different state of things must exist, in order to make men "wise unto salvation." They must first understand that the Gospel is not a system fostered by ignorance, and sustained by fury: but one of pure morality, founded in reason, revealed from heaven, and adapted to the mental and moral wants of the human race. And when thus presented, it is believed that they will feel an interest in its truth, will examine its doctrines, imbibe its spirit, confide in its promises, cherish its sustaining and consoling hopes, and become, what the fanatic never does—Christians in heart and in life, in practice and in power. And they will then learn, what the enthusiast can never understand—that the causes of fanaticism are always at hand in the religious indifference which too generally prevails, aided by strong imaginations and weak nerves.

REASONS.....NO. VIII.

FOR BELIEVING IN UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

"Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter iii: 15.

3. Of His power. The omnipotence of Jehovah, is, in the abstract, acknowledged by all Christians and by all consistent theists in the world. But very many deny it in the concrete; or if they verbally admit it, they virtually deny it in the deductions they draw, or the conclusions to which they arrive, respecting his moral government. Many who admit the infinity of the divine goodness, and declare that God really desires the salvation of all men, nevertheless maintain that he will never accomplish his desires in this respect, on account of insurmountable obstacles in the way—such as the rebellion, hardness, stubbornness and impenitence of man. It is true, they say he is physically omnipotent—i. e., no power in the physical world, can resist the might of his arm: but in regard to the salvation of man, he has moral beings to deal with—beings endowed with moral agency and freedom of volition, which he cannot consistently control or interfere with. And thus his moral omnipotence is virtually denied.

But we ask—whatever view may be taken of the extent of man's moral powers and freedom of volition—from whence is this moral power—this freedom of volition, derived? Is it not from God? Is there, or can there be any moral power but that which comes from him? And has he imparted a moral power to his creatures which he cannot control? Has he given to man a will beyond the power of his own moral omnipotence? Has there a power emanated and passed from himself which is above himself? It is an axiom that no stream can rise higher than its fountain—that no effect can exceed its cause; and it is utterly impossible for God to impart to others what he does not himself possess, or even a power which is beyond his control. He is not merely the physical governor of the world, but likewise the moral. He reigns not only in heaven, but over the armies of heaven; not only on the earth, but among the inhabitants of the earth, doing all his pleasure, and none can stay his hand. Hence, as his wisdom is adequate to contrive the plan, and his unbounded goodness prompts him to desire and seek the ultimate, universal and eternal happiness of man, his moral omnipotence will ultimately secure the object desired. In his own time and way he will turn the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned: and in the day of his power his people shall surely be made willing—their wills shall be subject to his will, and God shall be "all in all."

4. Of his holiness. "Be ye holy, for I am holy, saith the Lord." Because God is holy and happy, he requires mankind to be holy that they also may be happy. We are aware that some of the opposers of the doctrine of universal salvation, have undertaken to disprove this doctrine by the idea of the holiness of God. "Ah," say they, "your doctrine might be true if it were not for the holiness of God—you forget that he is a holy, as well as a wise, benevolent and powerful God. As he is perfectly holy he can never consent to admit sinners into heaven—no unclean thing can ever enter there." What is this but a base perversion of our sentiments, an entire evasion of our arguments under this head, and the most obvious and gross sophistry imaginable! as though we believed heaven were a place merely, without regard to state; and a place too, where unholiness dwells, and sinners, as such, were freely admitted! than which nothing can be farther from our sentiments.

Heaven is a state of perfect holiness, as well as perfect happiness: and salvation implies deliverance, not merely from misery, but from sin, the cause of misery. When, therefore, we argue the salvation of all men, on the ground of the perfect holiness of God, it is on the unavoidable supposition that because he is holy, he requires mankind to be so likewise, and will employ every necessary means to make them so. But it must be a strange sort of logic, and that mind must be strangely bewildered that could assert, that because God is holy, he will forever prevent his children from becoming so—that because he is holy, he will confirm them in endless unholiness, and eternally preclude the possibility of their becoming like him. And this certainly is the result of the doctrine we are now opposing. We are required to be imitators of God—to be followers of God—to be like him, etc. And will he ever change or cease to require this of any of his children? Certainly not. Then he will never place them in a condition to prevent their becoming holy; but will continue the employment of such means as he sees will prove efficacious in bringing them to the participation of that holiness which he requires of them, and which will harmonize with his own nature, and those means will be effectual.

5. Of his mercy. It has been shown in a former number—and we presume no one will question the fact in so many words—that the mercy of God is infinite, universal and changeless. The mercy of God is often made the burden of the songs of the inspired writers. They often sing of his loving kindness and his tender mercy in strains of sublimest rapture. The royal Psalmist, in one of his devotional psalms, ends every verse with this emphatic declaration, "For his mercy endureth forever." We nowhere read in the Bible of the anger of the Lord's enduring forever: but on the contrary, we read that "his anger endureth but for a moment; in his favor is life."

Now God has given to all mankind the love of happiness, a strong and irrepressible desire for the immortal joys of his heavenly kingdom. And the question occurs, could he have imparted to all our race this strong and ardent desire, with the determination or intention never to gratify, but eternally to thwart it? And when he has it in his power to bestow the much desired boon, will he forever mock his children, in their wants, and withhold what all desire? When they ask bread, will he give them a stone? When they ask a fish, will he give them a serpent? When they ask an egg, will he give them a scorpion? Impossible. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. Yea, the Son of God came to seek and to save that which was lost." And "after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour, toward man, appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the holy spirit; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." As he is "a God, full of compassion and gracious, long suffering and plenteous in mercy and truth," "he will fulfil the desire of them that fear him: he also will hear their cry and will save them." The desires of all righteous and good people are, that God would have mercy upon a sinful world, and save it from darkness, sin and death: and the desire of the righteous shall be given them: God will not be less merciful to any than they are to each other. Therefore the infinite and changeless mercy of God furnishes a strong and incontrovertible argument in favor of universal salvation. D. S.

SCRIPTURAL INTERPRETER.

I SAMUEL xxxi: 4, 5; II SAMUEL i: 10; ROMANS viii: 26; AND HEBREWS vi: 1, 2.

This is quite a list of texts, but as the various inquiries which have turned my attention to them demand but brief answers, I will embrace the whole in the present article.

Br. S. wishes to know how to reconcile the contradictory accounts in 1 Samuel xxxi: 4, 5, and 2 Samuel i: 10. No reconciliation is necessary. The contradiction is between the lying Amalekite, (who wished to persuade David that he had slain Saul, David's enemy, hoping that David would reward him for the act,) and the truth-telling historian. Of course, I disbelieve the Amalekite, and believe the historian.

Br. H. B. F. asks an explanation of the word "spirit," in Romans viii: 26. Three spirits are spoken of in the chapter—the spirit of God, the spirit of Christ, and the spirit of man. There is an agreement between the three in an enlightened or renewed man. This agreement consists in the "hope, that the creation [creature] itself, also, shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." This spirit of universal benevolence, (or desire for universal holiness,) which God has given us, teaches us to pray as we ought, (viz., for all men,) thus helping our infirmity of mind to a result, which otherwise we might never arrive at. This same spirit of universal benevolence, or hope of the deliverance of the creation, also makes intercession for, or leads us to, our own deliverance from the bondage under which we labor with secret (or unuttered) groanings.

That the spirit is not the spirit of God, is evident in that, it is clearly distinguished from him—from "the Searcher of hearts." The explanation here given, also agrees with 1 Tim. ii: 1-5, where we are commanded to pray for all men, and where the effect of such prayers, made "without wrath and doubting," is declared to be our leading "quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty." It also agrees with the facts, that the spirit of every regenerated man does desire universal holiness and happiness—that such intercession is "according to the will of God"—and that the indulgence of such a spirit and its intercession does lead to such results.

The passage is considered an obscure or difficult one, but by comparing scripture with scripture, I think the above is its meaning. This will appear more clearly, by substituting "it" for "he," as the pronoun for the noun "spirit"—as is done by Wakefield and others.

Br. C. S., of Margareta, Ohio, requests an explanation of Hebrews vi: 1, 2. The difficulty is probably in understanding the phrase, "eternal judgment." The term judgment bears all meanings between a simple decision up to government, including all the acts of a judge or ruler. If the phrase refers to the government of God, that of course is endless—if to that of the Messiah, it may well be termed "eternal," seeing it embraces the whole dispensation of the fulness of times, and will endure till he shall have reconciled the universe to God. The doctrines here named were held, generally, by Jews and Christians. They were the first doctrines inculcated in teaching that Jesus was the Messiah. Hence the exhortation to leave them and go on to others, that religious instruction might be perfect. For a somewhat different view, see Puig's Selections, pp. 250-254.

QUERY.—If, as Partialists generally suppose, it refers to the act of sentencing a part of mankind to endless woe, at the end of time, why is it called "eternal judgment?" It will last only a day! A. B. G.

P. S. Br. J. D. H. will find an explanation of the first chapters of Job in Balfour's Second Inquiry, pp. 44-61 and 331. By "Sons of God" is probably meant the "chief" or "great men," as by "river of God" is meant "great river," etc. Should the explanation here referred to not give him full satisfaction, I will endeavor to give further needed information at some future time. A. B. G.

CHURCH.

This one word is commonly used at the present day, as a representative for five different things. It is sometimes very difficult to tell "in whose name" it speaks. It means according to modern usage, 1. A meeting-house. 2. The communicants—in distinction from the rest of a congregation. 3. The congregation—(its primitive meaning.) 4. The denomination. 5. The great body of all denominations of Christians. To these another might be added, embracing all men—the redeemed. What perspicuity is thus obtained in our language! Take the following as an example.

"Enter almost any church, and you will find that the great body of the church is not embraced in the church. For in how many churches is it the case, in all their churches, that the greatest part of their churches usually assembling in their churches are actually excluded from their churches. Yet such churches profess to belong to the church!"

Confusion worse confounded! the reader is ready to exclaim—yet I have only used the words church and churches according to the above common definitions. This will be rendered evident by the following translation:—"Enter almost any meeting-house, and you will find that the great body of the congregation is not embraced among the communicants. For in how many denominations is it the case, in all their bodies of communicants, that the greatest part of their congregations usually assembling in their meeting-houses are actually excluded from their communicants. Yet such denominations profess to belong to the body of Christ!"

Br. Editors—let us so use the word as to make it mean something—for now it means so much that it actually has no meaning! A. B. G.

SOMETHING NEW UNDER THE SUN.

A worthy and active agent in Ohio—I omit names and places for obvious reasons—sends us the name of a Presbyterian clergyman as a subscriber to the present volume. He is said to be a very amiable man, who never would go to hear a Universalist preach until last Fall. We trust he will candidly and fully make himself acquainted with our sentiments, in order that, if convinced of their truth, he may understandingly advocate them—or, if not convinced, that he may give a reason for opposing, not what is not Universalism, but Universalism itself. Such opponents are worthy of esteem and confidence—such accessions are valuable. Are there no others to follow this reverend brother's example? Surely it is time for our opposers to awake and prepare themselves for the task of proving all things, and holding fast that which is good. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Br. Lewis' articles are accepted, but may not all appear soon. "Brief Criticisms," "The Infidel Husband," L. L. S.'s anecdote, do. by J. F., are "laid up for a rainy day," as we are apt to "run out of" such articles in the Spring. If the authors wish them to appear sooner, they will be inserted earlier. Virgo, Brs. J. M. Austin, A. H. Curtis, Dr. A. W. Benton, A. C. and A. R. Gardner, are welcome, and will soon appear. We hampered ourselves by a miscalculation, or some of them should have appeared sooner. M. S.'s article will be copied as soon as we have room. Brs. C. Spear, Sanderson and S. W. Fuller, will see that we have got nearly "out of" their budgets. If the latter cannot send us "differences" in which we agree, why 'e'en let him send us agreements in which we do not differ.

If Br. A. T., of Southville, will designate the portions, on which he founds his rebuke, I will either explain or retract. But as it is, I am perfectly unconscious of wrong doing, in thought, word or deed on that subject. As to "A Looker On," I have his word that he is not a Universalist in faith. As to the evils complained of in his communication, let my advice in that very article be followed—let the guilty be rebuked—and more good will be effected than can be done by charging the innocent and sincere with them.

TO READERS.

I had designed commencing the second quarter of the volume with Br. Austin's "Reminiscence," (a prize article,)—but designing at the same time to print it in pamphlet form as a cheap tract for distribution, and, for various reasons, being unable to do this at present, I have deferred its insertion in the paper. I would regret this brief delay, were I not satisfied that our numerous and excellent correspondents will prevent you from regretting it.

The attention of societies is invited to the articles by Apollos—they are the result of some experience and much study, both in matter and style. A. B. G.

FALSE REPORT.—The Br. who so kindly states that we have already lost fifteen hundred subscribers, is informed that he may now cease the report. We have the evidence of an honorably increased list that we have not so rapidly lost public confidence—and the approbation of our own consciences, and the testimony of more than thirty ministering brethren, besides that of numerous lay brethren, that we have not deserved to lose it. Few publishers have labored harder than we have done, since August last—not merely to increase our subscription list—but to secure such good and numerous correspondents, and otherwise to improve the paper, as to deserve an increased list. If we do not continue to deserve it, it shall not be our fault, but our misfortune.

ECCLESIASTICAL FUNDS.

Br. G. Rogers proposes that the General Convention take the publishing of our hymn book into hand, and from it raise a fund for various purposes. I say no. Let us be wise, and keep our ecclesiastical bodies free from money matters, if we do not want corruption, waste, and despotism among us. Such a fund would destroy all individual energy, competition, and freedom. And where will it end? The Methodist Book Concern began very humbly—and what is it worth now? No one, except its few well-paid managers can tell. Probably $3,600,000—perhaps $10,000,000—perhaps more. And when a widow, or a preacher, or a number of its preachers, or of its societies, stand in its way, what are they before it? Chaff before a tornado! Better a hundred different hymn books at any price, than have such a mammoth among us, regulating our wages, dictating our sermons, and breaking down our publishers. A. B. G.

NOTICE.

All persons indebted for former volumes of this paper, are requested to make immediate payment of the balance due from them respectively, either to me personally, or to the authorized agents for this paper in their respective neighborhoods, or to Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, the present publishers. Having ceased to be the publisher, I wish to close up all outstanding and unsettled accounts as early as possible. And this request must be attended to by those especially who have discontinued taking the paper. Former and present agents are especially requested to look to such accounts. Notes of any size, from ones upward, on any solvent and good banks in the United States, will be received in payment of arrears—or bills of exchange, or drafts payable to my order, on any responsible merchants, or other good houses in this city or New-York. And such can generally be procured of any merchants in any place who do business in New-York. In such drafts, the exact amount to a penny can be sent, and there is then no risk of loss by mail.

From the Western Review, March 1831.

THE ADVANTAGES OF WORKS OF MORAL FICTION.

The most interesting analogies of nature are in favor of the pleasure derived from the charms of fictitious writing. What more splendid picture can be found in the world of fancy, than that which is presented by the thousand hues of an autumnal evening sky! Was the pencil that painted the clouds employed in levity and sin? Who sprinkled such exquisite colors upon the plumage of birds? Who poured fragrance and beauty over the fields and the groves? Who dyed the rose and the violet, and pencilled the carnation and the lily? Before the surly nakedness of the fanatic can be defended as the taste of the Deity, the face of creation must change, and all that now gratifies the senses and the mind, must be converted into flatness and stupidity. If the Author of nature chooses to dress his works in brilliancy, his servants may be allowed to follow his example, without the charge of heresy or impiety. The flowers of the meadows are as wicked in their ornaments as young men and young women are in theirs. Lambs that skip on the hills, are as irreligious in their redundancy of spirits, as a choir of dancing youths, in their liberality, activity and grace. A peacock is the concentration of all that depravity which consists in colors, proportion and elegance. It is astonishing that the Controller of all things should permit such a piece of ostentation to live. A "true blue," ought to shoot every beautiful bird that he sees, pull up every brilliant and fragrant flower, throw ink over all the golden hues of evening, and put a Quaker's drab suit upon every form of nature. A Shaker, too, who means to be consistent throughout, should preach his doctrine against marriage, not only to men and women, but to all the males and females among the domestic animals about his house, and to all the stamens and pistils of the vegetables that he raises. He should eat no mutton and beef, for these are the fruit of the violation of those rules which he holds sacred; and even his eggs, his chickens and his bread, are produced by conformity to those wicked laws of nature which are prohibited to the Shaker saint. Even water contains animal life, and is therefore impious in its character, and should not be drank by a Shaker.

This nonsense, however, is not confined to professed simpletons. All sorts and degrees of artificial religionists are, so far as their artificial faith is concerned, essentially absurd and perverse. The peculiar glory of the sound philosophy of Newton, Bacon, Locke, Smith and Stewart, is this leading principle, "FOLLOW NATURE." A great object of present learning and science, is to drop the artificial measures and institutions by which the operations of nature have been so long embarrassed, and to give to the organization and tendency of the system of things fair play. Medicine, politics, ethics, religion, are equally benefited by this mode of investigation and of action. It would not be more absurd to breakfast, dine and sup on drugs and medicines, for the promotion of health, than it is to make war upon nature for the improvement of government and the welfare of the soul. The maxim is not indeed to follow nature without cultivating it, but it is to make the cultivation blend with and promote the original object or purpose of nature. Narrow-minded persons are constantly proposing and urging measures which interfere with the natural course of things, and which are excessively troublesome and offensive. Such artificial and false views are exposed with great efficacy, in the best works of moral fiction, and are held up to public censure in a manner too striking to be disregarded or forgotten. The immense variety of able books in this class, and for this end, may well excite our gratitude, while they aid in reforming our creeds and our policy.

The language of genius, taste and sentiment, in this form, to a greater extent than in any other, enlivens, refines and diversifies conversation. It warms the heart, excites the sympathies, expands the understanding, and elevates the principles of the human race. Poetry and novels ought especially to be read by old people, and by all such as are in danger of losing their interest in the persons and affairs of the society about them. This kind of reading renews youth and all the more generous and amiable affections. It is a corrector of selfishness and spleen, and offers a mirror to the fancy of each individual, in which he may discover his true likeness. All the virtues, especially the social and domestic virtues, are called out and strengthened. As it regards the common objection, that this kind of reading unfits the mind for severe study, and prevents a good education, it is easily answered. The objection rests upon the idea, that novels principally are read, and read excessively. The higher and stronger poets are forgotten; works which constitute a well known part of the severe discipline of a classical and thorough education. This essay is not intended, and any reader must be very stupid who thinks it is intended, to recommend an excessive or indiscriminate perusal of works of moral fiction. This kind of literature is to be mingled with other kinds in its just proportion, and is to receive only its due regard. There is no more difficulty in accomplishing this, than there is in accomplishing any good and important object. Abuses are not vindicated, nor are they permitted, or presumed to be permitted, in this dissertation, to be substituted for uses, and then the whole subject to be placed under sentence of condemnation. The doctrine of this article is to be taken just as it is, and not for what a perverse opponent may choose to make it by a false construction, or a malicious interpretation according to his own prejudices. The doctrine is, that works of moral fiction, when mingled with other works, and when selected with ordinary judgment, constitute a very excellent and useful part of education and enjoyment, and afford a suitable excitement and recreation for the mind, by which its powers and affections are invigorated, exalted, refined, and in all respects improved. Our sympathies need cultivation as much as our intellects. Indeed, the well known tendency of business, and of the competitions of life, to harden the heart and to nurse selfishness, shows the peculiar utility and importance of reading works of moral fiction as a countervailing influence. Avaricious and morose people should be especially urged to this course of reading: and those who have not formed their characters, should attend to it as a precaution against sourness and contraction. The education of many minds, within our knowledge, has been so conducted as to blend, with the happiest effect, the influence of this class of works with the more sober and calculating spirit of severer studies. Wherever the case is otherwise, there has been some fault on the part of the parent or instructors, or some peculiarly unhappy combination of circumstances as it regards the pupil.

One of the great advantages of works of moral fiction is their tendency to extend and improve the imagination, a department of the mind which is of the first importance, whether we consider its nature and uses in reference to intellectual, or to moral greatness. This view of our subject is ordinarily very much undervalued. The imagination is often represented as a trifling faculty, as intended only to amuse and cajole, as fit for none but poets, painters and deceivers. A thorough attention to the nature of the mind and a full knowledge of its most honorable and useful achievements, are necessary to point out the real value of the imagination. So far from being a trifling faculty, or a mere instrument of sporting and deluding, it is employed in the most important operations of the mind in regard to the future, and is essential to the illustration of truth and to the exercise of the great and disinterested virtues. It is by the power of imagination, by the lively pictures of this faculty, that our sensibility is awakened with respect to scenes not present, and that rewards for good deeds, and punishments for bad, when retribution is far removed into time before us, have their peculiar influence in exciting to virtue or deterring from vice. Imagination is necessary to science, to literary cultivation, to political economy, to oratory, and to all the arts, and to religion itself. Without imagination to lead the mind forward in the course of discovery from one phenomenon to another, and from analogy to analogy, how could physical knowledge have advanced as it has done since the days of D'Alembert and Bacon? How could Newton have ascertained those universal laws of nature by which it is now known that the whole planetary system is governed? How could Burke have predicted the effects of revolutionary principles begun in his day, and developed in ours? How could the results of the past be applied to the future? How could even our holy religion make its promises support and animate the soul? Take away imagination, and what have you left, upon which illustrations of things not seen, and hopes of glories yet to come, are to be founded? Take away imagination, and how can the mind ascend from this world to the next, from the society and events of time, to the society and events of eternity? Induction, analogy, the glow of moral sentiment, the animation of feeling, the aspirations of magnanimity, the rewards of present sacrifices and disinterestedness, the promises and pictures of the heavenly world, all demand the most interesting and constant services of imagination. This faculty improves all the virtues, and elevates all the intellectual and moral powers. The strongest men have it most; the best men know its value, and the worst men cherish it least. To the bad, it is incessant torment. The cold and selfish hate it, for it is their enemy. The benevolent and magnanimous are its favorites, and it multiplies all their rewards and future triumphs.

For the cure of narrowness, selfishness and prejudice, two methods may be pointed out. The first is, "travel." The second, "read well chosen works of moral fiction."

MARRIAGES.

In New-Berlin, March 24th, by Rev. W. Bullard, Rev. W. M. DELONG, to Miss MARTHA ASHCRAFT, of Hartwick.

In Pratt's Hollow, March 2, by Rev. A. Dinsmore, Mr. HETZERIAH GATES, to Miss CAROLINE CLARK. Mr.

BENJAMIN J. SPRING, to Miss SOPHRONIA STEBBINS. And Mr. WILLIAM NASH, to Miss LYDIA VINCENT.

Also, at Morrisville, March 3, by the same, Mr. NORMAN F. MATTESON, to Miss JANE BOWERS.

In Canaan, October 14, 1835, by Rev. J. H. Sandford, Mr. EDWARD VERY, to Miss SUSAN H. FISH, both of Belfast.

In Watertown, on the 8th of February, by Rev. P. Morse, Capt. COMFORT WASHINGTON ALLEN, of Parish, Oswego county, to Miss HANNAH MEHITABEL HENDERSON, of Champion.

DEATHS.

At Clockville, Madison county, on February 4, of consumption, Miss MARY L. BLAIR, aged 17 years. Amiable in life, resigned in death, she gave the world another striking proof, that while the soul-ennobling faith of a world's salvation leads the living in the path of virtue, it enables the dying to triumph in death. May her surviving widowed mother, and brothers, consider that although their loss is irretrievable, her gain is incomparable. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer, on Monday following, to the mourners and to an unusually large concourse of people. W. BULLARD.

In Upper Lisle, Broome county, on February 7, Miss CHLOE DAINS, aged 30 years, after enduring a lingering consumption for eleven years.

Although I do not consider it positive proof of the truth of any doctrine that its believers can rejoice in their dying hour, yet it is truly gratifying when the dying can, like sister Dains, receive death as the visitation of our heavenly Father. More composure and peace I never witnessed than she manifested. The funeral was attended on the 9th February, and the consolations of the Gospel offered to the afflicted mourners from Heb. ii: 14, 15.

C. S. BROWN.

At Sandy Hill, on the 13th of February ult, Miss DOROTHY T., daughter of Mr. Jonas Lamsen, aged 25. We enjoyed the happiness of an acquaintance with the amiable subject of this notice while living. The following is but a well deserved tribute to her memory, which we cut from the Sandy Hill Herald. "She was the idol of many and the friend of all. None knew her but to admire her goodness, none mentioned her but to exalt her virtues." "Her death will be universally lamented, for envy or malice never exerted their power to claim her as a victim." She died in the full possession of her mental faculties, and calmly leaning upon the "Saviour of all," and the promise of a Father's grace, she met the king of terrors without a murmur or a fear. Deeply, very deeply, do we sympathize with the parents, and relatives, and friends of the deceased, and fervently do we pray that the rich consolations of the Gospel of peace may be theirs.—Union.

UNIVERSALIST REGISTER FOR 1837.

The publishers wish to receive full and correct information respecting all societies, preachers, Conventions, and Associations in the order—the names, number of members, increase or diminution etc. of societies—residence etc. of preachers in fellowship with the Associations, and Standing Clerk's address of each—and the boundaries and number of Associations in fellowship with the Conventions.

Ministering brethren in particular will please communicate all the information they deem useful for the work—especially all the corrections they can make of the number for the present year.

To the Standing Clerks of Associations and Conventions we also appeal for the information they can give us respecting these bodies.

It is hoped that no one will withhold any corrections necessary, that the work may be made as perfect as the nature of it will admit.

In order to get it early to press, we must particularly request all returns of information to be made to us early in June next.

For the Magazine and Advocate. TWO EVILS.

BY REV. HOSEA BAILLOU.

"For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." Jer. ii: 13.

At first view, this language would seem to convey an idea, that the prophet entertained a very favorable opinion of the people whose character he was authorized to describe; for a people to stand before God, having the stain of but two wrongs on their character, must, at first thought, be a remarkable circumstance, and one not a little commendatory. And who would wonder if this recommendation had been the real intention of the divine declaration? God was not speaking of the wicked Gentile idolaters; but of his own people. It is generally believed that the Lord's people are far better than those who are called the world's people.

Before we allow ourselves entire confidence in the opinion, that the people of God, of whom our text speaks, were much better than the rest of the world, it may be proper to inquire something concerning the two evils, which they had committed. If, on examination, we find these evils to be very small, and of a venial character, we may then feel some confidence in the belief, that God's people were better than the rest of the world; and then we can mingle our views with our pious neighbors, who very much love to dwell on the subject of the righteous and the wicked; the people of God and the people of the world; and of the two classes of mankind. The following are the two specifications:—They had forsaken God, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns that could hold no water. These specifications, though but two, are really of a startling character. As all goodness is of God, a people must have forsaken all goodness who had forsaken him. This looks very dark! How is it with the other? Horrible to relate! It represents them in pursuit of enjoyments in evil only. Was there ever a people more wicked, more involved in sin? And is this the people whom God called his own? Is there here no mistake? Were God's people the most perverse in the world? "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken: I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." Isa. i: 2, 3. "As I live, saith the Lord, Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters. Neither hath Samaria committed half thy sins; but thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they." Ezek. xvi: 48, 51. Such is the language in which God spake of his people; and such was their character and conduct.

Having such a scene of depravity before our eyes, and looking on a people in so foul a condition of sin, the least emotions of humanity or compassion would induce us to inquire, if such sinfulness can be washed away? To this question the following is a very ample reply: "Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes: cease to do evil: learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord. Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Isa. i: 16-18. In the light of this divine truth who need to despair of the favor of our heavenly Father? If the worst, the most sinful people who ever lived were acknowledged by God himself to be his people; and if he has condescended to assure such that their sins, though of the deepest dye, should be made white, whom will he cast off forever? On whom is it inconsistent for him to have compassion?

The figure used in our text to represent the wicked works of God's people, very justly represents the character of false doctrines, and the wrong doings of the sinful of all nations and all ages. Look at that doctrine, which has for ages been idolized and believed by the Christian church, which teaches that our heavenly Father, from all eternity, predestinated some of the human family to a state of perfect and endless felicity; but the most of our race to a state of endless woe. We would not impose on any one so much as to ask him to prove such a doctrine, either by Scripture or reason; but we would respectfully ask the reverend divine, who thinks this cistern is a sound one, and that it will hold water, whether he therein finds that water, of which Jesus spake to the woman at the well, as follows: "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life"? Ask him if in that doctrine he enjoys a feast of fat things, of wines on the lees well refined? Ask him if he has never discovered the leak in his cistern through which his comforts all escape? Does he know that he is one of the elected to everlasting life? No; he is never quite certain of this important fact. This is a breach indeed! A broken cistern this. It can hold no water. But he hopes he is born again; that he is regenerated; and if he is, he feels confident. If he is! Does he know this for a certainty? This he does not pretend. Here then is a leak, through which his comforts escape. But suppose, by some possible means, these several leaks could be stopped, is he sure that those, who are as dear to him as his own existence, are all elected to everlasting life? No; and here he ponders in soliloquy, "Must I forever look down from the bowers of divine repose, and see her whom I have loved, who is the mother of my children in the realms of endless despair? Must I spend eternity a witness of the everlasting sufferings of my own offspring?" Who can describe the anguish of that heart, which thus longs for the water, the water of everlasting life, but lo! his cistern can hold no water!

If the foregoing describes a cistern which is now generally abandoned, shall we try another, which is hewn out by those doctors, who esteem themselves more expert than the former? Shall we seek for living waters in that doctrine, which makes the favor of God, and the future, eternal state to depend on the use we make of our free agency? We may arrive at all the information, respecting this cistern, which we need, by inquiring of those who have hewn it out,—Do they feel certain, that the use which they will make of their free agency, will be such as to secure to them the divine favor and immortal bliss? By no means. But were it possible to stop this leak, are they certain that all those, in whose welfare they are so deeply interested, will make this good use of their free agency, and with them enjoy this state of everlasting felicity? By no means. Then this cistern is as broken as the other. It can hold no water.

Let it be proclaimed unto all people, that they are invited to return to God, the fountain of living waters. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money: come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price. Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not? Harken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness." Isa. lv: 1, 2. Of God, the fountain of living waters, we have the following testimony: "Who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth—who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." 1 Tim. ii: 4; Eph. i: 11.

Before this communication is closed, the writer would, with a most sincere good will, whisper a word in the ears of all, who are so unhappy as to have forsaken God and his commandments; and are endeavoring to find enjoyment in the paths of wickedness and vice; to such he would say, you are hewing out to yourselves cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water. Let each one put the question to his own conscience, Have any of the views I have practiced yielded me real enjoyment? As he must answer this question in the negative, let him listen to the language of our Father in heaven: "Son, give me thine heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways." "Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled, forsake the foolish and live; and go in the way of understanding."

"HOW DID YOUR GOD ORIGINATE?"

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

The above is the favorite and stereotyped inquiry of the atheist. When driven by the strong force of clear reason from every other contested point, he retreats behind this question, as to an impregnable redoubt, from the shelter of which he can dart his poisoned arrows of skepticism at the unwary and thoughtless. To people unused to deep reflection or metaphysical reasoning, and especially to the youthful mind, which seldom looks beneath the surface of things, this question sometimes appears to possess great weight. And I have no doubt, that in consequence of not being able to return a definite answer—one which would even satisfy themselves—many, very many, have been driven into the bewildering mazes of gloomy atheism. I design in the present article, briefly to examine this subject.

The candid, unbiassed mind, under the influence of enlightened reason, can discover numerous and satisfactory evidences of the existence of a God. There is a concise and plain process of reasoning, which, to my mind, will abundantly establish this important truth. It is this:—A being or power cannot impart to a created object, any principle, faculty or power, which himself or itself does not possess. This proposition is self-evident. Apply it to the human body. Man possesses the principle of life, the power of motion, and the faculty of thought, or mind. That these powers and faculties are not inherent properties of the matter composing the human body, is evident from the fact, that they all, sooner or later, depart and leave the body in that state termed death—which, indeed, is merely a destitution of these powers. Here, then, are the three properties of life, motion and mind, superadded to the matter which forms our bodies. Now in accordance with the proposition above recorded, it is clearly evident that the great First Cause of our existence, must also possess life, motion and mind, or it could not have bestowed these properties upon us! And that First Cause which possesses these powers, and all those other characteristics that are susceptible of proof equally as convincing, we adore and worship as God.

Thus far we can proceed with the utmost assurance and certainty. By this plain a posteriori argument, the existence of an intelligent Deity, is proved as distinctly and conclusively, to my apprehension, as the simplest mathematical question can be demonstrated. This is as far, in this state of existence, as we can go—as high on the vast scale of causes, as we can now ascend. Our present circumscribed capacities cannot grasp the subject to a greater extent. The pinions of reason, after soaring with unerring precision up to the full recognizance of the existence of God, there tire and fail! Nearer to the Fountain of infinite perfection our minds cannot arise, while chained to the imperfect organs of this frail body. But what shall we do in this case? Because our reason is not absolutely infinite, and therefore cannot scan infinity, shall we cast it aside entirely, and declare its dictates all unworthy our confidence? Because we cannot understand how the existence of Deity originated, shall we disregard all those evidences in earth, and seas, and skies, which proclaim in the voice of reason and truth, that he does exist? Such a course would be unworthy a rational being. Upon the same principle, the school boy because he cannot solve a problem in Euclid, might deny the simple proposition that “two and two make four.”—His teacher would properly instruct him, that his not understanding the higher rules of mathematics, is no reason why he should doubt the correctness of those rules which he does understand. And I repeat, that our ignorance of the origin of God's existence, cannot in the remotest degree, affect those numerous evidences which are conclusive of the reality of his existence. Do we understand how the sun was created? how the different rays and colors of light are formed and so beautifully blended together? or how those eternal sources are fed, which flood the earth with light and warmth and beauty? No—no—none of these things do we understand. Now I insist that a man could, with the same propriety, go out into the broad glare of the mid-day sun, and while its rays were pouring into his eyes with blinding intensity, contend that there is no such a thing as light, because he cannot understand the manner in which the sun is formed, as to declare in face of the unnumbered evidences which abound, that no such a being as God exists, because we cannot comprehend his origin.

But how does the atheist propose to relieve us of this difficulty? Only by involving us in one infinitely more incomprehensible! He informs us that all beings and objects are formed by the fortuitous combination of atoms, or that they are the result of the operation of the laws of nature; and that these laws of nature have been in existence and operation from eternity. But we inquire how these laws could have been in being from eternity? how they could have originated in the first place? how matter could have formed and ushered itself into being, or how it could have been in existence at all without being formed? or how it could originate and bestow upon itself laws for its own operation and government? Can he answer these questions? He cannot—they relate to subjects entirely beyond his comprehension. The truth is, the atheist is precisely as much at a loss to account for the origin of all things, upon his own theory, as we are to account for the origin of God. He obtains not the least advantage in this respect, in adopting his atheistical sentiments. And if he rejects theistical principles because we cannot tell him how God originated; he is bound by the same rule to abandon atheism because he cannot inform us how his eternal laws originated and obtained their power! But the atheist has an additional difficulty to encounter. To support his theories, he must contend for known impossibilities—he must maintain principles that are in direct opposition to the operation of those very laws of nature, which he believes control all things. He must contend that dead, inert matter, has the power to impart life, sensation and motion—that blind, dormant, senseless matter, has the ability to create thought, reason, judgment, or his scheme entirely fails. And yet these are palpable impossibilities—absurd violations of every impulse of nature's laws!

I readily admit, that to our minds, the origin of God is an unfathomable mystery; and as I have already intimated, we cannot understand this subject, simply because our limited perceptions cannot comprehend infinity. Could we understand the origin of Deity, or his mode of existence, he would be less than God, or we should be more than man. None but an infinite mind, can comprehend an infinite Being. But in allowing that the origin of Jehovah is a mystery, I maintain that to deny his existence, is to involve the whole creation in a mystery a million times more dark and incomprehensible! It requires vastly more credulity to believe that this earth and yonder “spangled heavens,” with all their magnificence and beauty, sprang forth of their own accord from nonentity, than to believe that they were created by an omnipotent and infinitely wise God—although our feeble abilities cannot account for the nature of his existence. In a question of this nature, why choose the harder, darker side? why adopt the more mysterious and unreasonable of the two propositions? Why believe that order, beauty, life, thought, reason, came forth unassisted from chaos and insensibility, rather than that they have been caused by an intelligent Deity, whose origin we cannot comprehend? Reader, why? Let judgment hold the balance and impartially weigh these propositions, and the reflecting mind will not for a moment hesitate which to adopt. Let us follow implicitly the dictates of reason, as far as its powers extend, and an enlightened faith, based on that reason, will supply its deficiencies!

And need I say, that a belief in the existence of an intelligent and benevolent Creator, is of more value than all earth's glittering gems? Need I say, that in retiring to our couch, and in sinking to defenceless slumber, the assurance of an overruling Providence, who permits not even a sparrow to fall unnoticed to the ground, imparts a feeling of safety and peace, which nought else can give? And when we are called to part with those who are bound to us by the sweetest, tenderest ties of our nature, as is the sight of land to the despairing shipwrecked mariner, tossed upon his frail plank amid the wild, lashing waves of the ocean, so is the belief to our soul, that our beloved ones have been called hence by the Father and Friend of the world, and that ere long we shall join them in a holier and happier existence! But what shall I say of the reverse of this belief? Alas! how cheerless, how desolate, must be the condition of that man who is so unfortunate as to disbelieve in the existence of an intelligent God and Father above! No arm superior to his own to interfere in his behalf—no wisdom, no power, goodness or love, but that which dwells in feeble, ignorant, selfish man! The highest, brightest fate he can anticipate for himself and the objects of his affections, is to struggle a few brief days amid the anxieties and evils of life, and then go down, to perish with the brute, in deep, black annihilation! He cannot but exclaim:—

“Annihilation! how it yawns before me!
Next moment I may drop from thought, from sense,
The privilege of angels, and of worms,
An outcast from existence! and this spirit,
This all-pervading, this all-conscious soul,
This particle of energy divine,
Which travels nature, flies from star to star,
And visits gods, and emulates their powers,
Forever is extinguished!—”

Reader, may God in mercy, preserve you and me, from this dreadful belief; and may he impart unto us a knowledge of those vast truths respecting his existence and perfections, which fill the soul with the smiles of hope and joy.

THE WATERER.....No. IV.

SUPPORT OF PREACHING.

“Bear ye one another's burdens.”

In my last, I urged upon brethren the necessity of procuring a regular ministration of the word; and having, perhaps, on the strength of this, contracted with a clergyman to serve them, and begun to circulate a subscription, they have learned how much more liberal people are in words than in figures. Promises of liberality are like sermons—the extemporaneous, more specious and attractive; but the written, more safe and valuable.

Reader, did you ever circulate a subscription paper among liberal people? The first man you ask to sign it, will answer you, perhaps, with an air of concealed originality, and republican independence, “I contend that it is as much trouble for me to ride to meeting, and ride home again, as it is for the minister to preach.” So said Mr. Pinchshilling, a wealthy farmer, when asked to subscribe for the support of Rev. Mr. Lettice, an eccentric clergyman, whose preaching he constantly attended, and very much admired. Whereupon Mr. L. drove his single carriage to Mr. P.'s for five bushels of wheat. The wheat was measured and the preacher was starting off, when the farmer inquired, “Will you have this charged, Mr. L.?” “Charged!” said the clergyman, “I contend that it is as much trouble for me to come after wheat, and transport it home, as it is for you to measure it out.”

“Yes,” said the farmer, “but my grain costs me a great deal of time and labor, before I can get it ready for delivery.” “So does my preaching,” answered the preacher, driving forward with his grain. “But stop, stop,” said Mr. P., following after him, “I pay out money too, for ploughs and harrows.” “So do I, for books and stationery,” was the response. “But my business is the only means I have, of supporting and bringing up my family.” “So is mine,” replied the ready man-in-black. “Well, go with the wheat, I am convinced you have the argument.”

If, then, we are to have a clergyman, whose whole time is to be devoted to our service—who, during the week, must supply himself with materials of information to instruct us on the Sabbath—who must at all times be ready and in waiting, to attend and administer the consolations of the Gospel, at the bed-side of the sick, and to the mourning relatives, when their friend is carried to the tomb—he must be comfortably, though not extravagantly sustained.

Clergymen, unfortunately for themselves, and to the regret of many for whom they sometimes labor, like other men, have mouths and bodies, and consequently must have food and clothing. Like other men, they have, or may have families, from whom they may be called away; and observation shows, that their families, like other families, when left in indigence, are liable to suffer.

But in many places where our clergymen are comfortably provided for, there still exists an evil. It is desirable that the burden of their compensation might be shared more equally, according to the means and circumstances of those who profess friendship to the cause, in order that it might cease to be a burden.

There is many a believer in the final restitution who is benevolent, but poor; and who is led, by a zeal for its propagation, actually to diminish the means of comfort for himself and family. There are others, possessed of earth's temporal good things in abundance, and professing the same principles, who do not appear to care the value of a shilling in these hard times, whether or not mankind believe these principles; nor the value of a dollar, whether the doctrine itself is true—whether, in short, the world be saved or damned.

There are those who professedly believe that the benevolence of Deity is impartial and unbounded; and yet their benevolence is confined within the limits of their own families—the boundaries of their own possessions—hemmed in by their own line-fences, (if I may be allowed an agricultural simile,) and never extends beyond them.

They are sunk down in the mire of that unsocial, selfish, slavish, sordid avarice, which narrows the affections, contracts the mind, and clogs up those channels through which God and nature had designed should flow the milk of human kindness.

Brethren, if you would prosper, “bear ye one another's burdens”—be ready and cheerful to share, equitably, in the bearing of a common burden.

THE FULFILMENT OF THE LAW.

BY REV. O. ROBERTS.

"For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." Matt. v. 18.

The Redeemer of the world came to accomplish an end, than which nothing can be more desirable. It is that which Christ himself declares shall not fail of accomplishment. Contrary to the belief and expectation of many in his time, he said, he came not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfil. The object then, of his coming, is the fulfilment of the law, and the accomplishment of the prophetic declarations concerning him and man's ultimate glory.

Now what law is that which it is positively declared shall be fulfilled? An answer to this question may be found in Christ's answer to the Jewish lawyer, or teacher of the law. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Matt. xxii: 37-39. Again: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets." Matt. vii: 12.

Let it be distinctly understood, that, as love is an active principle, the loving of our neighbors as ourselves, is the same as doing to others as we would do to ourselves, or doing to others what we would wish them to do for us, were our situations reversed. This is the sum of "all the law and the prophets," which Christ came not to destroy or subvert, but to fulfil. And the fulfilment of this law is, of course, the obeying of it. As Paul says, "Love is the fulfilling of the law."

Here, reader, you may discover, 1. That Christ was sent to fulfil "the law," or lead all mankind ultimately to obey it. 2. What that law is. 3. What is its fulfilment. It is pure and ceaseless love to God, and love to all mankind. O what a glorious and desirable end is this! And how pleasing the contemplation, that the universe of intelligences shall be forever dispossessed of hatred, and all unkindness—constituted one grand family of redeemed spirits, enjoying a strictly incorruptible unity of praise, and harmony of soul! Let God be praised; and let man not only rejoice at the prospect, but let him ardently begin the work of love on earth, which is to be consummated in heaven.

CONTROVERSY AND PRACTICAL PREACHING.

It is alleged by our Partialist neighbors, that Universalists are fond of controversy. With what grace such allegations are made, may be ascertained by looking into the Partialist prints of the present day. There, we think, is controversy enough; and that too, in matters of minor importance.—Universalists, 'tis true, have labored much in the field of controversy, and have thereby elicited much truth. It has also been necessary for them to labor much in rooting out the foul slander which has been heaped upon Universalism by their Partialist neighbors. The doctrine is misrepresented, stigmatized, and scandalized. Its abettors have shared in the same abuse. They have been assailed on the right hand and on the left, with all the vituperation of bigots and fanatics. And can it be expected that all this will be endured without any exertions in self-defence? We are told that we are fond of controversy—that we often find fault with the doctrines of others. But the fact is, we are assailed on every hand. The Presbyterian, the Baptist, the Episcopalian, the Methodist—Partialists of all denominations, together with the atheists and skeptics—all these pitch battle with us, and we must fight them all. This is the reason why we are supposed to be fond of controversy.

Those Partialists, who read our periodicals but superficially—who take up the paper—read part of an article, perhaps, from some correspondent, complaining of the bigoted conduct of some Partialist neighbor—throw down the paper, declaring that Universalists are always quarrelling, and finding fault with others—that their papers are filled with contention—when the truth is, they read only such articles, and those partially, and then decide on, and condemn the whole paper. Now if our Partialist brethren will read our periodicals impartially they will find much to approve. But this they will not do, for fear of being convinced of the truth of our doctrine.

Our papers and preachers, we admit, have been compelled to do much in the way of contention, and in this we hope we have obeyed the exhortation of the apostle, to "contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." In this, we know something has been done in the way of the Gospel of peace. Our preachers now, (some of them certainly,) dwell much upon the practical precepts of the Gospel.

We have attended some meetings in Auburn, and have heard enough to know that that society is highly favored in that respect. It has "line upon line, precept upon precept." It is not ignorant of Christian doctrine or duty. The Christian virtues are there always enforced; not only with energy and pathos, but with argument and example. The congregation, too, show by their profound silence and attention, that they approve of practical preaching. 'Tis then the grateful tear is seen stealing its way across the smiling cheek. There is a solemn but pleasant stillness. They move not—they sleep not—but every eye seems to sparkle with joy.

With such a ministry as that congregation is blessed with, what society will not flourish in the Christian graces? That society has flourished—yea, and will flourish. It cannot be otherwise. I do not make these remarks, thinking there are no other societies so highly favored in this respect. Nay, I hope, and I think, there are many. Nor do I make them as a "religious puff"—but because I think them simple facts. Facts, too, which if they existed in every society, would ere long create a heaven on earth.

The time is at hand when Universalist preachers can dwell more upon the Christian graces than they have done heretofore. They can exhort mankind to love their enemies from principle; and from the fact that this is the character of their Father in heaven. To love our friends is no great virtue. Hence, our Saviour says, "If ye love those who love you, what reward have you? Do not even the publicans the same?" The publicans were considered by the Jews the worst people in the world; but they loved each other. So do thieves and pirates. So did the Jews: but there was no great virtue in all this. But this was the high-toned religion of the day among the Pharisees. They had their party distinctions. It was good religion, they thought, to love their friends and hate their enemies. This was the view they had of God, and they were virtuous in imitating their God. But Christ instructs them in a more excellent way. "Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, love your enemies; bless them that curse you," etc.

But how are we to love our enemies? My enemy seeks my injury. He offers me insults and abuse. How shall I love him? The spirit of retaliation forbids it. It rises in my breast involuntarily. How shall I subdue it? From the consideration that he is my enemy—that he is God's enemy? No, we say: upon Partialist principles we can never subdue this spirit. How then shall it be subdued? Answer: By doing good to that enemy. But how can a person love an enemy, and do good to him? We will tell you, reader. When we take into consideration the fact that he is our brother—that God, our heavenly Father, loves him—that Christ died for him—that he will cleanse him from all impurity—that we, as brothers of the same family and children of the same heavenly Parent, are destined to the same immortal home, where we shall together sing the same song and praise the same God with the whole ransomed creation throughout eternity—when we take these things into consideration, can we any longer retain a revengeful spirit? Can we hate him? Can we but love him? No: we cannot. In this way we can love an enemy. With these views and feelings, we can bless those who curse us, and pray for those who spitefully use and persecute us.

Universalists, above all others, can obey this precept. These being the principles, and views, and feelings of Jesus, he could with propriety say, "Love your enemies." Universalists can with propriety obey this injunction. In obeying it, they will be imitators of God, as says the Saviour, "Love your enemies—that ye may be the children (practically) of your Father in heaven." That God loves his enemies, and is impartially good, Jesus plainly declares, and as proof, refers to the sun and rain, which impart their blessings to the evil and the good—the just and unjust. Let moralists contend for this faith and these principles, then will our contentions end in brotherly kindness and charity towards, even our enemies.

INTEMPERANCE.

Of the many vices to which mankind are exposed, none renders its victims so wretched and miserable as the vice of intemperance. When once an individual yields to its influence, of him there is no hope—he is gone—he becomes a spectacle of wretchedness and ruin! Where is the individual that has not seen the prostration of many a noble minded person, of many an ornament of society, to this foe to human felicity? I presume there is not one.

I was well acquainted with George S., a young man, who resided some years since, in this place. He was a young man of excellent abilities, and was much respected by those who knew him. Soon after S. became of age he left here, and located himself in the city of A. Something like three or four years after his removal from here, I made a visit to that place, and as I was one day traversing its streets, I was greeted with a "How do you do?" It proved to be by George S. But O, what an alteration had taken place!

"Had dire disease,
Or ruthless poverty, thus changed a brow
Where beamed bright fancy, intellectual light,
And soaring dignity of soul?"

Ah, no! those bloated cheeks, those inflamed eyes, those swollen lips, that feverish and trembling hand, told but too plainly that he had fallen a prey to vice and folly—that he had become a drunkard. O how it pained me to behold him thus! After conversing a short time, we separated.

Making inquiries, not long since, respecting S., I was informed that he was no more. Pursuing his ruinous career, he went one Sunday with several of his frolicsome and drinking companions, on a hunting excursion. By some means, (best known to God,) his gun burst—poor S. was severely wounded—and ere many days had passed, his body was consigned to the cold and narrow tomb—and his undying spirit returned to the ever living, and as I confidently believe, ever merciful God. When I see young men indulging themselves in the practice of drinking, a practice not only useless but pernicious, I think of poor S., and would say to them, Awake, awake, and listen to the voice of wisdom ere it is too late. "Wisdom crieth without: she uttereth her voice in the streets: she crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the opening of the gates; in the city she uttereth her words, saying, How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? Turn you at my reproof." "Turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die?"

LETTER VIII.

To Rev. Josiah Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"For a great door, and effectual, is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries." 1 Cor. xvi: 9.

DEAR SIR—After your labors to introduce into the world natural death as a consequence of Adam's transgression, you might proceed to prove, or rather "to show," that another and different death was also a consequence of the "fall." By your being so inclined to multiply deaths, as you seem from your writings to be, a person would almost be disposed to infer that you were partial to death, or rather deaths. It is certain that the doctrine you advocate is more a doctrine of death, than life. But of your "second" death, you say—"The penalty of the law also included moral or spiritual death. Spiritual death is a state of guilt and condemnation. Adam gave evidence that he had brought himself to this condition, by his conduct immediately after the fall, and before he was expelled from paradise. . . And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden, in the cool of the day, and they hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God, among the trees of the garden." Gen. iii: 8. And Adam said—"I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid; because I was naked, and I hid myself;" verse 10. Here Adam gave proof that he had lost the knowledge of God, and he was in a state of spiritual blindness, by supposing that he could hide himself from the omniscient God. He showed himself to be guilty;—"he was afraid." Had he been innocent, he would not have been afraid to meet his God. He was ashamed;—"I was naked;" an evidence that he was unholy. St. Paul says—"For if by one man's offence, death reigned, by one, much more they that receive abundance of grace shall reign in life, by one, Jesus Christ." The death that reigned by one, is opposed to the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness conveyed through Jesus Christ. The abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness is spiritual life; then, whatever else this death comprehended, it must have comprehended moral death."

That Adam died a death "in sin," as a consequence of his disobedience, I do not deny. If this be the death which you are pleased to call spiritual or moral, then I agree with you, that Adam, the day he ate of the forbidden fruit, died a spiritual death. No believer in Christianity will deny this death as having passed upon Adam for his transgression.

But whilst you declare this simple truth, you must clothe it with something mysterious. You say—"Adam gave proof he had lost the knowledge of God—was in a state of spiritual blindness"—this is to me somewhat mysterious. How do you learn, Sir, that by partaking of "the tree of knowledge of good and evil," Adam lost the knowledge of God?—or became spiritually blinded? "Why," you gravely respond, "by supposing he could hide himself from the omniscient God." It would seem that you are yet to learn that a knowledge of God is essential to a consciousness of sin. Man cannot feel the weight of sin against God—or in other words, sin does not appear in its exceeding sinfulness, without a knowledge of God. The commandment must come, before sin will revive. Guilt implies a knowledge of the being injured as well as of the nature and application or effect of the act committed. Hence, Sir, the evidence you introduce to prove Adam lost the knowledge of God, proves the contrary. Adam felt his guilt, and his declarations show that he had a knowledge of God, and sorrowed that he had sinned against him. That he had more knowledge of himself is also evident; for after his disobedience he was awakened to a knowledge of his nakedness. I think, Sir, you must admit that if Adam had lost the knowledge of God, he would not have been "afraid." But having a knowledge of him, and sensible he had disobeyed him, he felt his guilt—was "afraid." So, instead of losing knowledge by tasting of the tree of knowledge, I think we are obliged to confess, he acquired still greater knowledge.

You quote Rom. v: 17—"For if by one man's offence death reigned," etc. By reference to the improved Polyglot Bible, you will find this verse improved and corrected by a marginal note, or correction; and although the correction may militate against your favorite theory of all having died in Adam, still, in calmer moments, you must prefer the corrected translation. The marginal note makes the verse read thus—"For if by one offence death reigned, by one (offence); much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ." This passage will be disrobed of absurdity, when it is considered, the apostle is teaching the greater abundance of grace over sin. He is teaching, that whilst one offence brings death, yet much more those who receive abundance of grace, of the gift of righteousness shall reign with the Saviour. He is teaching, that while death reigns by one offence, yet the free gift is of many offences unto justification (verse 16)—or to sum up the whole in his own language, he is teaching that "where sin abounded grace did much more abound." (verse 20.)

Ah, say you, grace is to those who receive the abundance—that, all will not receive. I shall merely suggest that the "gift of righteousness" is a "free gift," and it is not for Elder Keyes to say to whom it is to be bestowed, or from whom it is to be withheld. If it be a "free gift," it cannot be a reward for works; if it could be, we should hear considerably more boasting from modern Pharisees than we now hear. As if to settle this question, and stop the mouths of those who might be, and were disposed to claim the gift of life as a reward of good works, the apostle says, (Rom. iv: 4, 5,) "Now to him that worketh, is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth (maketh just) the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness."

I suppose you do not believe that God will justify the ungodly. If not, you cannot be in possession of that faith which can be accounted for righteousness. If you say you believe God will justify, that is absolve and make just, the ungodly, I trust you will not prefix a condition, so as to make the justification, or free gift, a matter of reward. Give God the praise of doing all things after his own power, will, and wisdom. As we agree that sin brought death into the world, and that that death, (one of your three deaths,) is moral or spiritual, I have nothing more at present to say on this branch of your communication. Your next branch, is your third death, which you are pleased to term "eternal." It is my intention to speak of that soon, in its turn. Will you in the meantime ponder upon the actual utility of such a death, (eternal,) as a penalty for a transgression of moral or divine laws? Be so good as to see if you can be enabled, on serious research and reflection, to discover any possible good resulting to God or man from such a penalty. Would you be pleased to be corrected by such a chastisement from God? Is it parental? AMICUS.

TEMPERANCE.....No. X.

BY A. W. BENTON, M. D.

Wishing to embrace every opportunity of gaining information, for the purpose of getting rid of my errors, as well as for learning new truths; and as "A Friend to Temperance" has kindly and gratuitously offered me the assistance of his instructions, I would gratefully avail myself of their benefit. He will probably discover from the tenor of my last number, that I have applied myself in a measure to his second lesson. At this time I have a few other remarks and inquiries to make; and if I appear inquisitive, or dull of comprehension, I hope he will not be weary in well-doing. But to the lesson. He says he would not take away the glass from the drinker by force, by which I suppose he means physical force, as I presume he would have no objection to the force of truth and reason. Now I am a wayfaring man, and want things made plain. I want to know if he intended the implied charge, that temperance societies generally have used physical force? If so, his proof.

He asks a question of those "who are so ready to proscribe." Did he think any one would acknowledge himself proscriptive, by taking the question to himself? Perhaps he thought me proscriptive, from the fact of my asking the question—Ought Christians to patronize the vender of ardent spirit? Let us examine this subject again, and in the light of his own reason see how his question ought to be answered. He says "he would win the drinker from his glass by persuasion." This amounts to about the same thing as persuading him to withdraw his patronage from the vender of ardent spirit. But from the tenor of his article I infer that he would answer the question in the affirmative, i. e. that we ought to patronize the vender. Let us then bring his two positions side by side. He "would do away the disposition to drink by destroying the appetite;" and at the same time patronize, or support and encourage the vender, whose business it is to create and pamper this appetite. This, it is true, does not much resemble the fable of the ape, which "hugged its offspring to death," but strongly reminds me of the man I once read of, who, out of fondness for his children, reared, for their amusement, a young tiger, till it became full-grown, and devoured them. It will be recollected that "A Friend to Temperance" declares, that "self-interest is the ruling principle of man," and so far as the vender of ardent spirit is concerned, I am not disposed to dispute his assertion. As for myself, in thus speaking, I would choose not to use the word man in its most unlimited sense. Now this being the case, it is for the vender's interest to dispose of his rum, gin, whiskey, etc., as fast as possible, of course, his "ruling principle" will prompt him to induce all he can, to use them. If so, I cannot see what prospect my friend has of "taking away the disposition to drink," unless he considers himself a man of much more influence than the vender, with whom he affectionately sympathizes, and for whom he has such a tender regard.

But let us see if temperance men withdrawing their patronage from the rum-selling merchant, and giving it to the temperance merchant, amounts to proscription. For illustration, we will suppose there are two merchants, A and B, in a town, both of whom formerly sold ardent spirit. But from a sense of duty, A abandons the traffic in ardent spirit; and B, from a sense of duty also, continues the traffic. The consequence will be, that a majority of A's rum-drinking customers will leave him, and trade with B. They will withdraw their patronage from him. Now if none of B's temperance customers leave him, and trade with A, B will be the gainer, and A the loser. But if an equal number of B's cold-water customers leave him, and trade with A, has B any more reason to complain of proscription than A had when his moderate drinking customers left him? Is it not evident then that temperance men ought to patronize temperance stores, to keep up the equality of patronage?

"A Friend to Temperance" thinks it would be worse than useless to withhold the products of our farms from the distiller, because he thinks the "consequence would be, coarse grains would rise in value." Admit it. What would be the next consequence? Why, that whiskey would rise in value, and consequently there would be less of it drank. But he seems to have forgotten, that furnishing the distiller with the product of our farms has a much more powerful effect in raising the price of grain. Immediately after harvest, while grain is cheap, the distiller engages his immense supply of grain, and the consequence is, a scarcity of grain in the country; and before the next harvest, the poor day laborer has to pay double what the distiller did, for grain to bread his family. I envy not the happiness that farmer enjoys, who exacts 75 cents, or a dollar, from the hard earnings of the disconsolate wife, for a bushel of rye; while he reflects that he has sold of that same grain, for 50 cents per bushel to the distiller, to be converted into whiskey, to be sold to the drunken husband!

PRAYER.

"Pray without ceasing."—Bible.

Prayer is a pleasing and delightful exercise for the pious and contemplative mind. When the world has forsaken us; when the storms of affliction are howling around us, or the dark billows of despair are about to overwhelm us; then how delightful it is to withdraw ourselves from the "busy bustling scenes" by which we are surrounded, and pour forth our sorrows in the ear of our Father and our God, knowing that he is ever willing to grant the requests of those, who ask in "faith, without wrath, nothing doubting!" None need ever fear to approach their heavenly Father in a proper spirit, and ask him to bestow on them such things as are "requisite, not only for the body, but for the soul;" for the Saviour hath expressly declared, that "every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."

But it is to be feared, that many, very many, who profess to have an interest at the throne of grace, receive not, because they do not ask aright. Christ informs those by whom he was surrounded on a certain occasion, that, "they did not receive," from the fact that "they asked amiss." It may not be altogether unprofitable to inquire in this place, what manner of spirit we should possess, when we come into the presence of the great I AM!

I would remark, however, negatively, First—That we should not come into divine presence with a self-righteous spirit. In order to show that this spirit is condemned, I need only refer the reader to the prayers of the publican and Pharisee. It appears that these two men went up into the temple to pray; the Pharisee stood thus, and prayed with himself, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice a week, I pay tithes of all I possess." "But the publican, standing afar off, would not so much as lift his eyes towards heaven, but smote upon his breast, and exclaimed, God be merciful to me a sinner!" Here, in the case of the Pharisee, we have an example of an intolerant, self-righteous spirit; and how many there are of the professedly religious of the present day, who exercise just such a spirit as this Pharisee did, I will not undertake to determine; but I would respectfully suggest to every reader the propriety of asking himself the following question, "Lord, is it I?" who possesses this spirit?

Secondly—We should not offer up our petitions in a cold formal spirit. It is to be lamented that many who profess to have "Christ formed within, the hope of glory," and who are proverbial for their pretended piety and sanctity, are too deeply imbued with this spirit. How often do we hear, on visiting the house where "prayer is wont to be made," these frozen, lifeless petitions issuing from the mouths of those who arrogate to themselves all the religion, and to question whose creed would be deemed sacrilegious? Can such persons expect to have their desires fulfilled? Can they expect such prayers will be approbated by the Almighty? No; but on the contrary, to all such Jehovah saith, "bring no more vain oblations before me."

Thirdly—We should not come before heaven's King with a selfish spirit. By this I mean, that we should not ask, or even desire to be the sole recipients of divine favor, but we should, in accordance with the apostolic injunction, "pray for all men," that they too should be made partakers of that grace which "bringeth salvation" alike to all, and that they may bring forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and live quiet and godly lives, to the glory of their great Creator.

Lastly—We should not come with a partial spirit—that is, having our minds fettered with the creeds and traditions of men, and believing that the promises of the Gospel have reference to only a select few, and that, consequently, our prayers should be as circumscribed as our creed. This manner of spirit should be avoided by all those who expect to receive "good gifts" from the hands of their heavenly Father, and to enjoy that religion which "cometh down from above," and fills the believing soul with "joy unspeakable, and full of glory."

But, how should we come before God, our Father, almighty maker of heaven and earth? Answer—We should come with a lowly, humble, and contrite spirit, feeling that we need the things for which we ask. We should also be deeply impressed with a sense of our utter helplessness, and that without the aid of our heavenly Father we should be in no better condition, than "orphans left to wander in a trackless desert, without any guide to conduct them, or any shelter to cover them from the gathering storm." God grant that both writer and reader may always possess this spirit, and ultimately obtain everlasting life through Jesus Christ the Redeemer.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Messrs. EDITORS—I read your papers—am pleased with many truths therein exhibited, and wish them free currency throughout the world. I am called a Calvinistic Universalist, because I ascribe omniscience, omnipotence, and benevolence to our Creator, and believe there is no point in infinite space, or period in eternity, that is not as familiar to him at one time as at another.

Yet I believe that man was created mortal—that no covenant of life and death was made with him—that his return to his mother earth was the end of him, under the first creation. That subsequently no law was given, the penalties or promises of which extended beyond this life. The decalogue had no promises or penalties annexed, except the fifth and third—one was length of days in the land, and the other that he would not be held guiltless, and when detailed in the judicial law, the highest penalty was stoning to death. But does our existence end here? No, we read of being created in a character who is emphatically called the Saviour of all men. The second Adam—the Lord from heaven—the quickening spirit—whose life is the light of every man—he being the resurrection and the life, in whom the record says we have "eternal life;" and I believe it is through him alone, we have any account of consciousness after this life.

How then can he who is called the Saviour of all men, and who has all power, be instrumental in quenching most of the human family for endless misery?

UNIVERSALISM IN GERMANY.

Our readers will remember that under this head, a few weeks ago, we published several extracts of a letter from Professor Sears—in one of which he stated that he had in his possession a copy of a lecture delivered by Professor Tholuck, of Germany, in which he discussed and defended the doctrine of universal salvation. Thinking that it had been a public lecture—that it was not inconsistent with the object of Professor Sears to give said lecture to the public, and believing that it would be especially interesting to Universalists, I immediately wrote to Professor Sears respectfully soliciting a copy of Dr. Tholuck's lecture for publication, etc. As I mentioned this fact incidentally to several brethren, who may be anxious to know the result of my application, I deem it proper to state that I have received a very frank and courteous refusal from Professor Sears, in which he says:—"The lectures which I have in manuscript were never designed for the public, and I should feel that it would be an act of injustice to the author to commit unnecessarily any thing of his to the press, without his knowledge and consent. His reputation would be concerned in any thing that should be published as coming from him, and therefore he ought to have a voice in deciding what should be printed in his name."

The sentences I have italicized form the reason for refusal—a reason unknown to me when I made my request—and Professor Sears does me justice in saying, as in the close of his letter, "I feel a confidence that you will justify the course that I pursue in regard to this whole matter." His course was in my opinion necessary, and proper; and it is presumed highly satisfactory to all, except, perhaps, the Editor of the Lutheran Observer and others who would rather deny than admit the truth of Professor Sears' description of the religious views of Tholuck and others.

Having made known the existence of my request, I deemed it but proper thus to notify the substance of the refusal and its reasons—also to express my concurrence in its propriety.

Our readers may rest satisfied I shall spare no pains and lose no reasonable opportunity of procuring them any needed information on important or interesting subjects.

QUOTATION CORRECTED.

The Editor of the Christian Palladium is respectfully informed that his Michigan correspondent, Zenas, has not fairly quoted the extract he gives from Br. Balfour's "Inquiry into the Scriptural import of the words Sheol, Hades, Tartarus, and Gehenna: all translated Hell in the common English version." See Palladium, vol. iv: pp. 324, 325. Zenas omits one sentence in his quotation, without giving the reader even a sign or intimation thereof. By this omission, only, is he enabled to make out his misrepresentation of Mr. Balfour's views—viz: that Mr. B. includes the destruction of Korah and his company among the innocent blood that has been shed by the Jewish nation—and that Korah and company escaped their punishment, and that the innocent suffered it for them. I do not say Zenas has wilfully misquoted the sentence, or knowingly made these false charges or inferences therefrom—mistakes are common to all, and the error may be the result of carelessness, as well as of intention. I hope it is. But that his readers may see there is an error, will Br. Badger please give the sentence in full, accompanied with these remarks, or the substance of them? I ask what I will feel it my duty to grant should any of our correspondents ever commit a similar error. To show the misquotation fairly, I will enclose the omitted sentence in brackets, [thus]:—"It has been shown that 'the judgment of the great day,' does not refer to a general judgment at the end of this world, but to the judgment of God on the Jews at the close of their dispensation. [Now, though Korah and his company were punished on the spot for their rebellion, yet we are told, all the sins of the Jews as a nation, which had been committed during past ages, were at that time visited on the nation:] On that generation came all the righteous blood that had been shed upon the earth. Of course the rebellion of Korah and his company is included. They were delivered into chains of darkness;" etc. Balfour's First Inquiry, p. 99. It is the rebellion of Korah that is included among the sins of the nation—not his destruction. And though Korah, as an individual, was punished, yet as a national sin, the rebellion was also visited on the nation. If the Jewish nation was innocent, then the innocent was punished—but Korah and company did not escape. And if this assertion is to be blamed, it is not

Mr. Balfour that uttered it first, but Jesus—see Matt. xxiii: 35, 36.

As to Mr. Balfour's views—his work will speak for itself—and by referring to it, the reader will see that Zenas also erred in saying, that Mr. Balfour "has not shown" "by what authority he calls Korah and his company the angels that were cast down to hell." For Mr. Balfour fills six or seven pages, (pp. 93-100,) with his proofs and arguments on this very subject. And though they are not conclusive to my mind; no more, perhaps, than they are to the mind of Zenas; still I must say, that Mr. Balfour did show by what authority HE made the statements condemned; whether that authority is sufficient, or not.

But enough. The object of this article is the correction of mistakes, not controversy. I believe Editors should be careful to correct all such. It would make their correspondents careful how they quoted, or inferred what the author never intended as his meaning. Differences of opinions would be clearly understood, and divisions among Christians would lose their bitterness, now imparted by misrepresentations and false accusations. Candor would soon infuse a more Christian temper and spirit in our controversies, and the professor would be gradually moulded into the possessor also. I verily believe that there are hundreds now in our fellowship who received their first bias to conversion by finding, that what they believed respecting us were merely the false accusations and gross misrepresentations of our opposers. If so—what a lesson to those who believe they may "do evil that good may come!" The good comes, it is true—but not what they deem good—not the good they desire to effect.

BAPTIST BIBLE.

Some time ago Mr. Beebe highly eulogized the common English version of the Bible as almost inspired—the best that human talents, learning, industry and piety could ever make! None but bad men, infidels and arch heretics would ever find fault with it, and they hated it only because of its correct and excellent rendering of the original. (I quote from memory, after a slight perusal of the articles, but am confident I give the sense and substance thereof.) Such was Mr. Beebe's conviction a few weeks ago.

Wonderful to tell, what mighty revolutions take place within a few days, as it were! An earthquake shakes the foundations of cities, and they are covered with waters. He who holds the winds in his closed hand, lets loose the tornado, and forests are levelled before its might as grass before the mower's scythe! The works of centuries are compressed within as many years—the revolutions of ages are performed within one generation—kingdoms change governments and rulers within a few months, and Mr. Beebe's opinion respecting the common English version of the Bible, has been quite changed within as many weeks! Astonishing—pro-di-gious!

Since the American Bible society requires the Baptists, in their translations, to copy after the aforesaid unrivalled and almost inspired version, Mr. Beebe speaks quite contemptuously of "the principles of the translation into English, by King James' College"—and he says (Hear Mr. Beebe!—) "Had the Greek word been translated by the College of James I., what a different aspect the Christian community would now present. A fraternity holding not only 'one Lord, one faith' [which one?] but 'one baptism,' etc."

The plain truth is, that if there are mistranslations of the original because "the man, James Stuart" was a Pedobaptist, there may be others, because he was a trinitarian—others, because he was a Calvinist—others, because he was an Episcopalian—others, because he was a Partialist; and others, because he believed in wiches and hated tobacco! Come—come, Mr. Beebe, be reasonable for once, and allow a little for each heresy of our brother, King James I.

A. B. G.

P. S. Since penning the foregoing, we learn that a general dissatisfaction with the common version is beginning to be expressed by the Baptist papers. "The Christian Secretary" proposes a Baptist translation of the Scriptures into English. It says:—"Numbering, as the Baptists do, in the United States, nearly five hundred thousand communicants, the work can be done, must be done, will be done; and that without the fetters imposed upon the learned, by a HALF-REFORMED KING at the head of a national church, centuries gone by."

This, according to Mr. Beebe some weeks ago, is speaking very much like a wicked man, an infidel, or an arch heretic! The Episcopalians writhe some under the severity of this language applied to the head of their church. For ourselves, if the Baptists can give us a version that will better express the sense of the originals, than any version now extant, we shall rejoice at the consistency of the American Bible society which circulates translations of the erroneous Vulgate among the Spanish and Portuguese, but refuses to circulate a Baptist version among the Baptist converts among the Burmese.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

This ever welcome monthly, for March, is now on our table—justly deserving of an earlier notice which we were prevented from giving for want of time to peruse it—filled with matter that must be honorable, wherever read, to the American press, and cannot fail of securing to the enterprising publishers, and the enlightened Editor, the well earned meed of praise and approbation from all whose good opinion is worth coveting. This number is rich in original and valuable papers from some of the most eminent writers. The first of a series of letters from Palmyra, not only promises but commences a mental feast well worth partaking of. The second number on Philology from the pen of Noah Webster is certainly most interesting and valuable to the republic of letters. The tale of Hannah Hervey, by Rev. Timothy Flint, is well written and of a wholesome bearing. The Execution at Sea is rather insipid, but we get more than a compensation for that in the light of the "Comets and Eclipses." There are some exquisite pieces of poetry, and some well digested and judicious editorial and literary notices. We like the Editor's style, because it is plain and intelligible: wherever censure is deserved he does not spare: wherever praise is due he will not withhold it. We like his spirit for it is purely American, and of course patriotic.

D. S.

"HOW DID YOUR GOD ORIGINATE?"

Under this question of the skeptic, our readers will find an excellent article in this paper from the pen of Br. Austin. Is it not singular that these sage querists never ask us, "How did eternity begin?" "Where did infinite space commence?" The truth is, we must admit self-existence somewhere—we cannot imagine a creation, or a universe without it. It is as difficult to conceive a beginning, without a self-existent principle, thing or being to originate that beginning, as it is to conceive the beginning and end of all duration, or of all extension. And though we cannot comprehend infinity of either kind, yet the difficulty—yes, the absolute impossibility of conceiving a universe without these infinities, is sufficient to cause us to acknowledge their existence. In the same manner, and for the same reasons, every intelligent being must admit some self-existent thing, principle or being, by which or by whom the present order and operations of the universe were originated and established.

But that order and those operations denote harmony, design, and therefore intelligence in the originator. The pantheist contends that a thing (the material universe) without intelligence or design, so arranged itself as, by the organization of itself to produce intelligence and design! The atheist contends that a principle equally as blind and unintelligent as the pantheist's thing, or material universe, (being, in fact, an abstraction of creative power or energy,) so modelled, and formed, and arranged matter, as to cause it to display intelligence, life, etc. In both these theories, we perceive the acknowledgment of infinite self-existence—but in these theories the Creator is manifestly inferior to the created, in life, intelligence, etc.—the fountain is lower than the stream it sends forth—yes, as much inferior and lower as idiocy or fatuity is inferior to, and less than the highest intelligence, wisdom and goodness of humanity!

Now we (Christians) only add to the infinite existence acknowledged by both pantheists and atheists, that that existence is a being—not a thing, not a principle, but a being—having all the properties and qualities, and faculties of their "thing" and "principle," besides all others which they so lamentably lack. This being is infinite in extension and duration—and infinite in creative energy or power, no less, nor no more than their infinite and self-existent thing or principle. But as man has life, intelligence, etc., he must have received them somewhere. Say he received them by organization—he must have received such a cunningly devised organization from some source, able in itself, and previous to the organization of matter, to devise and design its mechanism and its results. Go to the pantheist's universe of matter unorganized—is it able to bestow what it has not itself? Or, go to the atheist's abstract creative energy, or principle—can it give what it has not?

I trust no more is necessary, in conjunction with Br. Austin's article, to show that our skeptical brethren—for they are our brethren, and our God is their father—in endeavoring to avoid belief in an incomprehensible Creator, have adopted faith in a positive impossibility and absurdity—from which may God save us and deliver them!

A. B. G.

IMP-IETY.

This is not a new word, but a different form of an old one. It is intended to express the crime of disbelieving in, or speaking lightly of, the imp, alias, devil. This, with some persons, is a greater blasphemy than if directed against God.

Partialist. Do you know the belief of H. C.?

Universalist. Yes—if it can be called such, which is no belief—he is a rank atheist—

P. What! he?—he?—an atheist? not believe in a God?

U. Yes, he—did you not know it?

P. (Musing)—Well—what of that? there are worse men than he is. There, for instance, is J. G.—he does not believe in a DEVIL!!

THE RECORD.

MEETING-HOUSES.—The brethren in Stratford, Conn., aided by the brethren in Trumbull, have raised one thousand dollars to build a meeting-house, to which they expect to add enough more to enable them to begin the work on the first of May next. This is the scene of Br. F. Hitchcock's labors and an evidence of their utility.—The society in Charleston, S. C., has contracted for the erection of its meeting-house on the corner of Anson and Laurens-streets. The Evangelist says it will be ready for occupancy in three months.

SOCIETIES.—The society in Cincinnati, Ohio, is still onward. It has received an accession of twenty members since Br. Rogers commenced preaching in the Winter, and has paid one-half of the entire sum for their property, instead of one-fifth as called for by contract. A society was recently organized in Bolton, Conn. They enjoy the occasional services of Br. Henry Brown, but intend to secure stated preaching soon. The society in Reading, Pa., we rejoice to hear it, is prospering under the labors of Br. Perry.

REMOVALS.—Br. S. A. Davis from Funkstown, Md., to Pittsburg, Pa. Br. H. W. Morse, (who has pursued his ministerial studies under the direction of Br. Cobb, of Malden,) to North Reading, Mass. Br. Potter informs us by letter from Cooperstown, where he has faithfully labored for thirteen years in word and doctrine, by precept and example, that he has received and accepted an invitation to settle with the society in Lockport, Niagara county. We grieve to lose Br. Potter from this region, but comfort ourselves with the hope that it will be for his good, and the good of the cause. He will remove to Lockport early in May. Br. O. Wilcox, of Boonville, (Sheldonville, P. O.), has received and accepted an invitation to settle in (little) York, town of Fowler, St. Lawrence county. Br. Matthew H. Smith, late of Hartford, Conn., has concluded to settle with the society in Quincy, Mass., vacated by the removal of his brother, D. D. Smith, to Portland city, Maine. Br. David Bidlecom requests all communications hereafter addressed to him at North Gage, Oneida county.

PREACHERS.—Still more new laborers in the Gospel field! Br. M. B. Smith, Postmaster at Burlington Flats, we are informed has commenced preaching the doctrine of impartial grace, with great ability and to good acceptance. Br. John D. Hicks, of Springfield, Otsego county, has also commenced in the same good work, as we learn by the same informant. God be with them to bless their labors! Richard Blaylock, of Indiana, is named below as a new preacher in the Indiana Association.

ASSOCIATION.—The First Indiana Association of Universalists met at Greenville, Floyd county, October 2, 1835, and after an address from Br. E. B. Mann, adjourned till next day. Saturday morning, met according to adjournment, and after examining the accounts of the book agent, it appeared that the Association had on hand, in books, accounts and cash, clear of all demands, one hundred and eighty-three dollars and seventy-five cents. Received several lay brethren, Richard Blaylock, minister, and the first Universalist society of Greenville, into the fellowship of the Association. Appointed a committee to consider the revival of the Constitution, and a plan for circuit preaching. Chose Br. Mann, Book Agent.

Sunday morning. Elected Brs. E. B. Mann, President; William Course, Vice President; John Popham, Treasurer; H. Sharp, Jacob Sharp, Abram Froman, Trustees; Thomas Capehart, J. Cooper, S. Harding, Committee of Discipline; and William Course, Secretary, for the ensuing year.

Adjourned to meet at Leavenworth, Crawford county, Ind., on the Friday preceding the first Sunday in October, 1836.

CONFERENCES.—One of Universalists was held at Hartford, Washington county, on February 25 and 26. The services were tolerably well attended. The society in Hartford are prospering under the labors of Br. A. Gates. The Chautauque Circuit Conference convened at Panama, March 6, 1836. Br. C. Morton, Moderator; Br. A. Williams, Clerk. Five Sermons were preached and the meetings well attended. The only important business before the Council, was the discussion of the question, whether the Conference should continue to meet quarterly. In this discussion, which was amicably conducted, there was a feeling manifested which, if cultivated, cannot but be beneficial to the cause. Notwithstanding the inconvenience of travelling to a distance to attend its meetings—the trouble of providing for those who attend; the brethren, without a dissenting voice, determined that the meetings should not be suspended.

EDITORIAL CHANGES.—Brs. A. A. Folsom, of Hingham, and Abel Tompkins, of Boston, (the latter, a layman,) have purchased the Universalist and Ladies' Repository from Br. D. D. Smith. It will be published, as heretofore, in Boston. Br. Smith will continue the present volume to its close, and then act as Associate Editor. Office of the Universalist is 32 Cornhill. Br. George Rogers, of Cincinnati, has become a joint partner in the Sentinel and Star in the West, which will be removed from Madisonville to Cincinnati, and edited and published by him in conjunction with our worthy lay brother, Judge Tizzard.

ITEMS.—The discussion between Revs. J. Breckenridge and A. B. Cross, Presbyterians, and Rev. L. S. Everett, Universalist, of Baltimore, Md., is to be forthwith published in pamphlet form, and offered very cheap. It is the most abusive of Universalists and their faith, of any attack on us I ever read. If it does not make our opposers in this region blush for their champions, they must be past feeling. A few copies will be procured and kept for sale at this office. Br. Rayner's Book of Prayer will be published early this Spring. In addition to Luther Lee's work against Universalism, we are to be favored with an attack by Jeremiah Leslie, of Zanesville, Ohio. The Pioneer and Liberalist says Alexander Campbell is out on us. Glad of it; for hitherto it has been as hard to tell whether he was with us or against us, as it is to know what American Unitarians believe respecting the destiny of all men.

Br. Sawyer has published, in the last Union, a letter received by him from Professor Tholuck, which must settle the question for the Editor of the Lutheran Observer in regard to German Universalism. Br. Sawyer is Secretary to the Historical society. We shall give the letter itself in our next.

Dr. Ely has resigned the editorial charge of the Philadelphia to Rev. John McKnight, late of Chambersburg, Pa.—“opposed to ultra-orthodoxy on the one hand, and latitudinarianism on the other”—“a gentleman of letters, of sound common sense, and of good taste.”

The Doctor retires to Marion College, Missouri, in which he is Professor of Polemic Theology. He says, in his valedictory, that he wishes for his successor, “as much editorial courtesy as we have received from all Editors, with the exception of a few deistical and three or four Presbyterian neighbors.....We part with them all, even with Br. Engles and Robert J. Breckenridge, in peace. Heaven send them a better mind; and grant Albert Barnes deliverance from their tender mercies.”

Peace be with the Polemic Professor—may he find that truth which giveth peace.

Br. C. F. Le Fevre is expected home from his European tour about the 1st of May next.

The Baptists propose holding a General Convention in New-York city, in May next, to take into consideration the subject of their exclusion, from the funds of the American Bible society, so far as their foreign translations are concerned. It is probable they will form a Bible society of their own, unless the mammoth changes the decision of its Board. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Justin, of Van Buren, is informed that the article in the tenth number, current volume, over that signature, is said to have been copied from the Herald of Truth, volume ii, number 46—over the initials of our correspondent, J. M. C., of Baldwinville. This is a most despicable piece of meanness, impudence, imposition and theft in Justin, aggravated by the fact that the very article, thus palmed off as his own, inculcates a very different course of conduct! It is truly stealing “the livery of Heaven.” I do hope the time is not far distant when every person making pretensions to common decency and honesty will quit stealing—for such is the crime here reprobated. May Justin, and all others, see the loathsome guiltiness of such meanness, and “sin no more, lest a worse evil befall” them.

The acceptable favors of Brs. Hammond, A. H. Curtis, Asher Moore, E. A. Garfield, and others were duly received.

The obituary from Br. French was in time, but forgotten by me—it will appear next week.

The several inquiries after truth will be attended to as soon as circumstances will permit. A. B. G.

STANDING NOTICE.

The Executive Committee of the Clinton Liberal Institute respectfully solicit donations of one dollar, or upwards, from all the friends of unsectarian education, for the use of said Institution.

* * Remittances can be made to this office, by any of our agents, in the same letters containing money for us, and will be paid over immediately to Br. Skinner, and acknowledged in the paper. EDITORS.

NEW AGENTS.—William Spencer, Nicholville—John Donaldson, P. M., Nelson—Orson Fuller, Churchville—Jacob Potts, P. M., Williamstown—Enoch T. Bond, Genesee.

LIBERAL OFFERS.

Having purchased a number of files of volumes three, four, and five, from Br. Skinner; and being desirous at once to increase the subscription list to the present volume, and to get these volumes into circulation, that both may do more good than they now do lying dead in our office, we hereby make the following

PROPOSALS.

1. Any person sending us five dollars free of expense to us, shall be entitled to three copies of the present volume, and one copy of either volume three, four, or five.
2. Any person sending us six dollars, in the same manner, shall be entitled to four copies of the present volume, and one copy of either of the volumes above named.
3. Any person sending us ten dollars in manner above named, shall be entitled to seven copies of the present volume, and two copies of any one volume, or two volumes, of volumes three, four, or five.
4. Any person sending us fifteen dollars in manner aforesaid, shall be entitled to eleven copies of the present volume, and two copies, or two volumes, as above stated.
5. And any person sending us twenty dollars, as above prescribed, shall be entitled to fifteen copies of the present volume, and a copy of each of the volumes three, four, and five.

Applicants will state to whom the several papers of the present volume are to be directed—what volumes are claimed of three, four, and five—and how they shall be sent. They are unbound, of course, but perfect.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

FORMER VOLUMES AND NUMBERS.

We have now on hand a plenty of volumes two and three (old series) of the Evangelical Magazine for 1828 and 1829, convenient for binding together.

Also, a few, and but a few, complete sets of the Magazine and Advocate—the first six volumes, (new series,) from 1830 to 1835 inclusive, bound and lettered, at two dollars per volume. Volumes three, four and five will be sold separate, if desired, as we have a plenty of those volumes on hand. But volumes one, two and six (as we have but a few complete files of them remaining) will not be sold except in sets with the other volumes.

Of the last (or sixth) volume, we run short of several numbers. We are out of numbers 26, 27 and 46, (excepting the few perfect files we have,) and nearly out of numbers 41, 43, 44 and 45. If any of our subscribers who have the three numbers first named and do not keep files for binding, will return those numbers, or either of them to this office, we shall feel greatly obliged to them. We will cheerfully give three (of those numbers of which we have a plenty) for one that we are out of. D. S.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. BRITTON at Muskallunge at 2, P. M., and at Sackets Harbor in the evening—Br. WAGGONER at Union meeting-house, Oppenheim—Br. C. B. BROWN at Mexico and at Union Square at 5 P. M.—Br. NEWELL at Newville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. WAGGONER at Middleville—Br. C. B. BROWN at Oswego in such house as the friends may appoint.

The Connecticut Association of Universalists will meet at Wolcottville, in that State, on Wednesday and Thursday, April 27th and 28th.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE DEATH OF SISERA.

JUDGES, CHAPTER IV.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

The fugitive paused at the Kenite's tent,
And the blood on his dark cheek came and went
Like the lightning's flash, or the waves of the sea
When they rush to their caverns tumultuously;
And his breath came quick and a cold sweat stood
'Neath the glittering clasp of his helmet rude;
And a shade as of death passed over his face,
For he thought of his flight and its deep disgrace.

He drew his bright sword from its iron bed
And a scalding tear on its surface shed,
Then broke it in twain, and the fragments cast
In a stream which the tent of the Kenite passed—
"So brittle," he cried, "were the hopes of the morn—
So soon was the laurel wreath trampled and torn—
So perish the honors my prowess had sought,
For the warrior is humbled—the chieftain is naught."

But the arras is raised, and a fair form stands
In Heber's door-way with beckoning hands,
And a smile so kind, and a voice so sweet,
That the warrior is lured to her dread retreat.
He enters the door and his parched lips drain
Sweet milk from the flocks of fair Zaanaim's plain,
And he lays down his weary limbs to rest,
With the Kenite's mantle upon his breast.

What bodes, dark Jael, that smile of ire?
And the snake-like gleam from thine eyes of fire?
Why closes thy hand on that long sharp nail?
And the huge hammer rests in thy fingers frail?
Thou wouldst not injure the fallen great?
Oh, darker than death is their vanquished state,
And Sisera's lord is with thine at peace—
Away! let thy murderous purpose cease!

With a cat-like stealth did the traitress steal
To the prostrate chief, and beside him kneel,
And she raised her hand, but he spake in sleep
Wild words which might make the hardest weep.
Oh listen, dark Jael, thou too hast a son,
Couldst thou spare from thy bosom that darling one?
He speaks of his mother—mad woman, away!
But when did the tiger's eye turn from her prey?

She raised her hand, and a crimson stream
Gushed forth to the low tent's rafters beam;
And the chief like a gilded lion rose
And wildly called for his craven foes;
And he felt for his sword—when his dim eye saw
That a woman had dealt the treacherous blow!
And he fell with a groan on the blood-stained floor,
And yielded his life at the Kenite's door.

THE POWER OF FAITH.

An acorn and a nut were lying side by side in the earth, at a small distance from the surface, on a bright warm day in Spring, when the former feeling a new energy stirring within said to his friend the nut, "I am tired of my inactivity! It is now more than four months that I have been dozing here in the dirt, but Spring has brought back the pleasant sunshine, and I intend to put forth my sprouts, and cast down my roots and become a plant; I will attempt to become an oak. What say you to this, my friend? I hope you are of the same mind."
"Alas!" replied the nut, "I feel no less than you an inward prompting to unfold the germ that is within my breast: but I fear lest some evil should befall me in my unguarded growth, and I should perish. Now I am out of the reach of danger, and securely am I armed in my coat of mail; but were I to put forth my tender shoot, the rat of the earth might devour it in a moment, or the foot of the careless wild goat might crush me to my death. So," continued he, "though I have a desire to accomplish the end of my creation, and to become a tree, yet the dangers are so many, that I dare not hazard the attempt—I shall not put forth this Spring."

"Poor nut," said the acorn with a sigh, "I hope you will change your mind; you can be but little worse off than you are now, even if the earth rat does visit you. Pray consider, and doubtless you will think differently upon it."

But the nut—fearful of danger—had closed his shell, and heard not the kind counsel of his friend. But the acorn immediately put forth his little shoots, and soon found himself in a new world. The sun smiled upon him by day, and the dews refreshed him by night. He grew up noiselessly, for he was modest, and rapidly, for he was full of faith, and soon attained an eminence among the sons of the valley.

In time the acorn became a mighty tree, the parent of forests. His trunk was a mighty column, and his many boughs spread out a wood of verdure. The stag and the wild goat found shelter from the keen arrows of the storm, under its arms. The robin and the Summer thrush repaid his protection by the delicious harmony of their voices, and the cheerful squirrel found in the oak both a house and a granary.

The wanderer laid down under his cool shade, to repose from the heats and fatigues of his dusty travel. He knelt at his morning prayer—while the new risen sun greeted the old oak, and kissed his forehead—and said, "Blessed be the oak which has sheltered me, and blessed be the hand that planted it; may they find peace."

Thus centuries had passed away; time corrupted the mail of the nut, and the earth worm with his frightful fangs tore out his heart. "Alas," said the expiring nut, "alas, that I had no faith!"—Register and Observer.

MARCH OF INTELLECT.—A beggar some time ago applied for alms at the door of a partisan of the anti-begging society. After in vain detailing his manifold sorrows, the inexorable gentleman peremptorily dismissed him. "Go away," said he, "go, we cannot give you nothing." "You might at least," replied the mendicant, with an air of arch dignity, "have refused me grammatically."

ELEGANT EXTRACT.—Human happiness has no perfect security but freedom; freedom none but virtue; virtue none but knowledge; and neither freedom, nor virtue, nor knowledge, has any vigor, or immortal hope, except in the principles of the Christian faith, and in the sanctions of the Christian religion.—President Quincy.

INFLUENCE OF WOMAN.—Capt. Marryatt in his new and popular stories of the sea, says—"Man is but a rough pebble without the attrition received from contact with the other sex; it is wonderful how the ladies pumice a man down into a smoothness, which occasions him to roll over and over with the rest of his species, jostling, but not wounding his neighbors, as the waves of circumstances bring him into collision with them."

TO ANTI-PHRENOLOGISTS!

The Boston Phrenological society, referring to an advertisement published in July last, offering a premium of one hundred dollars for the best article to disprove the doctrines of Phrenology, being desirous of obtaining a greater number of well written articles, from which to make a selection, have extended the time from the 1st of March to the 1st of July, 1836. All articles sent to the Recording Secretary before that time, free of expense to the society, and containing matter equal to fifty printed pages octavo, small pica, will be laid before a committee of professional gentlemen, who are disbelievers in the science of Phrenology, and the premium will be awarded, provided any article is received which in the estimation of the committee may be worthy of it. The rejected articles, of course to be at the disposal of the society.

JOHN S. SLEEPER,

Rec. Sec. of the Boston Phrenological society.
March, 1836.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 26th ult., by James Dean, Esq., Mr. JOHN FRANSAM, to Miss PHEBE JANE CONGER, all of this city.

In Columbia, Herkimer county, on the 17th ult., by Rev. Mr. French, Mr. DEWITT PURCHASE, to Miss POLLY, second daughter of Charles Young, all of Columbia.

In this city, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. WILLIAM R. TUPPER, to Miss AMANDA WHEELER, both of Minden.

In New-Hartford, by the same, Mr. JOSEPH RICHARDSON, to Miss HANNAH BEST, both of that place.

In Rossie, on the 23d ult., by Rev. A. Wood, Mr. BENJAMIN BARKER, to Miss MARGARET MYERS, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 28th ult., RUFUS KING GROSH, second son of Jacob Grosh, Esq., of Marietta, Pa., and eldest brother of the senior proprietor of this paper, in the 28th year of his age.

An uncommonly severe attack of scarlet fever, in December, 1834, deprived his very feeble constitution of its elasticity, and rendered his health more than usually fluctuating. His mind, too, uncommonly active and firm, was deprived of much of its cheerfulness and energy—which last was restored as he drew near to the bed of death, and especially manifested itself in enduring most patiently his sufferings, uncomplainingly submitting to every direction of his physician, and in constant endeavors to lessen the labors of those who ministered to his wants. He was confined to his room but six days; and though his mind wandered much, his patience and submission never forsook him, and his gratitude for kindness, and his cheerful recognition of friends were manifest in every lucid interval. More might be added, but this notice is intended for those who knew him best, and loved him much, and who will often bedew his memory with the tears of affection. May they be enabled to bow with submission to God, in this, his providence, gratefully remembering how long the deceased was spared through many dangers and sicknesses—how gently he was removed from us, and how kindly the same kind Parent has provided for our everlastingly blissful reunion with him in another and a better world.

"I will arise

* * * * *
And give my soul to peace; for death is but.

A kind and gentle servant, who unlocks

With noiseless hand life's flower-encircled door,

To show us those we love."

A. B. G.

In East Hempfield, Lancaster county, Pa., on the 14th ult., VERONICA GROSH, relict of Matthias Grosh, in the 67th year of her age. She had for sometime been afflicted with dropsy, which increasing in severity, gradually terminated her earthly existence. Some years since, when the doctrine of universal salvation became a common theme, as a new doctrine, it found in her an old believer. For many years her reflections and experience had filled her with such confidence in God, that she was confident he would not make any one endlessly miserable.

The funeral was attended on the 16th, and a discourse preached by Rev. Jacob Myers.

In Marietta, Pa., October 26, 1835, Mr. ABRAHAM ZUBLIN, aged about 48 years. About six weeks previous to his decease, he fell from a rail road bridge, in Virginia, where he was working at a contract, which brought on a fever. In a few days, however, he was able to return to his family, and continued improving in health, when he was suddenly taken down, and in two or three days departed, leaving a wife, four children, and a large circle of relatives and friends to lament their deprivation of a kind husband and parent—a firm friend, a useful citizen and an honest man.

In North Norwich, on the 6th of March last, Mrs. NANCY CORBIN, in the 53d year of her age, consort of Sylvester Corbin, Esq.

In the death of this amiable woman, the society of which she was a member, and the circle of friends in which she moved have sustained an irreparable loss. The husband is deprived of an affectionate companion—and the children grieve for the loss of the kindest and best of mothers. The Christian community likewise will feel deprived of one who studied to adorn the doctrine of God her Saviour, in all things.

The deceased had been for many years an exemplary and firm believer in the doctrine of the final restitution. She bore her illness, though distressing, with fortitude and resignation to her heavenly Father's will.

She selected Psalm cxvi: 7, from which she requested the writer to deliver a discourse at her funeral. The services were performed at the Baptist meeting-house in the presence of a large concourse of sympathising friends and acquaintances.

Peace be to the memory of our departed sister! We trust she has gone to participate largely in that rest which she so fondly anticipated, as remaining for the people of God.

May infinite mercy heal the wounds of the afflicted relatives and friends—and give them the glorious hope of meeting again the kindred spirits that have gone before them in the paradise of God, where pain and sorrow shall be banished forever.

In Cleveland, O., on the 10th of March last, after a short illness, Capt. GEORGE W. KNIGHT, formerly of the firm of Knight and Place, merchants of this city, aged 30 years. It will be gratifying for his friends to learn, that though he was among strangers, he was kindly attended, and every necessary aid was afforded by his physicians.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY EVANGELIST J. LEWIS.

"But wisdom is justified of her children." Matt. xi: 19.

The proper application of these words will hardly be perceived, and their pertinency duly appreciated, unless the reader be well acquainted with the context, commencing at the 16th verse. Permit me then to transcribe the whole passage. "But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented. For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil. The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But wisdom is justified of her children."

The declaration in this passage, that "John came neither eating nor drinking," was by no means intended to convey the idea which we, in this age, should most naturally receive from the words—namely, that he subsisted entirely without food or drink. Its import is merely this, that his diet was not of the ordinary kind. Luke, in his memoirs of our Lord, represents him as saying, on this occasion, that "John the Baptist came neither eating bread, nor drinking wine." See Luke vii: 31-35. And Matthew and Mark both inform us, that his food was "locusts and wild honey."

The expression "He hath a devil," is the same as saying, in the language of the moderns, "He is insane." The Jews of our Saviour's time, as also the people of most other nations, supposed that insanity, hypochondria, epilepsy, etc., were occasioned by the agency of what our translators call devils, but which is better rendered demons, as the English word demon comes from the Greek word used by the evangelists in their accounts of those that were possessed. With respect to the nature of these demons or devils, it may not be amiss to state that they were supposed to be human ghosts, or the souls of dead men, who were believed to have the power of entering into, or taking the possession of, the living, and of producing, by their presence and influence, those effects which we in modern times attribute to diseases of the brain and nervous system.

The term "wisdom," as employed in the Scriptures, is of various import. It seems to denote knowledge in general; contrivance, skill; a discretionary faculty not unlike what we call common sense; the practice of moral virtue; religious attainments; religious truth. This last I take to be its meaning in our text. Wisdom is there personified, being represented as a parent, and denotes Gospel truth, or what St. Paul denominates "the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom," taught and explained by himself and his fellow-laborers in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

By wisdom's "children," we are to understand her votaries and advocates; in other words, the religious reformers of that age. These were Jesus with his disciples, and also John the Baptist.

The expression "justified of her children," signifies justified in, or respecting, her children's conduct; since it was manifest that the charges preferred against them by their religious opposers, were dictated by a fault-finding disposition, and had no foundation in truth.

John the Baptist used only one kind of food—the Scribes and Pharisees called him a crazy man.

Jesus ate and drank of whatever was set before him—him they denounced as a glutton and a tippler. The dietetic habits of John and of Jesus were exactly opposite, yet these bigots found fault with both of them in relation to that subject. Jesus therefore compared them to a group of children under the influence of sheer peevishness, charging their mates with doing every thing wrong and not any thing right. Then, adverting to the charges which they had brought against John and himself, and thus evincing the justice of his comparison, he declared that wisdom was justified of her children; which is the same as to say that it was evident that wisdom's children were not in fault, for they were blamed both for doing and for not doing.

In view of this subject, permit me now to advert to certain circumstances in the present age. Universalists claim to be religious reformers. They profess to believe that their distinguishing tenets were held and advocated by the first Christians; and that many points of doctrine which are now commonly received as a part of Christianity, are mere inventions of men. Universalism is spreading; but, like every other reform, it has to encounter great opposition. Objections the most startling, and apparently of the most weighty kind, are constantly being brought against it, and in considerable numbers. To these objections Universalists have by no means been backward in replying. They have shown that the greater part are totally unfounded in truth, and they contend that some things brought as objections against the doctrine, ought rather to be considered as arguments in its favor. And what is a singular fact, scarce a new objection has been invented for a number of years. They are all old ones, or nearly all, and have been refuted scores and hundreds of times! Still, however, they are brought forward again and again, and are repeated, and reiterated, and insisted upon, as though they had never been answered, and were in fact unanswerable. This being the case, Universalists have been in a manner compelled to repeat, and continue repeating, their refutations; and they will probably have to do so for a considerable period yet to come.

Jesus, in refuting the charges brought against himself and John, as related in the passage which contains our text, saw fit merely to bring those charges together, and thus exhibit their contradictory nature. I design to take a similar course in answering the objections raised against Universalism. I think it can be shown that many, if not most of these objections, are contradictory to other objections which are likewise brought; and if this can be shown, I shall deem it a fair conclusion, that in this case, as in the one to which our text refers, "wisdom is justified of her children."

1. What is more common than for our opposers to charge us with holding and teaching that mankind go to heaven in their sins? And yet it is also asserted that we believe and teach that sinners are to be cleansed from their sins by the fire of hell in a future state! The placing of these allegations together I deem to be, in ordinary cases, a sufficient answer to both; but for the benefit of some persons into whose hands this may fall, I remark further, that Universalists do not believe nor teach as either of the above charges represent. On the contrary, they hold and inculcate that mankind are to be saved, not in, but from their sins; and that this is to be effected by the grace of God, through the mediation of Jesus Christ, "who taketh away the sin of the world."

2. It is frequently said that Universalism is a new doctrine, lately invented. Yet, perhaps in the very next breath, the same individual will declare that it was preached by the serpent in the garden of Eden! Let those two assertions be placed side by side, and we should think they would sufficiently neutralize each other, by merely being left together. For some, however, it may not be entirely useless to remark, that our sentiments are neither so new as the first statement pretends, nor were they preached so long ago, as is declared by the latter. For though "the restitution of all things," (which is our distinguishing tenet,) is indisputably a very ancient doctrine, it being, according to St. Peter, that "which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began;" still, from the very nature of the case, it was not till after the serpent had been preaching his doctrine, and man by transgression had come to know good and evil, that Jehovah gave the very first intimation of this restitution, by declaring that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head.

3. It is often averred that Universalists do not believe what they profess, for that their doctrine is so manifestly false, no one can really believe it. But perhaps the very next thing we hear on the subject, is, that Universalists are given over to believe a lie, that they may be damned. "Whereunto shall I liken this generation?" If our opposers themselves believe the first declaration, they manifest no little folly, in laboring so earnestly to put down a doctrine no person believes in—and if they believe the latter assertion, they manifest no less presumption in attempting to save those whom the Almighty has "given over"! That reasonable beings should engage so earnestly in propagating what they know to be false, and what they know no one will embrace, is very strange, indeed, to say the least—and some may believe it possible for that very reason—and that God should "give over" to damnation those who believe him all goodness and ascribe to him the highest fulness of glory, may also seem very credible to the same class—but for our own part we can believe neither of their querulous complaints of Universalism. For God "hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence; having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things, in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth, even in him; in whom also we have [already] obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." Eph. i: 8-13.

4. We are frequently and perseveringly certified, in the face of abundant testimony to the contrary, that Universalism will never give us peace and confidence in the dying hour. Yet, in the next breath, to show us that they are not opposed to the enlarged benevolence and charity which leads to the entertainment of our faith, the adversary will tell us how earnestly he desires it to be true—how he would rejoice in it, if God would accomplish it—that he "would be the happiest being in the world" if he could only believe it! Though there is a contradiction here, we will not be so uncharitable as to pronounce both sides of it opposed to truth. The latter may probably be the language of the man—but the former, we are certain, is the teaching of the sectarian. That such is the fact, and not merely my assertion, will be evident when you demand, and receive from him, the proofs by which he would substantiate his first declaration. He will bring some apocryphal individual, whose name is an initial and whose residence is a blank, that "was once a Universalist—but when he came to die, he was wrapped up in unutterable and indescribable agonies of soul, for fear he should be—saved endlessly, with the whole human race? No—not that—but “for fear he should be endlessly damned.” So that instead of being rendered miserable in his dying moments, by his belief in Universalism, the poor soul died in despair for the want of it! Oh, miserable man without a name and without a residence, had he only continued to believe in Universalism, he would have been, and died, “the happiest man in the world!” Surely—surely “Wisdom is justified of her children.”

Many such pairs of assertions might be adduced, but my object is merely to furnish a sample. I therefore conclude with the following:—

Universalism is commonly denounced by its opposers as the worst doctrine that ever was preached. It is stigmatized as licentious, heretical, abominable, damnable; and, indeed, almost every other epithet expressive of badness, is frequently heaped upon it. Yet, strange to relate, we are sometimes told by individuals of the same class, that our doctrine is “too good to be true!” Strange, that while “every good and perfect gift cometh down from above,” the only truly good and perfect doctrine should come up from beneath! We end as we began, “But Wisdom is justified of her children.”

IDLENESS.

BY REV. ASHER MOORE.

The laws of Solon declared, that “no son should be obliged to maintain his father, if he had not taught him a trade.” And “he that was thrice convicted of idleness, was to be declared infamous.” The habitual idler is seldom a solitary individual: for he still possesses so much of the man as to be social in his nature. He commonly has some places of resort, to which he stately repairs for the purpose of squandering away the invaluable blessing of time. At first his visits are less frequent, and his stay much shorter, than after he has made a regular business of laziness! The wants of his family would occasionally enter his mind, when he first commenced the habitual neglect of his proper business and duties to himself, and those under his care. But habit being allowed to exercise an unrestrained influence over his feelings and conduct, he soon became alike indifferent to the duties of a husband, a father, and a man. He now seeks his highest good in an unmanly and stupid indolency. And because he “provides not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.” 1 Tim. v: 8.

But the idleness of this man not only deprives himself and family of the comforts and happiness of life; but it also leads to other species of wickedness. Although it may seem a solecism, it is nevertheless true, that the idler is always employed! Man is an active being; and when not engaged in some suitable calling, he will be employed in prostituting his time and talents to vile and unlawful purposes. And indolence, in innumerable cases, is the first step, not only to crime and infamy, but also to the prison and the gallows!

Furthermore—The blighting influence of the idler's example not only affects himself, and those whose supporter he ought to be; but it also extends to others around him. Being fond of company, he is ever ready to persuade the industrious man to forsake his daily avocation, and visit the alehouse, or some other place of public resort, to “kill time.” He is acquainted with many sports and amusements: and he thinks it much better for a man to enjoy life, than to die a slave at the work-bench. And so far from being a mere drone in society, he is actively engaged in multiplying the number of idlers.

Now this individual, although he may not be an exceedingly vicious man, and may seem to do nothing either for or against the morals of community, is constantly exerting a pernicious influence in his social circle. A few such men in a village, particularly if they happen to be engaging and captivating in their manners, may soon affect the whole neighborhood, and lead the mass of the villagers into a state of deplorable laziness. And in that event, the effects which would necessarily follow need not be described.

While on this subject, we may incidentally remark that, in our judgment, every man should be engaged in some laudable employment. And his recreations, which are allowable and ought to be enjoyed, should never interfere with the faithful transaction of his business, and the discharge of his proper duties in life.

ATTENDANCE OF MEETINGS.

“Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is.”

In order to keep alive, in the mind, the spirit of religion, it is indispensable that believers meet together, frequently and regularly, for the object of religious worship and association—to learn the truths of the Gospel—to imbibe its hopes, and chasten their natures into conformity with its purifying requirements—for the cultivation of that friendly intercourse of mind with mind and heart with heart, by which the vital spark is fanned into a flame, extending itself over the whole nature, enlightening the understanding, gladdening the heart, warming the affections, and purifying the conduct.

Wherever this practice is entirely neglected for a length of time, the light of devotion gradually grows dim, and finally goes out. The people become estranged from one another—the golden chain of brotherhood is rusted asunder—the intellectual faculties grow dormant by disease—the springs of religious ecstasy cease to vibrate, and what was once a source of thrilling pleasure, becomes a burden and a task.

Nothing will sooner destroy the prosperity of a religious society, than a protracted neglect of regularly assembling themselves together. The flock becomes scattered—the moral pasture grows up to weeds and thistles—many of the flock become the prey of moral wolves, or fall into pits of vice, whence it is difficult to extricate them.

Besides, a society, by such neglect, loses its reputation for zeal and piety, and justly so. A religious society without meetings of worship, is like a government without a legislation. Its own members lose confidence in its stability, and it becomes a hissing and a by-word among men.

And when a society is blest with regular meetings, and a stated ministration of the word, those members who absent themselves, unnecessarily, wound the cause they professedly labor to sustain. The pious and warm-hearted, who are seeking truth, will be discouraged from embracing it, by such examples of indifference, sooner than from almost any other cause. I beseech you, therefore, brethren, not to forsake the assembling of yourselves together.

HERESY DEFINED.

On the 25th ult., I had the pleasure of attending a “church meeting” among our Presbyterian brethren, not a hundred miles from Hannibalville, Oswego county, when I saw such bigotry exhibited, as is the legitimate fruit of a Partialist creed.

An individual who had, for a number of years, been a member of the Presbyterian church—who had always sustained an irreproachable moral character, and who cherished for a long time, with uncommon ardor, “the tradition of the elders,” was charged with embracing “heresy.” She was summoned to appear before her brethren of the church, to answer to this charge. Having received some encouragement from the deacon of the church, to believe that she would not be condemned without a hearing, she prepared an able defence of considerable length, which she intended to read when called to trial. But, alas! instead of being suffered to offer her defence, she was denied the privilege (no doubt because she was a heretic) of asking her pastor a few simple questions! Thus the labor which she had spent in preparing her defence, was rendered of no avail, and she was condemned, as a heretic, to suspension from the church for three months—and that too without a hearing—at the expiration of which time, she will undoubtedly be excommunicated for embracing the heretical doctrine which teaches us that God “will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.”

As they had charged her with heresy, and repeated this charge a number of times in her presence, she requested them to define the term. The following is the definition, which is submitted to the public, in hopes of doing some good: “Heresy, to us, is a denial of our ‘Confession of Faith.’” This definition was given by Deacon H., and sanctioned by Rev. Mr. D.

Now, if this be a correct definition of the term heresy—(and who would presume to question an Orthodox definition of it?) then all Methodists, Baptists, Episcopalians, and, in short, every class of professing Christians, except Presbyterians, must bear up under the name of heretics. And as heretics, in the estimation of these pious saints, are to be doomed to suffer remediless woe, will not all but those who have embraced the doctrines contained in the “Confession of Faith,” sink beneath the wrath of an offended God, to the dark and dismal regions of despair, to rise no more forever? Nay, more; if it be heresy to deny the Presbyterian “Confession of Faith,” and all who embrace heresy are to suffer interminable woe, will not a vast majority of nominal Presbyterians share the like dreadful fate? Is it said that heretics may ultimately reach the regions of purity above? Then one of the following hypotheses must be admitted, viz., 1. There is “a change after death,” (which by Partialists is denied,) or 2. There are heretics in heaven, who never will be brought to a knowledge of the truth.

If the former be admitted and maintained, we may with propriety contend that all will be changed. If the latter is contended for, we ask if it is not a heaven-demoralizing doctrine? and if those who have been sound in the faith here, would not want a “church meeting” to be held there, in order to excommunicate those from heaven, whom they had here excommunicated from their church? If neither of the above hypotheses be granted, then we come to the painful conclusion that all who deny the “Confession of Faith,” held by the Presbyterians, (including a vast majority of the Presbyterians themselves,) must be forever excluded from heaven? Find one individual who openly and frankly avows his belief in the following portion of that precious book, the “Confession,” and I grant that you have seen something that my eyes have never been permitted to rest upon; or at least I never heard one acknowledge his belief in it. These are the articles to which I allude: “By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death.”

“These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and so definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished.”—Con. chap. iii, § 3, 4. And if none of the members who belong to the church, to which we have alluded, believe in this portion of their sacred creed book, they, according to their own showing, are heretics. If they do believe in it, why not reject the Bible, or at least that portion of it which plainly contradicts this article of their creed, and preach up their sentiments without clothing them up in the heretical garb of Arminianism. Is heresy so much more pleasing to the mind of man than truth, as to warrant us in doing such violence to the latter, in order to secure its reception? I for one, think not. Truth, the fairest daughter of Heaven, must ultimately triumph over all her foes. And the sooner the filthy rags which superstition has hung around her lovely form, are torn asunder, the better for mankind will it be. Her attractions, when undisguised, are strong, and will secure the esteem of all who see them. D.

LETTER

To Rev. I. H. Walden, Baptist preacher at Massena, St. Lawrence county, N. Y.

DEAR SIR—Although I am a perfect stranger to you, still I hope you will receive this short and hasty communication as an act of kindness, and trust that a friendly answer will be given in return. It is to inform you that on or about the 28th day of June last past, I heard a discourse delivered by you, at Parishville, from the third chapter of Exodus, first clause of the fourteenth verse. It is not my intention (as you will plainly see) to say any thing for or against your discourse, but rather to receive information, if possible, in relation to an assertion made by you while delivering it. The assertion to which I allude, is as follows: "I have discontinued contending with Universalists, because they do not believe their doctrine." I have given the words verbatim, and you cannot deny them. Now, my dear friend, I earnestly call upon you to show by what authority you made this bold assertion. I deem proof very necessary in such a case as this, as you and every candid Christian will admit at once, that the unprejudiced mind can never be convinced of any truth by bare assertions. If you was in possession of proof, it was your duty as a Christian, to bring that proof forward; if you considered it as needing no proof, you labored under a great mistake—very great indeed.

"Do not believe their doctrine." By this, I suppose, you meant that they do not believe the doctrine they pretend to believe, not that they do not believe the doctrine they do believe. Therefore, if you prove that there are people who pretend to believe Universalism, and express themselves to that effect, when in fact they do not, you will then prove what I already knew before, and that is, that they are hypocrites and not Universalists, as you term them. I might make the same assertion upon the same principle, but shame! forbids me taking such a step. It really appears to me that any person possessing a mind half as large as the little end of nothing whittled down to a point, could not be guilty of the like. And now, my friend, before I close, I entreat you to pause, and consider for one moment the course of such conduct, the manner in which you have so boldly attacked the opinions of your fellow-men. I am confident that if you possess one particle of that charity which "suffereth long and is kind," which "thinketh no evil" but "rejoiceth in the truth," you cannot but acknowledge that, unless you abide by what St. Paul has declared, to wit, "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good," and produce some shadow of proof to substantiate so base an assertion, you must, (I repeat it,) you must acknowledge that you have done that, which a Christian ought not to do. And may you be brought to know that "the ways of wisdom are the ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are paths of peace."

An answer to the foregoing is earnestly requested, by one who subscribes himself your friend, rejoicing in the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation from sin and wretchedness and their ultimate restoration to holiness and happiness.

Canton, October 24, 1835.

JOHN F. AMES.

N. B. The Rev. gentleman, (?) for reasons best known to himself, I suppose, has paid no attention whatever to the foregoing communication.

THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN.

The leading principles upon which the government of our highly favored land is established; and which are thought to characterize all its physical operations, are admirably delineated in that celebrated instrument which declares, that by nature mankind are equal—"that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

We question not the validity or reasonableness of these principles, because we believe that they are founded upon the most equitable law in nature; which is that of equality. And we have only to regret that they are not more generally adhered to in the ordinary pursuits of life. For if they form the broad basis upon which the stupendous fabric of our political government is reared, we can perceive no reason why they should not form also a prominent feature in our civil and religious rights and privileges.

Loud are the prayers, and numerous are the signatures of those who petition our legislatures, praying for the furtherance of the privileges of education, as the most efficient means to secure the permanency of government, and lasting honors to some, and indescribable happiness to all its recipients. In unison with these petitions, the philanthropist and statesman plead for the special favor of government, in clear and vivid language and with irresistible arguments, maintaining it to be the height of human folly, to trust the perpetuity of our invaluable liberties to any thing short of a general diffusion of knowledge. Thus public feeling is excited—public interest awakened—special favors solicited, and special privileges granted. Seminary after seminary, college after college, and university after university are founded, and furnished with all necessary (if not superfluous) appendages. No cost is spared. Libraries, chemical, philosophical, and astronomical (and we might add theological) apparatus, are but specimens of public liberality. And all this for what? The general diffusion of knowledge? To teach the rising generation that by nature mankind are equal? "That they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"? Is it not rather for the exclusive benefit of a part of community; and that, too, definite and certain? For the peculiar favor of the sons of learning, to the total exclusion of the unassuming part of their species? Yes, all these benefits are conferred upon the darling sons of America; while her defenceless daughters are left to grope in ignorance and mental bondage. Not a single institution in our whole country, is reared for the amelioration of their condition. No chartered privileges—no liberal donations—no public appropriations—no fostering arm is extended to alleviate the mental sufferings of the hapless female; and "to raise her in nearer approximation to that higher and happier condition, the object of her hopes and aspirations in her present state of existence." Governed and guided by virtue alone, courteously receiving the scanty pittance assigned her for three months at a select school; or perhaps for a term at some inferior academy, she completes her education; and with but a mere foretaste of science, and its redeeming influences upon the soul; and shut out from all the departments of science which lead to further improvement, she is compelled to abandon her literary pursuits, and seek that happiness which is conferred only upon moral worth and personal merit.

But the unlettered boy meets with no such difficulties to impede his progress to knowledge and happiness. The way is not only clear before him, but every inducement is held out to call forth and enlarge his intellectual powers. His superior advantages inspire that confidence which ever insures success. And with glowing ardor and undaunted ambition, he enters upon the road which leads to "fame's high hill," whose "laurel spreads its everlasting green" over science and erudition. And his progress, though slow at first, and perhaps outstripped by the assiduous female when on equal footing, is eventually accelerated by a foretaste of those innumerable joys to which she must forever remain an entire stranger. At the age of sixteen or eighteen, they both leave the select school or academy, one with a mere preparatory to a four or six years' course in some college or university; the other with a "finished education." The latter returns to the busy scenes of domestic life. The former, after having enjoyed both public and private exclusive advantages; is honored, and receives many marks of favor, and innumerable emoluments for his superior acquirements. But the female, if not stigmatized, is charged with imbecility of mind; and is considered in the most vulgar sense of the phrase, as a mere "helpmate." While, at the same time, by the fundamental laws of nature it is proved that they are originally equal.

But what renders this disparity in the means of intellectual improvement between the two sexes still more aggravating, is, that it is tolerated by those who make the loudest professions of attachment to the principles of equality—who disclaim all feelings of superiority over their fellow-beings—who contend that knowledge is happiness, as well as the germ of every ennobling virtue—and who, having science for a guide, and "equality" for a motto, make such an unequal distribution of the means of national, social, and personal happiness.

From the unmerited neglect of female education, we are induced to infer one of two things, either that females are considered not susceptible of as much mental improvement as males—that, therefore, their education is neglected on the principle that it should be encouraged most where it will shine most conspicuously. (Though philosophy teaches us that the weak should have superior advantages to the strong, as it is one great object of art to supply the defects of nature.) Or that they are considered susceptible of more mental improvement than males; and that their education is retarded, lest they should outstrip their timorous companions in intellectual and scientific improvement. The latter opinion, however, is not so prevalent as the former; though it may reasonably be inferred that it prevails to some extent; as many seem to regard with a jealous eye, every advance of female education. But the former is the more general and pernicious sentiment; and therefore the most to be deprecated. For it tends to a wider separation of the two sexes; and seems to sink deeper in ignorance that mind, which, if educated, enlivened, and invigorated by the blessings of education, would not detract any thing from the character and dignity of man. But by being better qualified to direct the infant mind to future scenes of usefulness, would "open new avenues to the dominion of man over the material creation," and increase his means of enjoyment.

Besides, we are not yet prepared to admit that females are not susceptible of as much mental improvement, as males. When any physical defect in the mind of woman shall be discovered—when all paragons of female magnanimity, whose characters have graced the pages of history, shall be forgotten—and when it shall be proven that Queen Elizabeth was a mere prodigy of female excellence, who, not in common with her sex, possessed a bold and original genius, or when the same privileges for mental improvement shall be extended to all, and not as great proficiency made by the female as by the male—then, and not till then, let it be said, that females are not susceptible of as much mental improvement as males.

Man has long taken for granted that which needs proof. He has long considered woman as his inferior in mental capabilities; forgetting that there is no possible distinction made in that holy declaration which declares, that "in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." With this presumption, he "lords it over God's heritage," with unlimited sway,

"He doth bestride the narrow world, and makes all things subservient to his insatiable desires.
Like a Colossus,"

I know that this is unpopular. And perhaps my temerity may incur the displeasure and indignation of the "lords of creation." Be it so. My object is not ambition. But I shall be most happy, in being instrumental in raising the character of the female sex to its proper and native dignity; that woman may with confidence assert those rights which are coeval with her existence—obtain equal privileges for education, and receive all its attendant blessings.

OBJECTIONS TO UNIVERSALISM CONSIDERED.....No. II.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

Among the objections urged against Universalism, is the complaint, that "Universalists preach too much against other denominations." If, by this objection is meant, that Universalists preach too much about the moral character of other denominations, and wickedly misrepresent them or their religious opinions, it may be replied, that Universalism does not approve of such a practice, nor am I sensible that it does prevail to any considerable extent, among us. So far as my acquaintance extends, there is no class of professing Christians more charitable in their remarks on the moral character of other denominations, than Universalists are. It is granted, that there may be instances, in which the moral character of other denominations has unjustly suffered through a misunderstanding; but it should not be forgotten, that while they may have unjustly suffered once, Universalists are constantly the subjects of abuse and slander from all quarters; so that if the objection proves any thing against us, it proves much more against our opposers.

But, it is said, Universalists are harping too much about the opinions of other denominations, and preaching too much against them. Well, would the objector have us preach in support of what we do not believe? Would he have us to adopt that sickly policy, which prohibits all investigation of erroneous sentiments, and forbids the support of our own? If this is his demand, we assure him, that we hope never to prove ourselves so cowardly, and so reckless to all sense of moral duty, as to meet his accommodation. Error is admitted by all to be an evil. Hence, those who have embraced it, must suffer its consequences, until it is removed. Does the objector require of me to let those errors alone, and look indifferently upon the misery of those who are suffering from these causes? Would such conduct be consistent with the character of a philanthropist, or with a profession of love for their welfare? As certainly as God has made it our duty to do good, just so certainly has he required of us to expose error, wherever we may find it; that the unhappy subject thereof may enjoy that happiness, which the truth only can impart. And I can see no good reason, why a person should be dissatisfied because I investigate his opinions; for if those opinions are correct, they will stand; and if they are incorrect, he may profit by my labor, and receive truth for error. In either case, he will lose nothing, but may gain much.

Sober and candid investigation should, however, be distinguished from invective, misrepresentation, and abuse. If I labor in the cause of truth, it is against error; or if I labor in the service of Partialism, my labors, as a consequence, are against Universalism. If I labor to support the doctrine of universal salvation, I preach no more against endless misery, than the person who contends for the truth of this doctrine, does against Universalism. I certainly have the same reason to object to the doctrine of all other denominations, because they preach against my faith, as they have to object to Universalism, because I preach against them.

"But," says the objector, "I do not like to hear Universalists run down other denominations." If by this, he means their moral characters, I say, agreed. If Universalists ever say of other denominations, that they are totally depraved, it is wrong; for their doctrine will not support them in making the statement. The truth is, there are a great many virtuous and worthy people, in all Christian churches, and as to the number of bad members, or the degree of their depravity, it is not the duty of any Universalist to decide. We believe that they are much better, than they say they are. At least, it seems almost incredible, that any church should be as wicked as its pastors often represent them to be. But, be this as it may, the imperfections of others should not be taken as a standard of our duty. Christ is our example.

Let us teach what he taught, though the whole world object to it. Let us live as he lived, though we live alone. In doing this, we shall not preach against any individual or denomination; though we show them all their errors and sins; but we shall preach for their edification, consolation, and moral improvement. We say, then, to the objector, that although the habit of evil speaking may have obtained, in some cases, among us; yet we have never run any one down to total depravity, or represented them as worthy of no better fate, than endless misery.

DIALOGUE

Between a Universalist and a Methodist.

Methodist. What evidence have you that the doctrine of universal salvation is true?

Universalist. What evidence have I? The best evidence in the world—the words of Christ and his holy apostles. Christ's language is, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand. All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but raise it up again at the last day." Paul, in his letter to Timothy says, God "will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." "For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." To the Ephesians, he says, God "hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence; having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself: that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him." Such is the evidence upon which the doctrine of universal salvation rests. "Line upon line" of similar testimony might be adduced, to prove that all will finally be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth.

M. Yes, but don't you know that the word all in the Scriptures, does not mean all? does not mean every body? Have you never read the passage which says, "Then went out to him (John,) Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan?" Now, you do not believe that each and every individual in the land of Judea was baptized by John in Jordan—for it is evident that the Pharisees and Sadducees, who comprised a considerable portion of the Jews, had no part or lot in the matter. Just so with passages which you have quoted. They do not mean that every individual of the human race is finally to be saved, any more than the one to which I have directed your attention means, that John baptized every individual in Judea.

U. Brother, do you believe that Christ died for all mankind?

M. Do I believe that Christ died for all mankind? Certainly I do—all Methodists believe that "for all, for all, our Lord was crucified."

U. But what evidence have you that he did?

M. Why, the apostle Paul says, "We thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead," "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time."

U. But remember, brother, that all don't mean all. Have you forgotten the passage which says, "Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan?" Can't you see that all don't mean all? Brother, be careful! Calvinistic weapons were never made for Arminians to wield. They answer Universalists as good a turn as they do Arminians. If you wish to ascertain the true meaning of the word all, "search the Scriptures," and in so doing keep this rule (and it is an important one,) in view, viz. "That whenever we meet with the word all in connexion with any point of doctrine, it always means literally and mathematically the whole, including all its parts; but where it is used historically, it frequently admits of hyperbole. This use of the word is consistent with common sense and common usage. To illustrate this rule, consider Heb. ii: 8. 'For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him.' And also 1 Cor. xv: 27. 'For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he, [only,] is excepted, which did put all things under him.' In these passages the apostle gives instances of the word being taken in its fullest latitude, when connected with doctrines. When we meet with it in relation to the death of Christ for men; the same extensive sense of the word is necessarily understood, as Psa. liii: 6. 'The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.' The prophet had been saying, 'All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way.' It is evident that he here describes the whole human race; for we have all sinned and come short of the glory of God; so that he asserts, that all who have gone astray, have had their iniquities laid upon Christ. This can never be disproved, unless it can be shown that some men have not sinned; which would be an express contradiction both of Scripture and experience." In historical passages it is different, as in the passage quoted by you, which we know means only a part. I presume, therefore, that the rule which I have laid down, is strictly true, and if kept in view, in reading the Scriptures, will be of great service to you, and to all sincere inquirers after truth. DEDICATION AT BANGOR.

On March 10th, the new Union meeting-house at Bangor, Franklin county, N. Y., was dedicated to the worship of the one living and true God. This house, which is neatly finished, and pleasantly situated on the road between Malone and Hopkinton, was erected by the assistance of the friends of five different sects, viz., Baptists, Universalists, Christians, Methodists, and Presbyterians; therefore, each denomination felt an anxiety to employ a preacher of their own choice, to preach the dedication discourse.

Not being willing to agree on any one to officiate on that day, they finally resolved, that each denomination should obtain a preacher of their own choice, and each be permitted to deliver a discourse. That no misunderstanding might arise between the parties, a committee was appointed to arrange the order of services; and after some conversation and disagreement, they hit upon the following expedient. The names of the five different denominations were respectively written on a slip of paper, and drawn from a box. They were drawn in the following order, viz., 1. Presbyterian, 2. Baptist, 3. Universalist, 4. Methodist, 5. Christian. And by these the following preachers were appointed—by the Presbyterians, Mr. Parmalee—by the Baptists, Mr. Case—by the Universalists, the writer—by the Methodists, Mr. Graves—and by the Christians, Mr. Denio.

On Thursday, at 10 o'clock, the people began to assemble. The weather was pleasant, and at half-past ten, the house was comfortably filled—Mr. Parmalee arrived. After the usual ceremonies, introductory to his discourse, he named the fifteenth Psalm, as his text. In his exordium, which was very prolix, he expressed great anxiety and concern of mind in relation to the probable result of that day's meeting. He stated that he hoped, inasmuch as the people had assembled peaceably, that nothing might be said, or done, to mar the happiness of that day's worship. And after making an apology for not being prepared, (having had but eight days notice for preparation,) and the embarrassment of being obliged to preach the first discourse, he proceeded to remark, that he expected the congregation, and especially those that were to follow him in the ministry, would give their undivided attention to what he was about to offer, as he expected to return the compliment with equal candor; that he hoped doctrines would be laid aside; that all might be done in unanimity and with harmony.

He then proceeded to his text, and strange as it may appear, he preached a discourse purely doctrinal, from the beginning to the end! Not one sentence escaped his lips, in relation to the dedication of that house to the worship of the one living and true God, which was the occasion of our assembling on that day. I have been thus particular in relation to Mr. Parmelee, not that I expect to give the particulars of all the proceedings at that meeting, but that the public may judge of the integrity and sincerity of a man, professing to be a follower of Christ, and a leader of the people—a man, who, for nearly thirty years, has been a Presbyterian preacher.

Saying nothing of his misquotations, and extravagant and erroneous conclusions, at five minutes past one, he closed. At the close, it was announced that Mr. Case, the Baptist preacher would occupy the stand at two o'clock. Two o'clock arrived, and Mr. Case did not appear, (being called upon to officiate at a funeral;) and I was called to the desk.

After the ceremonies of reading, prayer, and singing were over, (and the singing in the afternoon was such as did honor to the choir,) I selected Isa. xxv: 6-8, for my text. I considered the figurative language of my text, what was to be understood by the phrases "mountain," "feast," "veil," "covering," etc. As I began, there was a mighty stir among the clergy—paper and pencil was in good demand. It was novel to see, though painful to relate, that very Mr. Parmelee, who, but one hour before, enjoined the most profound attention and seriousness, join with Mr. Graves, (Methodist,) in making derision of the great subjects of religion! and this too, by laughing, sneering, etc., so as to attract the attention of the audience to their unbecoming behaviour, and call down upon their own heads the public contempt, which their heartless, anti-Christian conduct so justly merited!

When I came to remark on the "veil" and "covering," spoken of by the prophet, I remarked that, undoubtedly, it signified ignorance, blindness, and superstition. The Rev. gentlemen laughed visibly; as I saw it, I remarked, that, lest I should appear singular in this view of the subject, I would notice, that Dr. A. Clark, Dr. Thomas Scott, and several other critics, take the same view of the subject. As I proceeded on, one and another laid by their paper and pencils, and appeared more quiet. The house was every where filled to overflowing, and the whole congregation seemed completely absorbed and overwhelmed with the sublimity and grandeur of the inspiring theme.

I lastly, set apart, offered up, and dedicated that house, the fruit of their zeal, and pious labor of their hands, to the worship of the one living and true God. The equal interest of all was plainly manifested on that occasion.

Here an opportunity presented itself for doing good. There were numbers present on that occasion, who never before heard the glad sound of the trumpet of universal salvation, many of whom had to say—"it was good for them to be there." The friends of Universalism in the vicinity of Bangor, express their satisfaction with the result of this meeting; and believe, that that meeting will eventuate in much good to the cause of universal reconciliation.

At the close of our services, it commenced raining, and continued to rain until dark. The Methodist gentleman, Mr. Graves, occupied the desk in the evening. I was not present, but was credibly informed by those who were there, that his entire theme in all he said was against Universalism. Not one word concerning dedication! I was informed that he called me a liar and a deceiver; and stated that I had made a false quotation from Drs. Clark and Scott—that neither of those authors had any such remarks as I had quoted, on Isa. xxv: 6-8. Either he did not know what they did say on the subject, or he intended to deceive.

Ye reverend leaders of the people! Can you, in view of your conduct at Bangor, say to your people, "be ye followers of me?" Can you say, "Go thou, and do likewise?"

I cannot do justice to this subject and to the honor of those reverend gentlemen who were present, but who did not officiate on that occasion, viz. Rev. Mr. Case, and Rev. Mr. Dunning, without remarking, that their conduct on that occasion was such as did honor to their names and professions. Let these gentlemen's conduct be contrasted with that of Messrs. Parmelee and Graves, on that occasion, and where will the latter conceal their blushes?

I should not have stated these proceedings thus minutely, had I not been specially requested so to do, by the friends of truth. The grand object of this request was, to show the public the great disparity between the precept and the example of those leaders, who expect heaven and happiness as a reward for their good works.

I was informed that the Rev. Mr. Denio, the Christian, preached a sermon the day following at that place. The weather was very unfavorable, and the success we have not learned.

In conclusion—It is confidently to be hoped, that the time is not far distant, when those who teach the people, and to whom they look for practical example, shall learn, not to be the first to trespass on those wholesome precepts they so earnestly recommend for the practice of others. While we pity the ignorance of those who profess to be leaders of the people, and know not that virtue in practice is preferable to vice; we will throw the cloak of charity over their infirmities, and say—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

LETTER TO THE EDITORS.

Henderson, Knox county, Ill., February 3, 1836.

DEAR BRETHREN—Having a few moments to spare, I trust you will not deem it amiss to give you a few particulars, relative to the cause of truth and righteousness in this part of the moral vineyard and heritage of our Lord.

When I removed to this place last Spring, I found a few who had the independence of mind to fearlessly advocate the truth; and a few copies of the "Sentinel and Star in the West" were taken; but this seemed not to create any alarm among the Partialist ranks. But as soon as the fact was ascertained, that a preacher of universal salvation had settled in this section of country, a great cry rose from the camp—"we must put him down, and if we can't by fair means, we must by other." But, alas! they were overheard. But they acted according to their saying, as I shall shortly show.

I pursued my course, proclaiming the glad tidings of the Gospel to the inquiring multitudes. At almost every meeting I was attended by the clergy of several denominations, frequently to the number of six or eight, with their books, pens, ink, and paper, on the right and on the left, to register whatever I might declare amiss, or whereby they could entangle me in conversation. Thus they continued for some length of time, frequently two or three attacking me at the close of my meetings, calling me by many hard names. I will relate one attack as a sample.

At an appointment in Knoxville, I had the happiness to deliver my joyful message to a very large congregation of devout hearers, from the words of our Saviour, recorded John x: 11-16. I discovered that I had many hearers of another faith; among whom were some clergymen. At the close of my sermon, I invited Rev. Mr. Clarke to close by prayer; at which Rev. Mr. Owen asked Mr. Clarke to give him the privilege to make some remarks. It being granted, Br. Owen took from a book a paper, which had been previously prepared, containing several propositions, declaring that the devil was the first Universalist preacher, and several others of the same tenor; asking, as he proceeded, several questions, which he wished the devil's preacher to answer, etc.

When he closed his remarks, I asked the use of his notes, which he granted. I then stated that I would inquire what is Universalism? Secondly, What doctrine did the serpent preach in the garden of Eden? Thirdly, Compare them together. Fourthly, Search for the doctrine, which at the present day, agrees with the doctrine of the serpent. And where do you think I found it? I found it in the creed of the Presbyterian church, the same to which Br. Owen belongs. I had not proceeded far, before Br. Owen rose from his seat, and went to the door to go out, but probably thinking his notes would betray him, he returned, and stepped up to the desk, and reached out his hand, and said, "If you will let me have my notes, I will be going." I solicited the use of them for a short time, but to no purpose. He, like the hireling in our text, when he saw the wolf coming, fled, to the no small edification of our hearers, and left me to pursue my course as I saw proper. Perhaps I need not add, that he has not molested me since.

Now brethren, if you can send me a young brother, who can stand such buffeting, send him along; I have more calls than I can attend to.

REASONS.....NO. IX.

FOR BELIEVING IN UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

"Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter iii: 15.

6. Of His justice. It has been shown under a former division of our subject that the justice of God stands directly opposed to the doctrine of endless misery. And it now remains to be shown that this attribute of the divine Being, so far from opposing, is actually in favor of the doctrine of final universal salvation. By taking this ground we do not by any means design to argue, nor do we believe, that man can merit, or on the score of works, justly claim salvation at the hand of God. For we are assured that after having done all that we are commanded to do, we are still unprofitable servants—we have done no more than simple duty required, and therefore on the score of merit can claim nothing towards salvation. And furthermore, we are assured that salvation is of grace—free, unmerited grace—not of works.

How then, it will be asked, if salvation is not of works, but of grace, can justice favor the idea of its universality, or even of its existence or occurrence at all? Answer; For the same reason that God requires all men to be holy because he is holy, he also requires all to be just because he is just: and as he requires all to be just, he will most assuredly seek and employ means of rendering them so. His justice can never be satisfied with the endless injustice of man: nor will anything short of the conformation of man—of man universally—to its righteous principles, ever fully satisfy the claims of divine justice, or the demands of the righteous law of the Most High. His law is the law of eternal justice: and that demands of all the exercise of love supreme to God and universal to man. And, respecting the accomplishment of the grand design of this righteous law of God, we are expressly assured by the Saviour that one jot or tittle of the law shall in no wise fail, but all shall be fulfilled. Now it is evident, when we consider what the requirement of the divine law is, that every jot and tittle of it shall be fulfilled, all mankind will be just and righteous, yielding strict obedience thereto, and thereby fulfilling the law; than which it is evident nothing else can satisfy the divine justice.

7. Of his paternity. God is not only infinitely wise, good, powerful, holy, merciful and just, with reference to all men, but he is also their Father. O, what an endearing name! what an enrapturing thought! that God is my Father—that he is your Father—that he is in fact the Father of all. “Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us?” Malachi ii: 10. Being the everlasting Father of the whole human family, he can never feel otherwise than as a Father towards any of them. For he created them, and not they themselves; and he perfectly knew before he created them what they would be. Human beings, and all other creatures, being imperfect, know not, when they become parents, what their offspring may be, nor how they will conduct; and from this cause as also from many other imperfections which the creature inherits, they are liable to change in their feelings and fluctuate in their parental conduct towards their offspring. Not so with God. He had no coadjutor in becoming the parent of mankind. Self-moved therefore—no cause operating upon him but his own eternal nature, will and purpose—he knew what he was about and what would be the nature and character of his offspring. And having voluntarily become the parent of mankind, no cause aside from himself—and his own nature is immutable—can ever divert his parental regard from the children he has created. To illustrate and enforce this truth he, by means of the prophet Isaiah, calls the attention of his once despairing people, who supposed he had forsaken them, to one of the most tender and pathetic similitudes in all nature; thus: “Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea they may forget, yet will I not forget thee.” Thus he shows that his affection far transcends that of an earthly parent, nay even that of the tenderest mother for her darling child, the son of her own womb, as far indeed, as infinite love exceeds finite. And this in the instance just cited, is obviously predicated of the parental relationship which God sustained towards that despairing people. Wherever therefore this relationship exists, there the divine love must ever exist and operate in all its native energy and efficacy. And inasmuch as he stands in this relation to all mankind, as above proved, he will never cease to interest himself on their behalf and seek their good, as of his own children.

It may be objected that God is not the Father of wicked men—that he stands in the relation of parent only to the pious and godly, etc. But this objection is without foundation, as is shown by the following facts. 1. Christ directed his hearers to pray, saying, “Our Father, etc.—forgive us our sins,” thus instructing sinners to call God Father. 2. Again, he says, (illustrating the superiority of God’s love for his offspring over that of man for his,) “What man—if his son ask bread, will give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will give him a serpent? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?” Matt. vii: 9-11. Thus calling God the Father of those who were evil or wicked. 3. The very people addressed in the touching figure of the mother and her sucking child, above noticed, were almost, if not quite, the wickedest people on the face of the earth at that time: and God, by that very prophet, (Isaiah i.) thus speaks of their deep depravity; “Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken; I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master’s crib: but Israel doth not know; my people doth not consider. Ah! sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children that are corrupters,” etc. Thus, however wicked and corrupt they were, they were still his people, still his children; and as such they shared his affection—he could not give them up.

It will require no labored argument to show that the parental character of God has great weight in favor of the final beatitude of all mankind. An appeal to earthly parents on this point will be sufficient for that class of our readers. Nay, we fear not to appeal to them in reference to the most froward and sinful of their children, and ask them if they feel any less affection or solicitude for them than for those children that have never disobeyed their commands or crossed their wishes. They will answer that they feel the same affection and even more solicitude and anxiety than for those who have always been obedient. And this feeling certainly accords with the feelings of high Heaven, if what Jesus said be true, that “there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety-nine just persons that need no repentance.”

8. Of his immutability. Having seen what are the amiable and glorious perfections and parental character of the divine Being, the idea of his immutability, super-added thereto, is an essential requisite to enable us to repose entire confidence in him for time and eternity. For if we supposed him ever so amiable and perfect now, and yet believed he were liable to change—to become the reverse to-morrow of what he is to-day—the opposite in eternity of what he is in time—we could never repose entire confidence in him—the mind would forever be fluctuating in doubt and vacillating between hope and fear. But having the assurance that God is the same yesterday, to-day and forever—that he is in one mind and none can turn him—that he is without variableness or even the shadow of turning—we cannot for a moment doubt or waver in our confidence in him. We know that time cannot change, or eternity make the slightest alteration in his character. Eternally and unchangeably wise, powerful, benevolent and paternal to all, he can never regard any of his children with any other feelings than those kindly affections with which he first called them from nonentity into being. Change and vicissitude may occur with them but never with him. They may grow worse or better in character, may remember or forget him, may love him more or less at any one time than another; but these changes affect not him. In the beautiful language of another, on the eternity of God, we may say respecting his character and immutability, when we look to his throne, “change and decay have never reached it; the revolutions of ages have never moved it; the waves of an eternity have been rushing past it; but it has remained unshaken; the waves of another eternity are rushing towards it, but it is fixed and can never be disturbed.” Respecting the character of God we may well adopt the language of the prophet, “not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken—For the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our law-giver, the Lord is our king; he will save us.” Isaiah.

9. Of his truth. That the truth or veracity of God is pledged in favor of the final salvation of all men is as clear as language can well make it: For he hath “spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.” He has not only spoken or predicted this grand and glorious event, but pledged his oath for its accomplishment, (see Isa. xlv: 23, 24,) “that by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us; which hope we have as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil.” Now as God has pledged his word and oath in favor of this doctrine, we may safely confide in his veracity for its accomplishment, and exercise that hope which is sure and steadfast, without the least uncertainty, doubt or wavering: “For God is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of a man that he should repent. Hath he said it, and will he not do it? Hath he spoken it, and shall he not make it good?” “As the rain (says God, Isaiah lv: 10, 11) cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.” D. S.

Oh what a weary, heart-wearing business it is, to try to please every body. The story of the countryman, his son, and his patient ass, is an admirable illustration; but there are few Editors that cannot give you as good a one—yes, many of them. For instance—By what name shall we call the combined body of believers in the final salvation of but a part of our race? If we speak of any single denomination, we can use the name by which it is generally known—but sometimes we wish to name all who believe as above stated—or some one person who believes thus, but belongs to no denomination—and we want an expressive, proper, brief term by which we may be fully understood. What shall be that name?

“Orthodox” signifies sound in the faith, so we cannot consistently call them that—and if we do, they will complain that we call them so in derision of their claim to it; and our friends will say it is a tacit admission that we are in fact, what our opposers call us in name, heretics. “Our opposers” will not be a proper term, for many do not oppose us, but only differ from us in sentiment. “Antodox” sounds to them too much like a nickname, invented purposely for them. And there are those of our friends who deprecate any thing that will cause our opposers to say that we are not pious, or Christians—and this they will certainly say if we intimate any contempt for their doctrines. “Limitarian” is objected to by the Arminian, because it is the ancient name of Calvinists, given them by Arminians, who in turn were called Universalists, by the Calvinists. The Arminian will protest that he does not limit the death and atonement of Christ, or grace of God, to but a portion of mankind. And the Calvinists will deny that they “limit the Holy One of Israel”—and the ignorant of both classes will suppose we call them Limitarians, because we deem them to possess limited and contracted views and feelings. “Partialist” is objected to by one of our friends as a harsh name—and by some of our opposers, because they suppose we call them so to intimate that they believe God to be a partial being—or because we suppose them to be partial, unjust, etc. Now these are difficult cases. We cannot do easily without a name, and yet every name we use is objected to, without a substitute being provided. The wincing and complaints of our opposers remind us of the poor fellow who was flogged at the whipping post. After striking “higher up,” and then “lower down,” and then “more to the right,” and then “more to the left,” at his requests, the impatient whipper cried out that, strike as he would, he could not please him! It is even so. The doctrine they hold is a reproach to the age in which they live—to the religion they profess—to any one who upholds it—and they begin to feel that it is so. Hence any name that will express that doctrine, will elicit their complaints.—And the more expressive the name, the worse will they hate it. Hence, we need not attempt to please our Partialist brethren in a name for the distinguishing feature that separates them from Universalists. We can only disavow all intention to offend, or insult, or nickname them.

But what shall we say to our friends who are so full of sympathy for our opposers, and so fearful of giving them offence? I have but one thing to offer for their consideration. If that fails in giving them comfort, they must even weep on over our impudence in calling “things by their right names.” Let us turn to the example of Jesus and his apostles. Surely they had benevolence for their opposers. Surely they were dignified, prudent and pious. Yet such is the language in which they spoke of those of “the contrary part”—“generation of vipers,” (Matt. xii: 34,) “evil and adulterous generation,” (Matt. xii: 39,) probably meaning by “adulterous,” a departure from the proper worship of God; “ye hypocrites,” (Matt. xv: 7,) “wicked and adulterous generation,” (Matt. xvi: 4,) “Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites,” (Matt. xxiii: 13,) “ye serpents! ye generation of vipers! how can ye escape the damnation of hell,” (Matt. xxiii: 33.) Thus Jesus spoke of some of his opposers—and when he spoke of the whole body of them, collectively, he called them devil and satán—in plain English, the deceiver or accuser.

and the adversary. Now I believe our opposers generally, are better than the generality of those who followed not Christ, eighteen hundred years ago; and hence I would not give them these titles—especially as all now attach a meaning to them which they did not, probably, convey then. But I must insist on using language that can be understood—that will clearly convey my meaning—disavowing all intention of wounding any person's feelings, or of giving offence by so doing.

When I speak of those who believe in a partial salvation of mankind, I must use a word descriptive of their faith. There are but two that are convenient.

1. Limitarian.—By this term I do not mean a man of limited, contracted mind or feelings—nor one who limits the power of God—nor one who limits the extent of the atonement—but I mean one who believes in a limited salvation. Salvation is the peculiar, the distinguishing topic on which we disagree. To that point the distinguishing term must refer, in order to express the difference between us. A believer in a limited final salvation, then, is what we mean when we call any one a Limitarian. If our Limitarian brethren choose to understand us differently, that is their fault, not ours. We cannot be responsible for every meaning they may choose to put upon our words.

2. Partialist.—This is the term I prefer. It is not liable to be misunderstood in consequence of having been differently used in ancient controversy, as Limitarian is. It contrasts better with our own denominational name, to which it is opposed in meaning. Universalist-Partialist. I always use the term Partialist to denote "a believer in a final partial salvation of mankind"—even as I use the term Universalist to denote "a believer in a final universal salvation of our race." I cannot find better and more definite terms to express these two meanings. Hence I shall continue to use them. I shall use them both in the same manner—precisely the same. Neither is a nickname—neither is a term of reproach, unless the doctrine it expresses is disgraceful, and of that let each party decide for itself. If our opposers put a meaning on the word Partialist different from mine, I am no more responsible for that than I would be responsible for their understanding the word "heaven" in my articles to mean "a dungeon."

In short—I shall endeavor always to treat the great body of our Partialist brethren with all due kindness, candor and respect. I shall call them Partialists very kindly and respectfully—for such are my feelings towards them—and when I wish to treat any of them to a well merited rebuke, or their conduct with deserved contempt, I have no fear that I shall not be able to find words sufficiently expressive, without perverting or degrading the words Limitarian or Partialist. And I shall use them, too, whether they will esteem me pious or not—Christian or infidel.

UNIVERSALISM IN GERMANY.

The following is the letter named in our last. Being from Professor Tholuck himself, it is presumed the Editor of the Lutheran Observer will shroud himself up in "dignified silence." The authors named by Professor Tholuck are of what is called "the Evangelical party"—holding to all points in popular theology, save that of endless misery, and somewhat visionary and mystical in their views and interpretations of the Scriptures. A copy of one of the works of Rev. John William Peterser, is extant in Pennsylvania, and referred to in Br. Whittemore's Modern History of Universalism, pp. 121-123. The works of (as he termed himself) "Henreich Young, genannt Stilling"—i. e., Henry Young, surnamed Stilling, are also extant in Pennsylvania, in several volumes, octavo. [F] Will Br. George Grosh please give us a few specimens of this author, by translating some of the best portions of his views of "the restitution of all things" into English, for the Magazine and Advocate? I believe they will be very acceptable to the public at this time.

But, from what I can learn, I have reason to believe that there are some excellent later works on the subject of universal salvation, published by the Rationalist party;

(who are not all infidels, as represented by Tholuck, no more than what are called liberal men in this country are all infidels, as asserted by our self-styled, Evangelicals;) and have hopes that copies of them may yet be procured from Germany. An order has been sent for them, whether it will be successful time will show.

These disclosures and proofs of the advancement of our distinguishing sentiment among the German divines, wrings many a groan from the hearts of Partialists. Mr. Wilson, the Editor of "Zion's Advocate," says—"It can no longer be concealed," (what a pity!) "that Tholuck all along has been secretly a Universalist." (O terrible!) "And this is Tholuck! The evangelical Tholuck!! The hope of Germany and of the world!!" Oh, Ah—Awh! It is too bad, to believe that all men will become holy—but when "the hope of Germany and of the world" embraces such a terrible doctrine—such an awful sentiment—can any combination of the letters of the alphabet possibly express the groan that should rend a good man's philanthropic bosom? But we advise our opposers to bear it patiently—we think there is yet more in store for them.

A. B. G.

The Secretary of "The Universalist Historical society" feels justified by existing circumstances, in now presenting to the public the following letter of Professor Tholuck, of Halle, Germany, on the subject of German Universalism. It will readily be seen that it confirms in many material points the statements of Professor Sears, in another part of our paper of this week. This letter of Professor Tholuck was written in answer to one addressed to him in June last, in which the statements of Mr. Dwight and Professor Sears were alluded to; and it was therefore with a distinct view of what these gentlemen had said in this country on the subject under consideration, that the following information was given.

"Halle, August 23, 1855.

"Rev. Sir—I seize the opportunity offered by Mr. L. to answer the lines which you had the kindness to address me.

"It is true that the doctrine of final restoration, (apokatastasis-ton panton) is the prevailing term in our country; it is received by many of the evangelical party in this country. It is, however, far from being the universal belief. It came particularly into notice through Turg-Stilling,† that eminent man who was a particular instrument in the hand of God for keeping up evangelical truth in the latter part of the former century, and at the same time a strong patron to that doctrine. I should say, however, that the leading men at present are rather opposite to it, particularly Hengstenberg, the Editor of the Evangelical Church Gazette, who considers that doctrine as most prejudicial to evangelical seriousness. Others like Neander do neither oppose it nor do they venture to receive it. Several passages of Scripture, as Matt. xii: 32; xxvi: 24, that are generally less attended to, seem to them more convincing to prove eternal punishment than even those that speak of aiônios kolasis.

"As to books treating that subject, I cannot mention any of recent date:—in the beginning of the former century, one very strong patron of that doctrine, Petersen, has written a great many interesting books on the subject. I shall mention, however, to Mr. L., a part of a journal published by myself in which you will find an article concerning the proofs brought forward in favor of the apokatastasis and against it.

"I must add, however, one observation, that most of our divines receive and teach the doctrine of a state of probation and trial hereafter, in which souls may be converted till the day of final judgment. On this doctrine I have preached myself a sermon before the University which you will find in a small volume of sermons that will come out in the month of November.

"Believe me, Sir, to be with the greatest regard, your most obedient.

"Rev. T. J. Sawyer.

A. Tholuck."

* RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS. See Acts ii: 31.

† This is a misprint—the name is Turg-Stilling.

T. J. S.

A. B. G.

The foregoing we are informed by our friend Mr. L., was written in great haste on the eve of his unexpected departure from Halle, at the period of its date, and we have reason to hope that we shall gain still further information from the same authentic source. We hope the Editor of the Lutheran Observer will believe Professor Tholuck to be as well acquainted with the opinions of his countrymen as any one in Germany; and he does not hesitate to declare that many of the evangelical party in Germany are Universalists, and most of them not only believers but teachers of the doctrine of a future state of probation. But we have not time the present week, nor indeed is it necessary for us to offer extended remarks. The accompanying letter of Professor Sears is a most satisfactory article and presents the subject in its true light. That Professor Tholuck is himself a Universalist there can be no doubt, and to establish this fact the explicit testimony of Professor Sears is scarcely necessary to any one who has carefully read his writings.—Universalist Union.

THE SERMON.

Not for the merits of the addition, but because of its probable demerits, I think it but just to relieve Br. Lewis from all responsibility for that portion of the sermon beginning with "If our opposers themselves believe the first declaration," etc., in division number 3, down to the close of division number 4. It was added by me, not to better the sermon, but to lengthen it—as the economic old lady mixed lard with her butter and sand with her sugar "to make them go further!" As the noblest metals, only, bear spreading abroad most, I trust Br. L. will excuse my boldness in thus endeavoring to show the value of his sermon by an extension of its applicability.

POETRY.

GOODNESS OF GOD IN AFFLICTING.

I know not the author of the following lines, but they are so applicable to my present feelings and circumstances that you will highly gratify me by inserting them in the Magazine and Advocate. C. B. Brown.

How without rule are the decrees of God!
How he chastises! How he spares the rod!
Scarcely does it ever seem that right prevails;
How oft guilt flourishes, and virtue fails!—
What must I think of this severe decree,
Which through the will of God now humbles me!
Am I to think him kind who could destroy
Every fond hope I had of lasting joy?
Am I to think him merciful who knew
The pangs I felt, and yet his aid withdrew?
Am I to think him good who could ordain
To innocence and worth disease and pain?
Am I to think him wise who could withdraw
The fairest pattern that the world e'er saw?
The best example of the purest life;
The fondest mother and the chastest wife?
The mildest mistress and the kindest friend;
Could bring such virtues to an early end?
He who could reillumine the languid eye
And have deferred at will the heaving sigh?
Have turned aside the threatening dart of death
And helped the feeble pulse, the shortening breath?
Am I to think him gracious, good and kind;
Who saw the bitter anguish of my mind,
And yet alike unmoved by prayer or tear
Tore from my bosom all I held most dear?
Yes, GOOD HE IS! and on this hope I live;
He knows the scene's unfinished—he can give
In some superior world of peace and bliss
A compensation for the pains of this!

To part so soon, perhaps, what'er the pain,
May make it happier to meet again;
Perhaps the very stroke that caused my grief
May have proved kind to her and brought relief.
I'm left to suffer what I scarce can bear;
She is in shelter and above all care!
She left her children innocent and free,
I have to guide them through life's stormy sea.
She left me safe, and (for I hid my woe)
Saw me look at ease and thought me so;
But had she known my smiles were all pretence,
Scarce Heaven's high summons could have called her hence!
Almost, had she but seen my aching heart,
She would have given up heaven, not to part!
To comfort me she would have shunned no pains,
To comfort me she would return again;
But that she knows my better doom;
Sees in my present pangs a bliss to come;
Sees for the chastened, God reserves the best
And for the heavier laden, sweeter rest!"

THE VISIT.

In one of the freezing days of our climate, a young physician but recently married invited his wife to accompany him on a visit to one of his patients.

"You are romancing, James; what! visit a family without an introduction or an invitation, or exchanging cards?"

"In this family, my dear Amanda, there is no ceremony of cards," said James, "but they will not be the less pleased to see you."

"I never used to go to see poor people," said Amanda, thoughtfully; "but," continued she, after a short deliberation, "I'll go with you, James, any where."

They passed from the handsome street of their residence to a public square, and crossing over entered a small alley, in which Amanda saw a row of houses in a manner that showed they were for the laboring class. Crossing the whole range they entered the last house and at the first door Dr. Ledson gave a gentle rap. A common woman opened it, and welcomed him.

Two chairs were immediately set, one with the back broken off, the other rickety and unstable.

Before the fire were two little children seated on the hearth, making a noise which the attendant female vainly endeavored to quell. A girl of about ten years of age came out of a small pantry bed room, and smiled as she spoke.

In a large rude chair sat a thin female. She rocked herself incessantly. She looked up when Dr. Ledson addressed her, but neither smiled nor spoke. Her complexion was sallow by illness, her lower jaw had fallen from its socket, and her teeth chattered with the vain endeavor to close the mouth.

At receiving some nourishment from the hand of her companion, she seemed revived.

"I am glad to see you, Doctor, though I had hoped to have been released from my wretchedness before now. I do not complain, but my bones have started through the skin, and I suffer,"—she shivered and stopped an instant. "I thought it very hard when I lost my baby last Summer; but I see it was kind, what would have become of it now? I must leave these, young enough, to take care of themselves, and my husband is none of the sturdiest."

She did not weep, she was past that human feeling. Amanda looked on in silence. She had learned more of life's state from the scene than she could have acquired from volumes. She felt now a wiser woman at eighteen, than she would otherwise have been at twenty-five.

It brings down all our vanity and little repinings, a spectacle of such woe. Even the almost total insensibility of the sick, was more touching than ordinary sorrow. It gave a feeling of so much that must have been endured before.

"Is this your sister?" said the woman.

"No," said James, and Amanda smiled as he replied, "it is my wife."

"Is it your wife?" said she, showing some vivacity. "How sweet she looks. Can she sing. Oh, can she sing 'I would not live always?'"

How often had Amanda sung that carelessly before. She felt awed and humbled now by every syllable that floated on her soft rich tones around in the narrow apartment.

The dying looked up so thankfully, that she even looked pretty. A slight hectic relieved her vivid countenance. She said audibly, "I hear the angels singing now around me," and then relapsed into a monotonous groan of weariness.

The little girl shook hands beseechingly as the young couple left, and in a subdued voice Amanda whispered, "we will take care of you."

Who like the physician, save indeed the minister, is called upon to see human nature in every stage, in every shadow of a tint? The rich and the poor, the delicate and the coarse, the learned and the ignorant, come before him without disguise.

Amanda thought before, that she had loved her husband; but luxury is a dead sea atmosphere, in which the noble passions sicken and lie motionless. She clung to James' arm as she returned home, with a feeling of devotion to him, that she had never even imagined before; and in the pleasure she experienced in softening the horrors of her fellow-creatures' poverty, she found every day new cause to rejoice in having shared her fortune with one who, if he brought to her no addition of the earth's wealth, had taught her that there is a way of employing it, that will awaken the purest delight.

BIBLICAL ALLUSIONS.

Few things are more interesting than tracing the truth and accuracy of the holy Scriptures, by comparing what is said of the customs and habits of eastern nations, with what ancient and modern travellers have related of them. For instance, in the 9th chapter of the prophet Ezekiel it is said that "a man amongst them was clothed with linen, with a writer's ink-horn by his side," or upon his loins. It is well known to those who have travelled in eastern countries, that even at the present time, persons employed to write carry an ink-horn tucked in their girdle on one side of them, and pens or reeds on the other. The Psalmist speaks of the "dew of Hermon," a hill near Nazareth. Maundrell says, "we were sufficiently instructed by experience, what the holy Psalmist meant by the dew of Hermon, our tents being as wet with it as if it had rained all night."

In the 49th chapter of the prophet Jeremiah are these words:—"He shall come up like a lion from the swelling of Jordan." The banks of this river are still covered with a thick underwood of shrubs, in which several sorts of wild beasts harbor themselves. During the periodical overflowings of the river, these beasts are driven out of the covert, and this circumstance gave occasion to the comparison referred to.

These, and other instances without end, might be brought forward as satisfactory proofs of biblical allusions, and which are as authentic as they are interesting.

A young man who had wasted his patrimony by profligacy, whilst standing one day, on the brow of a precipice, from which he had determined to throw himself, formed a sudden resolution to regain what he had lost. The purpose thus formed was firm; and though he began by shovelling a load of coal into a cellar, for which he only received twelve and a half cents, yet he proceeded from one step to another till he more than recovered his lost possessions, and died worth three hundred thousand dollars.

He who spends most of his time in mere sports and recreations, is like him whose garments are made altogether of fringe, and whose diet is nothing but sauce.

MARRIAGES.

In Volney, March 15, by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. ISAAC S. CLARK, to Miss JULIA ANN BREED, both of Volney.

In Leyden, March 31, by Rev. J. A. Aspinwall, Mr. ERI H. COMSTOCK, to Miss ESTHER THORNTON, all of Leyden.

In York, February 4, by Rev. J. Gage, 2d. Mr. ROBERT BROWN, to Miss ALMIRA RUSS, all of that place.

In Verona, on the 10th February, by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. ORSON FOSTER, to Miss DULINE A. SMITH, all of Verona.

In Butler, March 24, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. AUSTIN FENN, to Miss POLLY BIRCH.

By the same, March 30, Mr. CLARK BUGEE, to Miss FRANCES BROOKS, both of Butler.

DEATHS.

In Mexico, Oswego county, of a lingering consumption, on the 21st of March, Mrs. SOPHIA BROWN, consort of Rev. C. B. Brown, and daughter of Edmund and Lavinia Stone, formerly of Templeton, Mass., in the 41st year of her age.

In the long continued sickness of this excellent woman, there was a constant exhibition of the combined influence of native amiableness and the Christian virtue. Few, very few, have been called to partake so largely of the bitter cup of suffering. For more than eight years she was unable to even make a bed, during which time she was a pattern of fortitude, patience and submission. She was a practical Christian from her youth. For more than nineteen years she had shared in the endearments, the duties and the cares of conjugal life; and yet what is truly remarkable, a word of difficulty never occurred between herself and her companion. She was esteemed and beloved by all who knew her—was one of the most tender and affectionate of mothers, and a faithful and industrious companion. Although a member of the Baptist church, yet for the last six months of her life she declared herself an unbeliever in the doctrine of endless misery, and with her dying breath she said, that she was ready and willing to go. She has left her deeply afflicted husband to be the sole protector of her two amiable sons, who, by their tears evince that, though the deceased while living, required their constant care, yet in her death, they feel that they have sustained an irreparable loss. Her funeral was attended on the 23d ult., and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a crowded congregation of sympathising friends, by the writer.

Sandy Creek, March 26, 1836.

J. FRENCH.

At her father's, in York, on March 8th, Miss SILVA PERSONS, in the 21st year of her age. Though a member of the Methodist society, it is believed she died in the faith of a world's salvation. A short time previous to her death she selected as a text for her funeral discourse, Psalm xxiii: 4.

To her parents this dispensation was rendered peculiarly afflicting by the death of their son, Charles, about 11 months old, who expired a few hours after the interment of their eldest daughter.

May the "staff" as well as the "rod" of their heavenly Father, uphold and comfort them under these bereavements.

J. GAGE, 2d.

In Wolcott, on the 30th ult., IRENA, daughter of David Underhill, in the 3d year of her age. Thus is another spirit gone to the land of undisturbed repose, ere the bud of intellect developed its beauties, or felt the withering touch of vice.

"Adieu, thou dear departed soul,

Now gone from earth to heaven above,

Where streams of pleasure ever roll,

To drink full draughts of heavenly love." T. D. C.

UNIVERSALISM MORE FAVORABLE TO PURE, ELEVATED, PERFECT MORALITY THAN PARTIALISM.

By THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

How much to be lamented is it, that the morality and virtue of our race—of ourselves and our brethren—are so imperfect, faulty, incomplete! Think of the grief of a venerable parent whose heart is every day vexed by the folly, dissoluteness, and wrong-doings of his children. How great then must be the grief, which it is not irreverent to ascribe to our heavenly Parent, on account of men's departure from rectitude in spirit, in motive, and in life! Recollect the ecstatic joy of the father of the prodigal. And why this ecstasy? because his former grief, now removed from his heart, had been most depressing—most profound. "There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth"—a joy (is it presumptuous to say?) most intense in the Holiest, and shared by all moral natures in proportion to their degree of holiness, that is, repugnance to moral evil. A lax, and feeble, and imperfect virtue is to be lamented also, because those who practice it know not "the peace which passeth understanding"—find not the "ways of pleasantness" nor the "paths of peace." Their souls are not in tranquillity; but are like "the troubled sea, whose waves do cast up mire and dirt." In professors of religion, moreover, do we lament and deplore this degraded morality, because in the laxity and imbecility, and failings of these, do secular men find what serves to indurate their impiety, sharpen their contempt, and make them rest satisfied with, yea, even proud of, a morality founded on expediency, honor, utility, reputation. "Oh! that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night" for these sore evils!

But we hope for better things. In the increase of just and generous conceptions of God, of boldness and freedom of thought—in the dissemination, by original and powerful minds of their own enlarged and enlightened sentiments, do we perceive grounds for a hope of a yet purer and more exalted virtue. Christianity, fully and clearly understood, expounded and developed more rationally, and more in the "spirit of love," than has been its too common fate, possesses, we are convinced, a treasury of pure, impressive sentiments, and of efficient and exalted motives sufficient to enable us to attain to any height of virtue. Let a more rational and endearing exposition of Christianity be wrought out and received, and we fear not but the fruit of this will be a more enlightened and exalted morality and virtue. For in the prevalent views of Christianity, contracted and erroneous, are we disposed to seek for much of what we have been lamenting. It has been remarked by one of the most talented and erudite, yet anonymous writer of the age, that "almost every excellence in the science of morals has been attained by sages—except completeness and consistency: the completeness and consistency of its morality is the peculiar praise of the ethics which the Bible has taught." The expositors of Christian ethics seem to have fallen very generally into the defects of the ancient sages. "Our own times," continues our profound thinker, "have shown us notable examples of the brilliancy and vigor that may belong to partial systems of piety and morals; and we have now as great need as ever to revert to the source—the only source of a consistent morality." By reverting to this source, we believe, have the views of Christianity entertained by Universalists, been wrought out and elicited; and the tendency of these views is, to produce a more exalted virtue than is the legitimate product of the too prevalent and "partial systems of piety and morals."

We have ventured this assertion concerning the tendency of the views, and doctrines, and sentiments espoused by Universalists, not without a firmly fixed persuasion of its truth in our own minds. It is the final result of many comparisons of the opposing systems, in many particulars, or individual points of view. We have made out to our own satisfaction, from our own feelings and spirit, from the observation of others, and from reasoning, this superiority of Universalist over partial views. Let these views be admitted for serious consideration, without prejudice or bigotry; let him to whom they are new be so fortunately situated as to have a living witness of their pure and happy efficacy moving daily before him, and let, above all, let him imbibe their spirit—"the spirit of Christ"—and taste in his own inward feelings that they do indeed inspire with more endearing and sanctifying conceptions of God; with more active and enduring benevolence to man; with more hopeful, grateful, satisfactory, tranquillizing emotions; and his doubts about the tendency of our more enlarged and generous views are resolved—are at an end. To feel this tendency is to believe it. May something be contributed to this blessed result, by the few concise observations which our limits permit us to make, intended to evince the superior adaptation of Universalism "to the practice and welfare of individuals, families, communities and nations."

I. Universalism promotes pure and perfect morality, by the doctrines which it teaches concerning the character and government of God. It doth not at all surprise us, nor need it surprise the professors of Partialism, that the "fruits of the spirit"—the virtues of humanity, are so rare and dwarfish in this age. The public prevalent sentiment is diseased, is unsound, and cannot bear healthful fruits. Truly in this case the tree may be known by its fruits. What more than all other influences gives color to the character? Is it not the character of the objects of our affection and esteem? Whence the influence of parental example? Above and beyond parental influence, above all other, is the influence of our ideas of God upon the soul. Therefore do we look first and chiefly to the views entertained of God's character and government, for an explanation of the sentiments and doings of every-day life. As the Deity is represented by Partialism, we need not wonder at not finding the fruits of his spirit, for alas! his spirit is not thereby infused. We cannot love such a Being. Nor can we reverence him; his acts are not those of consummate wisdom, and inflexible, untainted purity and rectitude. Are not the current and prevalent views of God, not those of a Father of unbounded wisdom and goodness,—a "Father of mercies,"—from whom come all the beauties and magnificence of the universe; all the strength, and power, and fruitions of intellect, all the sweetness and endearments of affection—in short, "every good and perfect gift;" but instead, such as represent him as a God of tyranny and self-willedness, instated in a throne of stern and unreasonable sovereignty and severity—as a frowning, inexorable judge—an unfeeling, relentless avenger? His revelation, instead of being viewed as bringing with it a new atmosphere of cheering light and warmth, and of enlivening hopes and prospects, an atmosphere of serenity, peace and joy, of buoyancy and bliss—instead of a communication of "good news to all people"—is not this revelation debasingly thought of more as a code of laws and requirements not fitted to our capacities of fulfilment—above all power of performance—yet sanctioned and enforced by awful authority, stern judgment, un pitying severity? The Partialist professes, indeed, to believe in God as a God of goodness, and to view him in the light of a Father; but if the views of God's character and government which he professes to believe, have any influence, we fear he cannot feel the full influence of God upon his soul as the "Father of mercies," and the "God of consolation."

Oh! to be transferred from the cheerful, and bright, and blessed influence of Universalism—from an atmosphere in which the spirit can expand itself forever; in which it finds itself active, energetic, tranquil, happy, ever enjoying the smiles of a Father's countenance;—hence to be transferred to the grim horrors of Partialism, is like being torn by ruthless hands from the bosom of home, and being doomed, in a foreign land, to hardest slavery under an unmerciful and hard task-master! We would not lose hold of our conviction of our Father's mercy for all the riches, and pomp, and power this world can tempt its votaries withal. No language can express our feeling of the worth of this thrilling, glowing conviction of God's parental care and affection. Scarcely with patience can we listen to such sentiments as go to rob us of the guardianship and protection of that Shepherd, who "carrieth the lambs in his bosom," or of that Father, whose wise disposal and discipline, and whose full-souled affection are our study and our stay.

How sweet the service of such a Master! How pure the products of this indwelling truth! We drink into his spirit, and the fruits are "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." It is not a frigid, dwarfish, eye-pleasing exhibition of service, but a free-will offering—the outbursting of a grateful, reverential, happy heart, conscious how little it can do, even in its best estate, as a laborer together with God in God's noblest work, the regeneration and ennobling of the human soul. In the devout language of one who believed in one God, even our God, may we address our Father. "I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart." Nothing enlarges the heart, and produces affectionate, filial obedience and virtue, equally with the views of God's parental character and dispensations which Universalism teaches, when these are deeply and vitally implanted in the soul.

The ennobling tendency of the views which Universalism inspires concerning God and his beloved family—our brethren—will be corroborated and confirmed by the influence of the chosen associates of him in whose heart such love is. Who will be his associates? The "excellent of the earth" are all his delight. And in evidence of the influence hence derived, I adduce a well known truth, and quote language in which it has been well expressed. "That the temper, the sentiments, the morality, and, in general, the whole conduct and character of men are influenced by the example and disposition of the persons with whom they associate, is a reflection which has long since passed into a proverb, and been ranked among the standing maxims of human wisdom in all ages of the world."

II. By insisting upon and inculcating, not merely the imperfection, but the utter worthlessness of all our best deeds, and by teaching men to rely for their acceptance with God and future felicity, not on their own conduct and character, "which are as filthy rags," but upon being "clothed upon" with Christ's righteousness, Partialism inflicts upon the cause of morals a deep injury, from which Universalism, not only is free, but also delivers us. Partialism teaches that while Christ's death is efficacious in appeasing the wrath of God, and paying the debt of sinners to his inflexible justice, his unblemished life and virtues not being needed for himself, must be taken to envelope each and all of his elect, so that being "clothed upon" with the robes of his righteousness, they may hide their own rags, and so pass muster at the tribunal of the Judge. Here is an axe laid at the root of all virtue. Partialism dissociates what God hath joined together—virtue and felicity, vice and misery, character and its deserts. What is the tendency of this doctrine? Is it not to make men account pardon of more worth than purity? Is it not to withdraw men's attention from the acquisition of that personal holiness without which no man shall see the Lord? Is it not to make men overlook the true and only preparation for heaven, accordance with God, active, energetic co-operation with him? Is it not to make men trust in another suitability for heaven than that in which David would trust? (Ps. xv and xxiv: 3, 4.) Is it not, so far as it is operative and influential, to make men substitute, and be satisfied with, a lax and easy religionism, instead and to the neglect of the "weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith"? It leads decidedly and directly to the defective "righteousness of the Pharisees" who paid tithes upon the most trifling articles, "mint, annise and cummin," while they accompanied this scrupulous and superstitious pietism—this attention to minutiae—with a total disregard of justice, fidelity, mercy. While the Pharisee would be guilty of robbing widows' houses, for a pretence he could make long prayers. While in his heart there burned envy, malice, hatred, he could thank God that he was not as other men, and would compass sea and land to make one proselyte. Is there not in the influence of Partialism and Phariseism a most notable analogy? Does not the Partialist equally with the Pharisee substitute forwardness and fervency in a particular cause, for the merit of general and regular morality? When I read of the scrupulosity of the Pharisee about the observation of the Sabbath, which Christ reproveth and would have corrected so oft, I cannot but be reminded of the similar superstitious regard which the Partialist professes to entertain towards that day. When I read of the proselyting propensities of the Pharisee, I cannot but think of the sectarian spirit of the Partialist. And so in a multitude of instances. In addition to the degrading ideas which both must entertain of God's love of right and repugnance to wrong, the Partialist adds erroneous notions of the offices of Christ, and debasing conceptions of all those virtuous and worthy qualities of heart and life which God hath crowned with the promise of life and blessedness everlasting. Were Christ to return to earth, and sojourn among us, would not his righteous spirit be grieved, every day, with the scanty and imbecile morality in association with the assumed sanctity which we are attempting to trace to its source, and lamenting. If we are offended, what must be his indignant sensibility and repugnance to such sinful and pitiful exhibitions of human nature!

The tendency of this and its associated errors, may be witnessed in the distinctions among men, to which the Partialist is inclined to attach the greatest importance. Universalism teaches us to attach the chief place, in our estimate of character, to the love of, and conformity to the principles of virtue, rectitude and goodness; to the degree in which conscience is supreme—to the degree of likeness which we bear the surrender of our own wills, in our self-control and self-sacrifice, in our filial spirit, to Jesus Christ our elder brother. But Partialism directs the attention, not to the moral attainments and qualifications, but to the claims to be spiritual not worldly men, to raptures and fervors, to ecstasies and zeal, sudden impressions, and "ungovernable transports." In proportion to their devotion to the cause, that is, to their priest and their sect, are Partialists taught to measure their standing in God's favor, and their claims to future rewards. How injurious to morals, to character, and to happiness are such teachings! In the words of Dr. Channing, Universalists may truly speak their sentiments. "When we observe a fervor, called religious, in men whose general character expresses little refinement and elevation, and whose piety seems at war with reason, we pay it little respect. We honor religion too much to give its sacred name to a feverish, forced, fluctuating zeal, which has little power over the life." The religious warmth which we value, is such as springs naturally from an improved character—"the warmth of a mind which understands God by being like him; which, instead of disordering, exalts the understanding, invigorates conscience, gives a pleasure to common duties, and is seen to exist in connexion with cheerfulness, judiciousness, and a reasonable frame of mind."

There has been an outcry against what is called "moral preaching" among the soi-disant orthodox or evangelical, and if the following explanation of it be the true one, it may be justly brought in proof of the defective virtue of the religionists we speak of. In secular men—"the men of the world" as he contemptuously and pharisaically names them, the Partialist religionist observes a consistency, elevation and virtue, the fruit of our moral constitution and the discipline of reason, of which he knows himself to be entirely destitute, and finding in his doctrine of faith no similar efficiency, he arrives tacitly at the conclusion that the honor, truth, integrity, candor, ingenuousness and self-command, in which some worldly men excel, are nothing better than 'worldly virtues,' or false semblances of goodness, with which 'a spiritual man' should have little or nothing to do. Thus the secular man is made more profane by his neighborhood to the religionist; and the religionist more relaxed by his contact with the worldling."

In fine, the Universalist in his heart adopteth the words of David, and sayeth, "Jehovah shall recompense me according to my uprightness, according to the purity of my doings shall he render unto me." (Ps. xviii: 20, from the Hebrew.) The Partialist, meanwhile, to pacify his conscience for neglect of the weightier matters, may be supposed to be saying within himself, "Although I feel my own deficiency in the high honor, strict integrity, judiciousness and cheerfulness of some of my neighbors, yet they are not zealous for the cause as I am; they are not of the Lord's people; and at the last day the Lord shall acknowledge his own, while these with all their works wherein they trusted, shall be put on the left hand of the Judge; but we shall be arrayed in Christ's righteousness, and shall go in to inherit the kingdom!"

III. Universalism is friendly to morality and the virtues, because it teaches more clearly, more consistently, and more impressively than Partialism does, what heights of virtue—unreached, unthought of elevations—are open and attainable by all men; yea, that all men shall yet attain them. From hope of a better lot doth Partialism exclude the majority of mankind, holding out to them no other prospect than the extinction of all the good qualities—all the divinity they feel within them; and with this, an eternity of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. From the favored, elect few, it takes away all stimulus to work out a righteousness of their own, seeing Christ hath wrought it out for them. Their work is easy: in this world, to talk much of Christ and what he hath done for them, sing hymns and support the cause; in the next, to imbue them, without exertion of their own, with the righteousness of another, and then sit down and sing forever, hallelujah, worthy is the Lamb!—Universalism teacheth no such heaven, and no such way of attaining it. It excludeth no one from the hope of a higher, better destiny, the great stimulus to all exertion; nor doth it abandon any to hopeless, helpless despair. Have not the prevailing and too long prevalent errors about heaven and hell, and faith and works, had much to do in causing the degraded and lamentable state of our people? While every where men meet with such doctrines as give no hope, or rather cause despair and recklessness, need we wonder to find that narrow life doth bound all their hopes and expectations, that the impure earth yieldeth them all their joy, that they thirst not after immortality, that they live not for things above, but that idle talk, vain parade, and cares for the body occupy all their thoughts? Are not the multitude in every land sunk into a brute-like contentment with food and raiment, living upon mere animal gratifications, drudging, sleeping, and waking to drudgery again? The reason of all this is, they have no hope.—Banish this paralyzing desolateness and despair—inspire with the assurance that God is their friend—that through exertion of reason, thoughtfulness and the other faculties which he hath bestowed to be used by and to bless them, their lot will be improved—that to a greater happiness than that of any envied mortal they shall yet be advanced: let them be aroused from their lethargy by such and kindred thoughts, and the inert mass shall arouse them to warm life, active and elevated employment, to a consciousness that virtue is its own reward; that virtuous exertion, certain advancement, and sweet tranquillity are inseparably connected. Yes! Universalism shall yet elevate the mass—the multitude of mankind to a more elevated rank as intellectual and moral beings. To do so, it only requires to be clearly understood and cordially received, and then its influence shall certainly and gradually encroach upon and expel the habits of slavishness and hopelessness which now o'ermaster the age. We have been witnesses to this favorable result from the reception and influence of Universalism. We have seen it bring out the thinking and the feeling man from the human animal, as pure metal is brought out of the earthy ore. Yes! more than the best political institutions—more than boasted education, shall Universalism regenerate and ennoble the world.

One of the most powerful of the engines which Universalism wields in ameliorating the condition of man, consists in its doctrine of the destiny of man. On this interesting subject it teaches views of God's purposes most ennobling and encouraging; those of Partialism we have seen to be most debasing and discouraging. To all men doth Universalism open the door of hope. And what are the bright, the ennobling prospects which it sets before men? What does it tell us that all men may, and ought to, and will become? It teacheth that by the present or by some future system of discipline, men shall yet become perfect as their "Father in heaven is perfect"—that the heart of man shall yet be pervaded by an enlightened, and generous, and filially reverential love of God, which shall expel all opposing and inconsistent affections; that under the influence of this love we shall count no service hard, but be prodigal and ceaseless in our labor of love; that "God's ways to us-ward" shall never seem grievous, no event too severe, no adversity sufficient to crush and overwhelm our confidence in his overruling goodness; or our ingratitude for his lovingkindness; that, in suffering, this trust shall endure; in death, shall triumph; that, in the "dark vale" and in the "shadow of death" we shall fear no ill; that, like Jesus, our constant employment shall be "going about doing good"—the ministry of benevolence; that our temper, like his, shall be meek and forbearing, superior to injury and indignity; that, by the use of the aids and helps which the present system of discipline furnishes, the godlike capacities, the divinity within us shall grow and gather power; that, by every exercise of our powers by which we disenfranchise ourselves from the sway and domination of animal gratifications, of the love of gain, power, pleasure, whenever we obey conscience in opposition to evil impulses; whenever we act in conformity to the dictates of our reason and higher principles; we are doing so much to the extinction of the only hell we know of, the hell within our own bosoms; and to the acquisition of the only heaven we know, the perfecting and perfect mind, enjoying the approbation of its own conscience, and its

God; and that, through the exercise of our godlike powers and capacities, and the subjugation of all our lower propensities, we shall, at last, be fitted for the company of the most exalted of our brethren, and of higher orders of intellectual and moral beings—for the company of Jesus Christ, God's well-beloved Son, and for communion with God himself.

Now what is the tendency of this doctrine of man's high destiny, and of this celestial, ideal reach of virtue, spread out for an object of desire and of hope? What the efficacy of this "tablet of perfection" hung up before the vision of man? Is it not to stimulate every noble faculty and power of the soul, to rouse it to exertion, to preserve it by the sublimity and the possibility of the accomplishment, ever active, energetic, and upon the stretch? Is it not to save the soul from resting satisfied with any present attainment; to keep it ever thirsting for higher and better; ever sleepless, watchful and in action? And unless the mind is thus ever kept active with bright, attractive prospects not yet realized, it will stagnate, and become stationary. To have the mind in its best condition, it must be under the influence of hope, it must be cheerful, grateful, and above all, ceaselessly active, energetic, sighing, praying, working for better and more blissful possessions. Nothing appears to us so well adapted to keep the mind in this, its most healthful state, as the enlightened views which Universalism teaches of the present system of discipline, and the future destiny of man. "Let the mind, from its first dawning, be fed on matters of fact alone, limited to the desire of the needful and to the hope of the attainable, never imaginative, never speculative; it will become as the physical condition of those people who are living upon the very edge of necessity becomes, little elevated above the brutes that perish. It is illimitable knowledge, still sought after, though unbounded; it is high ambition, still longed after, though never within reach; and soaring fancy, dwelling with things unseen, that go to produce the noble specimen of the natural man. And it is the very same faculties employed upon things revealed, that go to produce the foremost specimen of the renewed man. David, and Paul, and Isaiah, such three pillars of the church of the living God, are not to be named; and how noble, how heroic, how majestic were they!" Paul has left on record a statement of the sentiments and principles which actuated him; and we find them just such as the views which Universalism enforces, are calculated to inspire. "Brethren," says he, speaking of the Christian's career, under the figure of a prize contest, "I reckon not myself to have attained the goal, to have laid hold of the prize, as having finished the race; no, I have yet much nobler heights of virtue and likeness to my Lord Jesus Christ before me, and am sensible how far I fall short of them. But one thing I can say, and one thing I do, not minding the things behind me, not looking back with immoderate self-complacency on the steps already taken—the progress I have already made—I am intensely desirous, with all vigor and energy, to stretch forward toward those things which are before, and to follow along the mark (kata skopon)—to run on in the marked-out course of faith and virtue, towards the prize of the calling of God from above, (tes apo kleseos), by Christ Jesus—the prize of perfection and eternal life, proposed to me, when God called me from heaven, by Christ Jesus, to run this race." And he adds, "Let as many, therefore, as wish to be perfect, think this the proper method of obtaining it." (Phil. iii: 13-15, paraphrased.) May we, as Paul prays in the seventeenth verse of this chapter, be joint-imitators of him in striving to lay hold of the prize set before us in the revelation of the "glad tidings."

We had intended to dwell briefly on the illustration of several other doctrines of Universalism, which we think tend to promote pure and perfect morality. Particularly, we meant to have endeavored to show that the views entertained and taught by the genuine disciples of Universalism concerning heaven, had this sublime and favorable tendency. The heaven of the Partialist is an outward one; that of the Universalist is within. The former consists in freedom from punishment, in singing of psalms, in indolent inaction; that of the latter, in a pure and peaceful spirit, in perfecting our natures, in active service, in doing God's errands and works of benevolence, in labors of love, in communion with our celestial Parent. It would not require much space to make manifest which of the two views of heaven is the most favorable to character, to virtue, to felicity, and to upward progress. But our limits and our leisure permit us not to proceed. We shall, therefore, close our claims in favor of Universalism, by saying,

IV. That the doctrines of Universalism are much more rational, and much more interesting to the intellect and to the heart, and consequently, much more influential on the conduct and the character, than are the views of Partialism. We have, in a few particulars, attempted to make out that the tendency of Universalism is good, very good; and if so, this tendency must be tenfold, aye, a hundredfold more influential and operative than that of views which take no hold upon our natures—which do not make themselves felt—do not move our whole machinery of mind so powerfully. Both the good and also the pernicious tendencies of Partialism are but seldom and but feebly manifested, on account of this slight hold it takes of us: hence, when we speak of the evil tendency of Partialism, we must not be understood to mean that it is actually productive of all the evils to which it leads, but only that nothing prevents it, save the little influence which it is calculated to exert from its non-adaptation to our moral nature, save also, the counter-action of better principles.

We have thus endeavored to produce in others a conviction which many arguments have contributed to make powerful in our own breasts—even the conviction—the full persuasion of the superior and peculiar efficacy of Universalism, to produce an elevated and ennobling morality. We have endeavored to make out a claim to this honor for several of the views which it teaches and enforces:—1. For those of its doctrines which inspire a more generous, heart-stirring, active, and energetic love of God—a love not satisfied with a bare conformity to the letter of his requirements, but "prodigal of services," ever seeking opportunities to show itself, never satisfied with doing. 2. For its doctrines concerning the purpose of Christ's life and death, in which it is free from the degrading tendency of the teachings of Partialism on the same subject. 3. For its doctrines of the destiny of man. Here it openeth the doors of hope to all men—encourageth to virtuous advancement—stimulath to highest excellence. The views of Partialism debar from hope, not unfrequently enwrap the mind in gloom and despair, and ordinarily corrode the heart and produce inactivity and imbecility.

May the time soon come, (hasten it, O, our God!) when the benign and beatifying influences of Universalism shall beautify, and adorn, and bliss the soul and the life of man!

PROFANITY.

BY REV. ASHER MOORE.

"Cursing and swearing is an offence against God and religion, and a sin of all others the most extravagant and unaccountable, as having no benefit or advantage attending it. It is a contempt of God; a violation of his law; a great breach of good behaviour; and a mark of levity, weakness, and wickedness. How those who live in the habitual use of it, can call themselves men of sense, of character, or of decency, I know not."—Buck.

This vice cannot be indulged but in direct violation of the spirit of the Gospel, "Swear not at all," is the sacred injunction of the Master. In my judgment, oaths are disallowable in every case, under the Christian dispensation. And when I am called upon to give evidence in a court of justice, if the honorable judge will not receive my testimony without first hearing me swear, I will promise him that he will not receive it at all. I am determined not to violate a commandment of the Gospel for the sake of being considered capable of speaking the truth!

But by profanity we do not mean "judicial oaths," as they are called, but the hateful practice of using irreverent and blasphemous language. This practice, although at first indulged with some degree of caution and timidity, soon emboldens a man to pour forth his curses and oaths on almost every occasion. And if the influence of said practice were confined to himself, the fact that it is destructive of virtue and morality, is fully evinced by the increasing depravity of his own feelings! It is utterly impossible for a man habitually to indulge in the ungentlemanly and detestable vice of profanity, without vitiating his feelings, and acting in opposition to the spirit of Christ.

The influence of the vice in question, also sensibly affects others besides those who are guilty of swearing. How do children learn to profane the name of God, and accompany their expressions with horrid imprecations? It is by the power of imitation. Some hear their parents swear; others learn profanity in the streets; and others, again, learn it from the pulpit, where the name of the Highest is blasphemed, and his children damned to merciless and unceasing torments! The little imitators catch the sound; and desiring to be men, they also swear.*

Let a youth be placed in a work-shop, where all the hands are in the habit of cursing their work and every thing else that they talk about, and if he is not possessed of good, strong moral principles, and active religious feelings, he will soon swear as loud, and long, and blasphemously as any veteran in the shop.

It is hence plain that, by the practice of swearing, a man must exert an unfavorable influence on the cause of virtue and morality. He may avow no oppugnancy to the Gospel of Christ; nay, he may even profess a strong and ardent attachment to the Christian religion; but he is nevertheless against Christ. For, remember, dear reader, that "he that is not with Jesus is against him," Matt. xii: 30.

New-England, Conn., March, 1836.

* A little boy in this city, on being asked by one of his playmates, why he swore, replied that he did it "because it looks cunning!" He had heard some poor blasphemer, who exerted all his talents in swearing ingeniously the newest invented oaths.

THE CONTRAST.

BY REV. J. FRENCH.

On entering the house of worship one day last Winter, a little before the hour for commencing the services, I found a few individuals conversing familiarly on the various religious doctrines of the day, and as I paused a moment to hearken to their remarks, an amiable looking, elderly lady, turning to me, proposed some queries on doctrinal subjects, to which I replied, and then she proceeded to tell, what I shall call her religious experience. She said, in her early life she was taught, and unwaveringly believed in, the doctrine of election and reprobation, and that there was no reason to hope that, at the utmost, more than one out of ten would ever be saved. "And oh!" said she, "I cannot describe the anguish that wrung my heart, as I looked round upon my little children. I had but six, and I thought I had not enough to be damned! I mourned and repined to think I had ever been born, to be the instrument of introducing those dear babes into an unasked existence, under circumstances so truly dreadful. But now," said she, as her countenance brightened, and a tear of gratitude sparkled in her eye—"but now I thank the Lord, I am satisfied that I have none too many children to be saved!"

The tree is known by its fruit. If Universalism bears fruit so truly excellent, is it a corrupt tree? Christian Mother, this is called a licentious doctrine. If you believed it, would you hate God? If you loved God, would you delight in sin?

BUILDING MEETING-HOUSES.

In our last, was urged the importance of regularly assembling for religious worship. The next requisite which presents itself to mind, after a congregation have assembled, is a sufficiently spacious and commodious building, to shield them from the scorching beams of Summer, the pelting storms of Winter, the drenching rains of Autumn, and the sweeping blasts of Spring.

It is true, "God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing." It is true, devotion may be just as pure when offered in the open air, as in the dedicated temple. Men, indeed, might worship God acceptably, without meeting-houses, and they might also subsist, tolerably, without dwelling-houses; but the one would be as disagreeable as the other is inconvenient.

There are, however, those who profess an interest in the cause of religion, who are willing to worship without a church, because there is some expense attending its erection. These same persons must have buildings for themselves and families to abide in—buildings in which to store the produce of their harvest—buildings to perform their mechanical labor in; and buildings, even for the comfort and protection of their cattle.

They cheerfully expend the sum of one hundred dollars, in erecting a building for the shelter of their brutes, but are unwilling to appropriate half that amount, for a temple, in which to worship their Creator. We can commend their laudable economy in the former, but cannot approve their illiberal parsimony in the latter.

To societies wishing to build churches, the following hints, which are the result of some experience and observation, may not be unacceptable.

1. The raising of funds.—This is generally done, in country places, by subscription. People are sometimes loath to subscribe, till they know whether the project will succeed, and hence the difficulty of obtaining subscriptions in a community where means are abundant. The people distrust the liberality of each other. To obviate this difficulty, let an amount be fixed upon sufficient to cover the expense of building. Then let some one go to each individual, supposed to be friendly, and ascertain, confidentially, what he is willing to contribute, provided the amount shall be obtained. Let a minute be made, in each case, with pencil; and, if the event prove the ability to build, a subscription can then be drawn, and the amount transferred. I once knew this experiment made in a vicinity, where the amount proposed was $1800, but which resulted in a building worth $4000.

2. The location.—A meeting-house would be erected in many places, could the people agree upon a location. This is most frequently the case in towns which embrace two or three small villages; and argues a greater share of pride and worldly interest, than of self-sacrifice and Christian unity. But how shall a location be decided, where two or three have equal claims, and must share the expense? The following is a method I have known adopted, with satisfaction to all parties. A subscription is drawn for the erection of a meeting-house, "to be located at —, or —, or —, whichever place shall be designated by the greatest amount of subscription." Two or three columns, as the case may be, should then be drawn, and over each column written the name of one of these places. Then each individual subscribing, should place the amount he is willing to give, running the risk of location, in that column over which stands the location of his choice. The house is then erected at the place, "designated by the greatest amount of subscription," and the whole subscription applied to its erection.

3. The expensiveness of building.—Do not, I beseech you, brethren, get into debt, in the erection of a meeting-house by subscription. It will retard your prosperity. Few members will be added to a society, where each new member must shoulder his proportion of an old debt, which is accumulating interest. Do not build a larger or more elegant house than you have means to cover, in order to rival or excel some other one in your vicinity. A small house will generally draw a greater number of people than an unnecessarily large one. Man-kind are gregarious animals, and prefer being crowded to being lonesome. Who would not rather live in London, than Oregon? Besides, a small house, well filled, is much more pleasant to the speaker, than a great one, nearly empty. And in regard to elegance, it is not that which is dazzling, on the outside of a house, that proves a lasting inducement to attend; but that which is edifying, within the building; and the former frequently swallows up the means which might secure the latter. Brethren, "think on these things."

4. Utility.—Do not sacrifice utility to ornament in building. The comfort of the hearers, the singers, and the speaker, should be primarily regarded, and that little orb of false taste and vanity, the eye, consulted secondarily. The back of the seats should not be perpendicular to the seats themselves, but sloping backward, slightly. The pulpit should be low. Three and a half feet, in a building of ordinary length of posts, is as high as the speaker's feet should be from the floor of the house. It is a great assistance to have the floor elevated, at the end of the building opposite the desk, thence gradually descending towards the pulpit—it brings the audience nearer the speaker. It should be considered indispensable, in wintry climates, to have an entry-way, a vestibule, to exclude from the inner apartments the cold air, which enters through the outer door. In small buildings this is too often sacrificed for a colonnade. If the gallery stairs are inserted on the floor of this entry-way, as is generally the case, there should be partitions and doors at the head of the stairs, instead of the galleries being left open. People forget that Boreas can climb stairs. And were it not a truth that the people, in building, seldom consult the comfort of their speaker, I would suggest that the desk be placed on the end of the building opposite the entrance. I will say to brethren in the ministry, who have feeble health, Do not engage to preach, during winter, in a building that has the desk situated between two doors, both opening to the weather. APOLLOS.

PROTRACTED MEETING IN WOLCOTT.

A protracted meeting was held in this place during the latter part of February, for the express purpose of "putting down Universalism," and conducted by Elders Chittenden and Fuller, of the Baptist denomination. After trying several days and nights in succession to convert one Universalist, and failing in the attempt, they resolved upon a new expedient, which they hoped would realize to them the accomplishment of their much desired object. This was to demolish the walls of our house; to raze it to the ground, so that not one stone should be left upon another that was not thrown down. In perfect keeping with the spirit of this holy resolution, they prayed that "the Almighty might display his power, in striking from beneath the devil's insurance office, its underpinning!" Alas! this effort to put down Universalism was as fruitless as all the preceding ones had been. The great Father of mercies by such godly prayers cannot be moved; and by turning a deaf ear to that, it is to be hoped that the individual who offered it up, may go and learn what Solomon meant by the following declaration: "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination." Prov. xxviii: 9.

After calling the writer all the hard names, which malice—the worst principle of the human heart—could appropriate to an advocate of impartial grace, and exhorting the youth (a majority of whom, in this vicinity, attend our meeting, by the way,) to flee from the snares which "the emissary of the devil" was laying for them, they left our little village, as free from the influences of Partialism as it was when they entered it—at which they publicly declared, that there was not "rebellion enough in Wolcott to make the devil mad!" Some of the expressions which were made there, in my hearing, I dare not repeat—if they did not border upon blasphemy, can the name of God, by mortal man, be blasphemed? Do you wonder, kind reader, that profanity is heard in our land?—go to a protracted meeting, and there learn that it is tolerated by those who profess to be examples of morality and religion. Cease to wonder that this evil prevails to such an extent. Drive it from the sacred desk, and it will soon die away in community—it will sleep in the grave of oblivion!

T. D. COOK.

P. S. As these gentlemen were not received by the people in this town, as is evident from their ill success, it is presumed that they shook off the dust of their feet as a testimony against us. Did either of them, (I am requested to inquire,) in shaking off the dust of his feet, as a signal of disapprobation, shake off a pair of shoes, which he purchased of an honest, industrious, and needy mechanic here, and forgot (!) to pay for? If so, will he inform his creditor where they may be found? Be honest, Br. C.

OBJECTIONS TO UNIVERSALISM CONSIDERED.....No. III.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

The third objection I shall notice, is, that Universalists do not preach the threatenings of the Bible. This objection arises, either from an entire ignorance of our preaching, or a misunderstanding of the nature or intended application of those threatenings. There is no portion of the sacred Scriptures more fully believed, and more earnestly preached by all Universalists, than those threatenings, which assure us, that God will by no means clear the guilty, but reward every man according to his works. And while most other denominations hold out inducements to the sinner, which forbid his repentance, by teaching him that the wicked are more happy in this world than the righteous; and that if he will only repent, at any time before he dies, he will be just as happy in another world; Universalists feel it to be their imperative duty to correct this fatal error, and show the transgressor the unavoidable reward of sin. Hence, it will be easily seen, that Universalists, so far from meriting the censure of this objection, are the only sect, against whom this objection cannot be sustained. We preach, that the threatenings of the law will be realized by every sinner; and not, that a person may live in the practice of iniquity, year after year, and escape all punishment.

We do not, it is true, threaten the sinner with endless misery, nor with the hopeless cruelties of unmitigated wrath; and if this is an objection to our preaching, the same objection rests against all God's holy prophets. If the objector is disposed to find fault with us, because we do not preach endless damnation, we advise him to settle this objection, in the first place, with the Bible. When he has shown, from better authority than the Bible, that all the inspired writers of the Old and New Testaments were in the fault, because they never edited the terms, endless, eternal, or everlasting misery, endless or everlasting damnation, and endless or eternal punishment, it will not be too late to complain of us. When he shall have shown that the penalty of the divine law, is either endless, eternal, or everlasting death, he may complain of the Bible and its authors; but not of us, since we profess not to be wise above what is written.

However, we are not disposed to deny, that our Lord threatened the nation of the Jews with everlasting punishment. But we are disposed to deny, that the word everlasting expresses a proper eternity, and we would respectfully offer the following reasons against such an idea. First, Linguists tell us, that the original word does not express endless duration of time, and that the noun from which this adjective is derived, is used often in the plural number. Second, We observe, that everlasting is frequently used by the sacred writers to express a limited period or duration of things. Third, We observe that "the restitution of all things was spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began"—that our Saviour says, "I will draw all men unto me," "and him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out"—and that Paul says, "all Israel shall be saved," which can never be fulfilled, if the everlasting punishment of the Jewish nation mean their endless misery. Does the objector ask us to employ words and phrases which are not in the Bible, and denounce judgments which falsify the most certain declarations of that sacred book—the clearest promises it contains? If such be the depravity of his heart and the unbelief of his soul, I would say to the objector, "repent, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out," and your character be redeemed from that disgrace, which your opposition to truth and the virtue of mankind throws upon you.

MOTIVES OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY REV. A. H. CURTIS.

Without the hope of immortality, how miserable is the lot of man! Doomed to exist for a brief moment, as it were—the victim of pain, sickness, toil and mourning—and then cease to exist, and be as though he never had been! Alas, the horrid prospect of sleeping, to wake no more! No thought ever entered the heart of man, that is so fraught with horror! No prospect that unites such unwelcome associations! In view of these considerations, how welcome the hope-inspiring promises of the Gospel! that brings the joyful prospect of immortal glory, sheds the sunbeams of hope on the night of the grave, and deprives the monster of his power to sting! Through Jesus Christ, life and immortality are clearly revealed—a future state of immortal glory is clearly brought to view; where sin shall cease its dread dominion—where every heart shall be melted with love, and every mouth become vocal with praise. Well might the angels of God proclaim glad tidings of joy to all people, since this was the burden of their message. Well might they proclaim peace and good-will to men, since they were the harbingers of him, who brought the assurance of our heavenly Father's love!

How glorious the prospect opened to the eye of faith, in the Gospel of the blessed God! how sublime its anticipations! He whose heart is imbued with its heavenly spirit—whose soul is delivered from the bondage of error—released from the galling chains of prejudice and superstition, and daily drinks into its rich consolations, enjoys a privilege of which the unbeliever can have no conception.

It is the healing balm of the wounded spirit—the consolation of the mourner—the solace of the afflicted—the soother of every earth-born care—the fountain of heaven-born joys! It is the prop of the dying—the beacon that points him across the dark Jordan of death, to scenes of celestial purity; where every affliction shall cease, and universal peace and harmony abound.

To him who enjoys such exalted views of God, and the economy of his saving grace, how strong are the motives to love him with all his heart, and walk in his statutes with obedient feelings! Is there aught of which the mind of man can conceive, that is so well calculated to burst the chains of iniquity, exalt and purify the moral nature of man, and assimilate his character to him, who is the pattern of all righteousness? Is there any thing that is so well calculated to withdraw his affections from the sinful vanities of the world?

In sincerity, I would ask the candid Christian of any order, what there is in this view of the divine character and government that is of licentious tendency? What is there in it, that can produce enmity against God, or a love of sin? Surely it is the correct stimulus to good and virtuous actions. For the more exalted our ideas of God, and the more extensive our views of his goodness, the more will our hearts be inclined to love him, and all his holy, wise, and just laws.

Is it possible—we ask the candid Christian—is it possible for the individual, who undoubtedly anticipates a heaven of celestial purity at God's right hand—where sin and every opposition to the divine government shall be no more, and where sorrow and mourning shall be unknown—to delight in the sinful vanities of this fleeting and imperfect world? Is it possible, in the nature of the case, for him who entertains such transcendent views of the love of God—who believing that his infinite goodness pervades all his works, and that his mercy shall ever endure—to hate him, or willingly rebel against him? In short, is it possible for him, who feels himself the object of his love, a vessel of his mercy, a child of his grace, and an heir to the heavenly inheritance, to profane his holy name, and love the way of the transgressor? Surely you will answer, No: every Christian of every name and creed, will answer, No: for this faith is the moving pivot of the Christian's duty—the chord of love that binds his heart to the fountain of goodness. It is the great inspiring motive, in the breast of every enlightened Christian.

This, reader, is the stimulus of the Universalist. These are the motives that impel him to action.

FEARFULNESS.

It is written in the Apocalypse, that "the fearful and the unbelieving shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone." And the question naturally arises, why are the fearful to be thus awfully punished? I will answer the question.

Unbelief is the cause of vice—so is fearfulness—hence the severity of their punishment. They, in effect, accuse God—the first, of declaring what is not true; and the second, of being unworthy of trust and confidence. Hence they deserve punishment—not that they injure God, but that they deprive man of happiness, peace and joy. They prevent man from doing much good he otherwise would do; and therefore rob community of valuable services. Hence are they made severely to torture those who cherish them, that they may the sooner cast them away.

An excellent brother told me he would not conduct a periodical for the world—the responsibility was too great, especially as a slight error might be the means of doing more hurt than the labor of weeks could repair. Yet this brother believed that we are judged by our motives—that God can overrule all evil for good, and make even our errors praise him—that it is the duty of every man to use all the means God has given him to spread the truth—and that periodicals are great means, under God, of thus spreading it. Yet for fear of publishing a few errors, which God could overrule for good, he would abstain from using his means in publishing many great and important truths!

The same excellent brother informed me he could not recommend a religious paper to any person's patronage, because he could not be certain there would be nothing published in it but what was good. He could preach the Gospel without contracting for a support, believing God would dispose people's hearts so that he should never suffer—but he feared God could not or would not dispose people's hearts to keep them from the injury of one evil article among many good ones. Why, dear reader, this spirit of fearfulness would prevent a man from recommending the Bible to any one's perusal, because it has recorded in it some sayings of the devil! Such are the injuries wrought by fearfulness in the good man's pathway of duty and usefulness. No wonder it is so awfully punished! What a mercy that God has made it so tormenting!

The cure for fearfulness, (I say cure, for it is clearly a disease of the conscience,) is, to ponder well the ways of our feet—to be consistent in always relying on Providence—to endeavor to select the most useful employment of which we are capable, however high or however lowly it may be; however arduous or however easy—to count well the difficulties and provide for their removal—and then, designing no evil, proceed in the work. In the energetic language of the West, "Go ahead." Depend upon it that you are not chargeable with unavoidable, unforeseen and unintended evils—that God is able to take care of them and overrule them—and that it is your business to do good, not to sit idle for fear of doing evil.

Too many are possessed of this spirit of fearfulness, with which none should be "surprised" but "the hypocrites." It is bondage. It is not the "spirit of love, and of power, and of a sound mind." Instead of being the sign of a sound conscience, it is the mark of an over-tender one. No man can be happy in such a state of feeling. No man can be useful with it. Had Jesus, and Peter, and Paul, and Luther, and Winchester, and Murray, been possessed of it, we should not now bow in veneration at their names—we should not now be rejoicing in that "perfect love" that "casteth out all fear."

God deliver men from unbelief, that they may "cease to do evil;" and from fearfulness, that they may "learn to do well"—that they may "trust in the Lord in all" their "ways"—that they may boldly "plead for the widow," and "judge the orphan," and "break the jaws of the wicked and pluck the spoil out of his teeth."

UNIVERSALIST PUBLICATIONS.

The Sentinel and Star in the West will be changed to The Western Universalist, at the close of the present volume—i. e., in July next. It will be published in Cincinnati every week, each number to contain eight closely printed pages, super-royal octavo, (about one-third more matter than the Sentinel now contains,) devoted to theology and miscellaneous literature, of such durable interest to the reader, as shall render it fully worthy of preservation and binding at the close of each year. It will be afforded to subscribers at two dollars per annum, payable in advance. In no case will a second number of the paper be sent to any one who does not comply with the terms of payment. Publishers and Editors,

HON. SAMUEL TIZZARD,
REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

The Star in the East and New-Hampshire Universalist has reached the close of its second volume, and asks assistance by way of increased patronage, which it richly merits and we hope will promptly receive. It is published at Concord, New-Hampshire, every Saturday, on a royal sheet, at one dollar and fifty cents, in advance, or two dollars at the end of the year.

Publisher,
Editor,

WILLARD HAYES,
REV. J. G. ADAMS.

A Text and Hymn Book.—Br. F. Langworthy proposes publishing, (probably has published, by this time,) "sermons, essays, rules for understanding the figurative language in the Revelation, arrangement of texts for theological debate, and select hymns suitable for choirs and single performers," in one volume, to be entitled "The Key of the Kingdom, and Songs of the Redeemed." It will be furnished at 50 cents per copy, retail. Orders to be addressed to F. LANGWORTHY, Madrid, N. Y.

TOUR TO THE WEST.

Br. Townsend, of Victor, intends making a tour through Ohio, Michigan and Illinois, in May next. Milan, Ohio, Adrian and Ann Arbor, Michigan, and Chicago, Illinois, are places named as those he will visit in his route.

Br. Townsend is an accredited agent for this paper, with whom any business may be safely transacted. We wish also to commend him particularly to our friends in the West as an able preacher of the impartial grace of God, with the experience and good judgment necessary to give good advice where it is needed, respecting the proper organization of our friends now scattered abroad in the West.

EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION.

There is probably no charge more frequently made against Universalists, by the devout of other denominations, than, that we do not believe in experimental religion—that we are not pious and devoted—and that we are not spiritually minded. Yet strange as it may sound even to some professed Universalists, there is no charge more false than this. And as “charity begins at home,” let us first attend to those professed Universalists, who, by their conduct and their words, assist our opposers in maintaining the charges here denied by us.

It too frequently happens that when men are convinced they have long been over-credulous, they take the opposite extreme and become suspicious and skeptical. Having found one hypocrite whom they had long deemed a good man, they are ready to set every good man down as a hypocrite. Thus is it with many who are called Universalists—thus has it been (and perhaps is yet) with the writer. They find that the doctrines of Partialism are not taught in the Bible—that many practices and pretences are unequivocally condemned by Jesus and his apostles, which the world esteems very pious and religious—they find that their confidence has been often abused, their money misapplied, and their feelings improperly enlisted; and finding this out by the instrumentality of Universalist preaching or periodicals, they call themselves Universalists, when, perhaps, they are only anti-Partialists; and they become sturdy opposers of every practice insisted on by their former companions—jealous of every attempt to enlist their services in the support of Christianity, or a Christian benevolence—draw tight their purse strings, button their pockets, indurate their feelings, absent themselves from where prayer is wont to be made or praise to ascend to God, and scoff at religious feelings, even against the secret desires of their hearts and the dictates of conscience and reason. Such is, very generally, the reaction of views, feelings and actions which takes place in the honest dupe of bigotry and superstition, when he first gets his eyes partially opened, and sees “men as trees walking.”

Go to such an one and ask him if he is pious—has experienced religion—is spiritually minded—and what will he understand by your questions? For as he understands you, so will he his reply. By “piety,” he will understand a long, sour visage and pretended sanctity, as a cloak under which a strong love for a neighbor’s property may be concealed, and iniquitous practices carried on—and he will accordingly tell you, that he thanks God he is not pious, and hopes he never will be! By “experimental religion,” he understands a rush of animal excitement, produced voluntarily or involuntarily, raised, excited and carried up by fasting, prayer, night watching, sympathy, and intense confinement of the whole mind to a series of most terrible, awful and agitating subjects until nature is exhausted, reason prostrated, strength gone, and fanaticism and misguided fervor are all in all—and he will tell you that he thanks God he has been completely released from all experimental religion, and hopes he may be saved from all such nonsense in future! And by “spiritual mindedness,” he will understand a set of mystical and visionary ideas and appearances, called special revelations, and spiritualized explanations of mysteries, and dark passages of Scripture, in which he was once seduced to indulge until he was really brought to believe that every irregular suggestion of animal passion was the voice of a real personal devil whispering in his ear, and every dream of his disturbed slumbers, or vagary of his day reveries, was the trump of the angel Gabriel, or Michael, or the voice of the personal Holy Ghost, declaring to him the secrets of God, and confirming the teachings of his particular preconceived doctrines. Disgusted with the recollections of many such exhibitions of spiritual moonshine and folly, and loathing the “disinterestedness” into which a love for the applause and doctrines of his church had seduced him, when he declared that he was willing to be damned for the glory of God, and to shout hallelujah and amen to the unending misery of his dearest relatives and friends—sick at heart at such recollections of his weakness, he gruffly replies, that he does not believe in spiritual mindedness, for thank God he has learned that it is all a pretence and a folly. Such being the replies of such Universalists, (whether they have “experienced” such follies themselves, or noticed them in others,) the opposer is perfectly justifiable in supposing and reporting that Universalists do deny and oppose piety, devotion, experimental religion, and spiritual mindedness—that is, he is justified in reporting thus, until he is better informed, as I now mean to inform him.

Be it known then, to all our friends and opposers, that Universalists do believe in all these things, in the proper sense of the terms used. Even the very persons above named, who make denial of such belief, do believe in, and frequently possess and practice, piety, experimental religion, and spiritual exercises of the mind—at least a large majority of them do, as I shall now proceed to prove.

What is meant by the terms piety, devotion, experimental religion; etc.? I do not ask what our opposers mean by these terms—nor yet what our newly converted friends mean by them—nor what Universalists generally mean by them—but what do lexicographers, and the best writers in our language, mean by them? In short, what is the proper meaning of these terms? This is the question. Let the terms be fully and fairly defined, and then every person can tell you whether he believes in or possesses the things really meant by the terms.

Piety. Believed to be derived from Deus, God, and signifies a performance of the duties arising from the relationship existing between God, as a Father, and man, as his child. In its more extensive meaning, it denotes the performance of the duties due from children to their parents. Who will dare to say that Universalism does not recognize the paternal relationship of God to man, and the filial relationship of every man to God? No one—for this is the foundation of all the doctrines, precepts and hopes of Universalism. Whether Universalists practice the duties arising out of this relationship, must be left to others to decide. That we practice them as well as our neighbors, we know—for they practice but little on their principles—less perhaps than we do on ours—to our shame and disgrace be it acknowledged. But do we practice as much on our principles of piety, as our opposers do on theirs? If we do, we are as well as they are—if not, then are they much more consistent than we. It is of no avail to say we are as good, or even much better than our opposers—for this we can easily be, and yet be as far behind what our principles demand of us, as they are before what their principles require of them. When will we learn, and feel, that to be Universalists we must not measure ourselves by Partialism, but by Universalism—by Christ and his Gospel?

Religion. This word comes from two words, signifying to consider again, or (as others, and a majority of philologists say) two words signifying to bind together again. “Experimental” needs no definition—it means that which is experienced—felt—known. What say our opposers, then—and our friends, what say they? Is Universalism a system of experimental religion? Do we believe in experimental religion? Have we felt or known a system of faith that binds men together again—or that has been obtained by reconsidering the evidences of the hopes we entertain and the doctrines we believe? Surely—surely we have felt and known such a religion—surely we have carefully examined its evidences—and surely we find that to be universal and endless which our opposers limit to a past or confine to the boundaries of time and sense.

Spiritual mindedness. This term means, being of the same mind as the spirit of God, or of Christ, which dwells in the renewed man. The spiritual minded man has no will contrary to God’s—no mind contrary to the mind of Christ—no desire opposed to the desire of a holy spirit breathing within him. What, then, is the will of God? It is that all may be holy—all know the truth—all be happy. What is the mind of Christ? That all might come to him, and he would cast none out—that if lifted up from the earth, he would draw all men unto him—in short, that God’s will might be done. And the desires of a holy spirit ever will be that God may be glorified in the highest by the complete accomplishment of his will—that Jesus may see the travail of his soul and be satisfied—and that the universe may be redeemed from sin and sorrow, and filled with holiness and bliss.

Now where is the Universalist that is not spiritual minded—wherein does Universalism fail in inculcating this very spiritual mindedness in all its fulness and glory? Oh, that our opposers could learn, and speak and feel this truth—then would they, too, rejoice with us in the hope of the restitution of all things! And why cannot they? One reason is that Universalists hinder them. It is truth. Too many of our brethren take more pains to deny what we do really believe, than to show our opposers that they mistake the true meaning of religious phrases, and the teachings of Scripture. Others profess to believe Universalism, who by their conduct disgrace it—make it a cloak for sin and abomination—and (hypocritical enemies to impartial grace, that they are!) thus confirm the fears and prejudices of many who wish they could believe it, but dare not even investigate it, for fear that it may lead them to like disregard of the precepts of God, the duties of society, and the decencies of life. God grant our opposers courage and candor to investigate for themselves—our friends knowledge and prudence to teach what we do believe—our hypocritical professors and shameless dis-practicers, grace to repent, and virtue to be honest and decent—and all purer views of doctrine, clearer perceptions of duty, and increased strength to practice.

ITEMS.

There are a few kind souls among our opposers, who have rather more zeal than knowledge, and are determined to enlighten us with their exhortations, slang and rant, and Scripture quotations, in order that we may be saved. To two of them I now address myself.

The precocious youth, W. A. P., who writes us from Evans’ Mills, is respectfully informed that, if he will read his Testament correctly, he will discover that though the apostles had been “Pharisees,” yet they renounced “the Phariseeick doctrine,” (Matt. xvi: 6-13,) before they became fully followers of Jesus—even as “Pawl,” though a “jue,” renounced the doctrine of the “jues” when he embraced Christianity.

This sapient youth is further informed that if he will study his Bible better, he will hardly volunteer such impudent instructions on a subject (Universalism) of which he manifests himself so perfectly ignorant—the addition of a spelling book to his library and writing desk, seems much needed, from the following “spesamens.” He speaks of “Nehemyah, Pharoh, Nebuchadrezze, Christians, dulcermers, planes of dury, sword of the spirit,” and other Scripture names—and of “triumph, Parshalism, perswasions, enemys, enny thing worthey of theas things, caricter,” etc., words I am certain he never learned to write with such letters in our paper. Seeing, then, that his past reading has improved him so little, I recommend him to go over the same course until he can properly “spell all the hard words in it without baulking.”

In conclusion he accuses me of crying “peas, peas, when God has said there is no peas,” a charge I most seriously deny. I never have cried peas, or any other vegetables, out of season—and certainly have not thought of crying either green peas or new potatoes this whole Winter! And who did?

If the poor ignorant youth, who has volunteered to teach me how to edit the Magazine and Advocate, means peace, instead of peas, (as is probable,) I would inform him, I am not a “Parshalist” to promise peace to the wicked, enjoyment in sin, and to declare that a life of holiness is one of thorns, and sorrows, and pains—but I preach that “there is no peace to the wicked,” but “great peace have they which keep” the law of God; for while “the wicked are like the troubled sea,” the ways of wisdom “are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.” Hence his charge is against the Bible, if against me, for I confine myself strictly to that in bearing testimony on these subjects.

The poor fellow probably meant well, but understands badly—he has zeal, but without sufficient knowledge to direct it. May he learn a little as he grows older, continue to study the Bible and to read this paper.

Linus Evarts, of Fairfield, or as he calls himself "one of no persuasion," has sent us what he calls "inconsistencies of Universalism with the Bible," requesting its publication. The manuscript is not fitted for the printer, and as its contents are neither new nor unanswered, it is not worth the trouble it would cost us to prepare it. He needs a better acquaintance with both the Bible and its doctrine (Universalism) to make a plausible opposer. The texts he refers to are well known to, and firmly believed by us. They mean exactly what they teach, but they do not teach the existence of either endless sin or endless misery. The word rendered "day" in Acts xvii: 31, signifies an indefinite period. Day frequently is used thus—see Cruden's Concordance. "Judgment" means rule, government, decision, punishment, reward, etc. "The kingdom of God," is here on earth—it is "in power," "peace and joy in a holy spirit." The book of Revelation relates to "things that were shortly to come to pass," eighteen hundred years ago, not to events in eternity. It is, indeed, "absurd to believe that those who die enemies to God's holy government, can be happy in heaven"—UNLESS Jesus told the truth in declaring man freed from earthly passions in the resurrection; (Matt. xxii: 23-34;) and unless Paul was not absurd in declaring that "we shall be changed," in the same state. (1 Cor. xv: 52.) And then, it would be "absurd" not to believe it.

There—having thus repaid the kindness of Mr. Evarts, in endeavoring to persuade us that our heavenly Father is full of weakness or cruelty, we beg of him to tell us, 1. What law is that, Christ died to redeem us from? 2. Where does the Bible say that its "curse" is "merited endless damnation?" If the Bible reveals a law whose penalty is endless misery, it can be referred to, and the controversy will be ended. 3. What proof has he that "the sheep (named in Matt. xxv) represent the pure, holy and innocent children of God," instead of "the nations?" Come, most sapient instructor, give us "more light." A. B. G.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Some of our readers may remember that, a few weeks since, we declined opening our columns to a controversy on this subject, until the people should desire it. Our reasons for thus declining arose from the heated and irregular manner in which that subject has hitherto been approached by the respective parties, and from the belief that private conversation generally would better tend to diffuse the needed information. Since then, the subject of publishing has been discussed and reconsidered, and a plan devised for publishing cool, deliberate and respectful articles.

This is in consequence of several letters informing us that such articles, pro and con, are needed and desired by many. An article prepared some time since, in favor of such an institution, has been received and will appear in our next. If in two weeks from that time an article is received against the measure, equally cool and dispassionate, it also will be inserted—or, what we deem the best, out of all that may be offered. For we do not wish to occupy our paper wholly with the controversy on this subject—nor to have two armies in the field. One single, known advocate on each side, will be sufficient—to that one, all others may direct their arguments in aid of their views of the question. After the two first have closed, if any others are yet dissatisfied, two others may enter the field on similar equal terms, and canvass all the new arguments they can offer.

I trust the limits of our paper, and the nature of the question will justify the above rules, which are certainly equitable, and will surely yield as much information, with less extraneous matter and heat of feeling, than any other mode we now can think of. A. B. G.

PAPER.

When we purchased the establishment of the Magazine and Advocate, we wrote to the paper makers in this vicinity, and also to several in Massachusetts, besides making inquiry in the city of New-York, in order to secure a supply of the best paper our means would allow. But paper was a scarce article. The several fires in New-York and Boston increased the scarcity very much. The eastern paper makers generally, refused to contract for the delivery of any paper until this Spring. We therefore made a contract near home, for a partial supply. Messrs. Savage and Moore were about fitting up a new manufacturing establishment, with improved and very extensive machinery, and we hoped soon to get an additional supply from that. But the severe Winter prevented them from getting their mill into operation until this Spring. Hence we have been obliged to get paper, as best we could, from three different paper makers. This will account for the difference which may have been observed by our patrons in the paper we have sent them. It was unavoidable. Nothing short of a ruinous expenditure could have prevented it on our part. We perceive that nearly all of our brethren at the East, and the publishers of several literary papers, have been apologizing frequently during the Winter, for the bad paper on which they have been obliged to print. We have delayed apology and explanation, until we were certain the evil was remedied. The best paper hitherto used by us, was delivered on contract with I. Thompson and Son, of Montgomery county. Of it, some yet remains to be delivered. The present paper is from the mill of Messrs. Savage and Moore, of Sauquoit. From these two mills we shall receive our future supplies, and trust this will be the last apology and explanation called for by the quality of our paper. A. B. G.

A GOOD IDEA.

A ministering Br. who is in the habit of frequently sending religious notices by mail, for publication, says he intends, in future, to send us the names of one or more new subscribers, and make us pay the postage. That's right Br.—go-a-head—we have some hundred sets of back numbers yet on hand, and will cheerfully comply with your suggestion. G. and H.

TEACHERS IN THE INSTITUTE.

A report has been circulated that the teachers in the respective departments of the Institute, were about to leave. The teachers themselves disavow such intention; and the friends of the Institute may rest assured of the falsity of said report.

A DUN.

The publishers of the Universalist Register and Almanac, for 1836, have requested me to state, in their name, that they want money, from those who have money in hand from the sale of that work. Will such please make immediate remittance of what can be conveniently and safely remitted; stating, also, how many copies they have yet on hand? The publishers have payments to make very soon, and wish also to know how many copies of the work are yet on hand. Where particularly convenient, remittance may be made to this office—otherwise to SANDERSON AND WHISTON, Cortland Village, N. Y.

N. B. As navigation will soon open again, it is expected that those packages frozen in last Fall on the canal, will reach their destination. Will those who receive, do as well as they can with them, and the other books sent? Orders for more will be attended to. A. B. G.

The publishers of The Universalist and Ladies' Repository, please send current volume to Miss A. Peck, Hampton, Oneida county, N. Y. S. R. S.

REMOVAL.

After Monday next, (25th inst.,) the publication office of this paper will be held in the second story of Knickerbocker Hall, south side of Catharine-street, near Genesee.

The printing office will be removed to the third story of the same building, before the 1st of May.

* Entrance by the first open stairway east of Genesee-street.

A CALL.

If I can find a suitable place to locate in Ohio, I shall remove from Dundee, next Fall. The moral vineyard of our Redeemer, in this section, ought not to be left without a watchman, lest the young foxes destroy the vines, and the old ones eat up the grapes. I would say, therefore, in behalf of the friends, if some brother, who is willing to endure persecution for Christ's sake, is willing to visit this country, he will please come on, during my present tour to Ohio, and give notice of his coming in the Magazine and Advocate, or in the Herald of Truth. M. L. WISNER.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in May, by Br. WHITNEY at Mottville—Br. C. B. BROWN at Ellisburg—Br. C. S. BROWN at Lisle, at which time the Eucharist will be celebrated—Br. BRITTON at Depauville, and at Lafargeville at 5 P. M.—Br. ROBERTS at Lakeville—Br. Sias at Brownville, near Br. Cole's, and in the village in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in May, by Br. BODEN at Richmondville—Br. C. B. BROWN at the shingled schoolhouse, Palermo, and at Jennings Corners at 5 P. M.—Br. WHITNEY at Howlet Hill—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford.

Br. BODEN will preach in the evenings of May 5 and 6, at Lawyersville—9, at Cobleskill, as the friends may appoint—11 and 12, at Jacksonborough.

A quarterly Conference of the first Universalist church in Oswego county, will be held at Mexico, on the third Sunday in May next.

NEW-YORK STATE CONVENTION.

This Convention will hold its annual session at Auburn on the last Wednesday and Thursday (25th and 26th days) of May next. The following Associations have appointed the following delegates to attend the same—in some cases, with power to appoint their substitutes.

POETRY.

The following poetry is from the Quebec Mercury—it is good. We could wish, however, that those who are gifted, as is the author of this poetry, would be more cautious in the use of the sacred name; its frequent occurrence below seems almost irreverent:—

THE INDIAN'S EVENING SONG.

"Lo the poor Indian! whose untutor'd mind Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind."
ESSAY ON MAN.

God of majesty and might
God of darkness and of night;
God of gloom and God of glory,
God of wild woods, high and hoary,—
Hearken! let the red man's tale
Reach thee through the night's dark veil.

God of yonder rising shield,
Glittering over flood and field—
Lamp of desert, wood and brake,
Mirror of the stream and lake,
Guiding with its silver ray
The red man's dark and weary way.

God of yonder sparkling sky,
God beyond the ken of eye;
God of calmness and of storms,
God of men as well as worms;
God of silence and of noise—
God! in whom all things rejoice.

God of the whirling meteor's maze,
God of the forest's awful blaze,—
Hearken! 'midst this silent grove,
To the tribes that hunt and rove:

Then hasten from each wood and wild,
Hasten parent—hasten child;
Hasten chieftain from thy rule—
Hasten prophet from thy school—
Hasten horseman from the race—
Hasten huntsman from the chase—
Hasten rowman from the lake—
Hasten bowman from the brake—
Hasten warrior from the fight—
Hasten! rest thy limbs of might;
Spill no more thy brother's blood,
'Tis the cannibal's foul food!
Rest thy spear, unbend thy bow,
Hasten here, and pay thy vow;
Hasten, hasten! every one—
Mother, daughter—sister and son;
The chorus raise—the rites prepare—
Hasten! bless us, God of prayer!

God of the Indian's birth and death—
God who gave him life and breath,
Save him from the foe's man's scowl,
And the victor's ruthless howl:
Guard his tent and shield his wife,
Long protect his infant's life!

Spirit of the gloomy woods;
Spirit of the wayward floods,
Shield us in the midnight hour,
Guard us when thy tempests lower;
Father of our ancient race,
Lead us rest, and give us peace,
Till the dawn begins to turn,
And the morning star return!

Let the spirit of our sires
Watch around our wigwam fires,
Till the golden beam of day
Bids them wind their airy way
To the regions of the brave,
Far beyond the broad green wave!

God who slumbers not, nor sleeps—
God the innocent who keeps,
Let thy dark cloud be our cover—
O'er us let thy spirit hover.

God of endless time and space,
Long befriended the red man's race;
Guard him from the white man's chains—
The white man's tortures, wiles and pains.

God of night, and God of day,
Thus we praise, and thus we pray!

It is by daily conduct and habitual expenses that character for generosity or parsimony must be estimated. There may be other reasons for putting one's name into benevolent subscriptions; but nature speaks out in private, and he who is truly generous will feel for the lowly, and be ready to aid the distressed and deserving though unseen of others. The man who is reader with a sermon than with a sixpence to the mendicant at his gate—who is so pious himself that he is afraid of encouraging profligacy by giving alms to beggars of suspicious morality—who stunts his table lest the excess of creature comforts should beget pride and lasciviousness in his household, and is austere and harsh to his dependants, lest by mildness he might make them forget they are servants—may be a very respectable sort of person and of good repute to the world, yet he is but an indifferent Christian, let his attendance at church or a meeting-house be as punctual as it may.—Family Library.

NEW YEAR'S EVE OF AN UNHAPPY MAN.

From the German of Jean Paul.

An old man stood at his window on a New Year's eve, and gazed with an eye of settled despair on the immovable, eternally blooming heaven above, and the silent, pure, white earth beneath him, upon which, at that moment, there was no being so joyless and so sleepless as himself. For his grave was high at hand—it was hid only by the snows of age, not by the verdure of youth; and he brought to it, out of his whole richly gifted life, nothing but errors, crimes and diseases; an enfeebled body, a desolate soul, a heart full of venom, and an old age full of remorse. The love days of youth came back upon him like spirits, and led him away to the bright morning of his days, when his father first placed him at the turning point of human life, whence the right hand road leads by the broad sunlit path of virtue, to a wide and peaceful region of clear light, rich treasures, and heavenly inhabitants; while the left hand one plunges down through the hollows of vice into a dark depth, distilling with deadly poisons, full of hissing serpents, and the damp, sultry vapors of the tomb.

Alas! the serpents were even then clinging to his breast, and the poison to his tongue, and he knew where he was.

In despair and unspeakable torture he cried out to heaven, "Give me my youth again! Father! place me again at the turning point, that I may make another and better choice!"

But his father and his youth were both long gone by. He saw an ignis-fatuus playing over marshes and expiring in the church-yard; and he said, "Behold the days of my folly!" He saw a star fall from heaven and melt into darkness upon the earth. "Tis thyself," said his bleeding heart; and the serpent's teeth of remorse fastened more sharply on his wounded spirit.

While he struggled with these feelings, the song that announced the new year floated down from the watch-tower like distant church music. His emotions became softer; he looked around on the horizon and abroad over the wide earth, and thought of his youth, who now, happier and better than he, were teachers of the world, and parents of happy children, and blessed by Providence; and he said, "Alas! had I but willed it, I too might have slumbered through this night with fearless eye. Alas! beloved parents! I too might have been happy, had I but followed your new year's advice and new year's wishes."

While this feverish thought of his youthful days was upon him, it seemed to him as though a skeleton in the neighboring church-yard rose slowly, and put on his likeness, till his superstitious fancy saw in it a living youth, and his own once blooming figure danced before his eyes in bitter mockery.

He could not bear to look upon it; he covered his eyes; a thousand warm tears fell in the snow; he could only sigh heavily, hopeless, almost senseless: "Return my youth! do but return!"

And she returned, for his new year's eve was but a fearful dream; he was still young. Only his errors were no dream; but he thanked God that he was allowed, while yet in his youth, to turn aside from the foul by-ways of vice to the sunny path which leads to the land of purity and happiness.

Youthful reader! if thou, like him, art upon the road of error, turn like him. This fearful dream will one day be thy judge, but when thou shalt exclaim in anguish, "Return my youth!" it will not return.

HE WILL NEVER MAKE A MERCHANT.

A gentleman from the country placed his son with a dry goods merchant in — street. For a time all went on well. At length a lady came into the store to purchase a silk dress, and the young man waited upon her. The price demanded was agreed to, and he proceeded to fold the goods. He discovered, before he had finished, a flaw in the silk, and pointing it out to the lady, said, "Madam, I deem it my duty to tell you that there is a fracture in the silk."

Of course she did not take it.

The merchant overheard the remark, and immediately wrote to the father of the young man "to come and take him home;" "for," said he "he will never make a merchant."

The father who had ever reposed confidence in his son, was much grieved, and hastened to the city to be informed of his deficiencies. "Why will he not make a merchant?" asked he.

"Because he has no laci," was the answer. "Only a day or two ago, he told a lady, voluntarily, who was buying silk of him that the goods were damaged; and I lost the bargain. *P*hasesers must look out for themselves. If they cannot discover flaws, it would be foolish in me to tell them of their existence."

"And is that all his fault?" asked the parent.

"Yes," answered the merchant, "he's very well in other respects."

"Then I love my son better than ever; and I thank you for telling me of the matter; I would not have him another day in your store for the world."

We make no comments on the above. Whether such a trade, as the merchant would make, is not rather taking advantage of the purchaser's ignorance, than making the best use of one's knowledge, we leave to our readers to decide.—N. E. Galaxy.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 13th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. PATRICK CASSIDY, to Miss HARRIET GILBERT, all of this city. [The Printers in concert assembled around a share of the cake and wine, unite in wishing for the blissful preservation of the happy union.]

In Putney, by Rev. M. L. Wisner, Mr. WILLIAM H. CLARK, to Miss PATIENCE EGGLESTON.

In Willet, Cortland county, March 27, by Rev. C. S. Brown, Mr. WESTCOTT BURLINGAME, to Miss MALINDA EATON.

In this city, 26th ult., by E. S. Barnum, Esq., Mr. FRANCIS HARRISON, to Miss ADELINE MASURY, all of this city.

DEATHS.

In Manchester, Oneida county, March 18, Mrs. GREEN, wife of Mr. John Green, aged 39 years.

Mrs. Green suffered greatly from a cancer in the breast, but endured it with great patience. Sustained by the hope of the Christian, she expressed entire confidence that the future would be to her a place of rest and joy. Though not a member of the society, Mrs. G. was an attendant on the Universalist meeting in Clinton.

At Madison, March 25, Mr. J. T. BURTON, aged 65 years. He was not a professor of Christianity, but selected as a text for his funeral services, Psalm lxxxviii: 1, 2. His funeral was attended on March 27, by a large congregation, to whom a discourse was delivered agreeably to the previous request.

At Sylvan Springs, Chenango county, on the 8th inst., Mrs. MARTHA B. NEGUS, wife of Mr. Alfred Negus, aged 21 years. Her funeral was attended by the writer, on the 9th, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the afflicted mourners, from Job xix: 21. C. S. B.

On the 7th ult., on the Seneca Reservation, in Pennsylvania, the celebrated chief, GAH-YAN-WAH-GAH, or Cornplanter, aged about 100 years. This noble Indian, at an early period of the revolutionary war, took an active part on the side of the Americans in that glorious struggle—and has ever since manifested the utmost friendship for the whites. When solicited by Washington to send some of his young men to Philadelphia, for the purpose of being educated, he sent at the head of the band, his son, Henry O'Bail—an evidence of a strong mind overcoming deep-rooted and long existing prejudice.

He, with his associate, Red Jacket, was for many years, the counsellor and protector of the interests of his nation; and we regret that our sources of information are too limited to furnish the particulars more fully of the eventful life of this "Nature's nobleman."—Buffalo Daily Journal.

BRIEF CRITICISMS.....No. I.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"Now this one thing, exactly this one disposition, is the grand principle of moral depravity on earth—this not caring for what is endured by other beings that are made liable to suffer. Estrangement from the supreme Goodness, indeed is the primary cause; but this very thing, this not caring for the sufferings of other beings, is the substantial, practical essence of the iniquity which forms the curse and blast of this wretched world."

The above sentence is an extract from "Foster's Essays," an English publication, which possesses much merit. The author, I should judge from his writings, to be a Calvinistic divine of respectable talents and acquirements. To the words quoted, I give my unqualified approbation; and they unquestionably will receive the assent of every unbiased mind. There, probably, was never a sentence, uttered in more strict accordance with truth. History, experience, daily observation, testify with one voice, that an indifference to the sufferings of others, "is the substantial, practical essence of the iniquity, which forms the curse and blast of this wretched world." Were not mankind heedless of the sufferings of their fellow-beings, they would not permit any selfish gratification or gain to lure them to the commission of those unjust acts which cause this suffering. Would men tolerate and perpetuate corrupt and unjust institutions, and countenance and support cruel, tyrannical, unequal laws—be guilty of murder, piracy, theft—become dishonest, intemperate and vicious—were it not that they entirely disregarded the miseries these things inflict upon others? Had they a refined susceptibility to the sufferings of mankind—did they truly commiserate the woes of their fellow-creatures and "weep with those who weep," they would not, yea, they could not, knowingly, bring themselves into a state of mind to injure them. No. It is because the heart is calloused to the gentler promptings of our nature—is cased in the steel of selfishness, and is a stranger to the breathings of the benign spirit of the Gospel, that it plunges into crime, heedless of the wretchedness it inflicts upon itself and surrounding beings. It may be noticed, invariably, that the more debased and sinful an individual becomes, the less is he disposed to listen to the promptings of pity and compassion—the less is he inclined to sympathize with the distressed and unfortunate of his race—thus showing conclusively, that this hardness of heart, is the very staff upon which he leans for support in his iniquity, and that were this removed, he would have little inclination to do that which is injurious to his fellow-beings.

In regard to the "primary cause" of this indifference to the sufferings of others, the author speaks truly, when he says, it is "estrangement from the supreme Goodness." Little did he imagine, however, in penning the above sentence, that he was giving his unequivocal assent and sanction to the spirit of the doctrine of universal salvation. So unguardedly and yet so truly, will men sometimes speak, when favorite systems are, for the moment, from the mind. It is one of the fundamental principles of the doctrine of "the restitution," that an indifference to the sufferings of others, to the welfare of our race, is one of the most fruitful sources of sin—is that which steels the heart to the commission of the most flagrant crimes.

But how can this evil be remedied? how can "this not caring for the sufferings of other beings," be removed from the human heart? Were our author to answer this inquiry, with his system in view, he undoubtedly would reply that it only could be effected by preaching the wrath of God, and the terrors of endless suffering. But in this, would he not contradict his own premises? If estrangement from the goodness of God, "is the primary cause," of indifference to the sufferings of others, (as it unquestionably is,) then, evidently, remove the "estrangement," and the "indifference" is gone—for when a cause is destroyed, the effect necessarily ceases,—or, in other words, teach men the goodness of the Deity—let the conviction that he is "good to all," that his love for his creatures is unbounded, impartial and eternal—let this conviction, with all its necessary deductions, settle deep upon the heart, and it will exercise a salutary and abiding influence—it will fall upon the hardened soul, with all the sweet influence of the morning shower upon the parched earth—it will revivify its dormant susceptibilities, awaken its tenderest emotions, enlarge and strengthen its affections, and mould it into the true spirit of the Gospel of the blessed Redeemer—it will cause its subject to exclaim, "if God so loves us, we ought also to love one another." This is the kind of preaching which we have ever contended, is necessary to regenerate the world from the love and practice of sin. The terror of punishment may restrain the outward act; but that it cannot cleanse the heart of its impurities—that it cannot expel the love of transgression, is as evident as the operations of cause and effect. The beneficial effects at which I have above glanced, as flowing from a knowledge of the goodness of God, is a deduction legitimately drawn from the paragraph upon which we are commenting. And thus we discover a learned Limitarian divine, when honestly recording the emotions of his heart, and the dictates of his cool judgment too, virtually sanctioning the proclamation of that which is the very soul of universal restitution—the doctrine of "the supreme goodness."

How will this sentence apply to the future state of existence? It is undoubtedly believed by the author, and by large bodies of professing Christians, that unknown myriads of their fellow-beings will, in the next world, be plunged into a place of ceaseless wretchedness! It is believed also that this dreadful doom of the lost will be distinctly known and seen by the happy inhabitants of heaven; yea, it is contended, that one of the most important objects for which this eternal torture is inflicted, is that, by having this awful scene constantly before them, at least in their mind's eye, the angelic hosts of paradise may be held in allegiance to the King of heaven. But what effect will this terrific display have upon the enjoyments of the redeemed? Can they behold with indifference the agonies of their fellow-creatures? Can they realize that this misery is without end, and that even some of their own friends and relatives are involved in it, and still remain unmoved, unaffected? If so, will not their hearts be devoid of every tender emotion of compassion? Would not, in such case, the exaltation from earth to heaven be a change for the worse? would it not rob them of every vestige of benevolence, pity and mercy, those characteristics which form the purest, brightest ornaments of the disciple of Jesus upon earth? And, moreover, would they not possess, in the highest degree, that very spirit of indifference to "the sufferings of other beings," which is so justly condemned, in the lines upon which we are commenting? Yes—indeed—were the inhabitants of heaven to be unmoved by the woes of the lost, this same spirit—"this not caring for the sufferings of other beings," which our author truly says, "is the substantial, practical essence of the iniquity, which forms the curse and blast of this wretched world," would reign triumphant throughout the mansions of the blessed! And is it so? Is that indifference to the sufferings of others, which is "the substantial, practical essence" of earthly iniquity, the pervading spirit of heaven—forming the foundation of the enjoyment of beatified saints and angels? Is this "not caring for the sufferings of other beings," which has "cursed and blasted this wretched world," and peopled hell with its countless millions, to arise to heaven and freeze up forever, every fountain of compassion and mercy? Is that horrid monster which has strided over our poor earth, spreading black devastation, wretchedness and sin, to become the presiding genius of paradise? God forbid! The Christian heart revolts in disgust from such a thought. A heaven of this character would become a terrific abode, for the individual who possessed one spark of the tender spirit which dwelt in the bosom of the compassionate Saviour of men!

If, upon the other hand, it be denied that this indifference and hardness of heart, will exist in heaven—if it be allowed that its beatified spirits will possess as much benevolence and compassion as good men do on earth, then, it is evident as the light of the sun, that the endless suffering of even one human being, would annihilate forever every vestige of happiness in heaven! Even a knowledge that the suffering was justly inflicted, could not restore joy to the bosoms of the heavenly spectators. Does it impart happiness to the benevolent man to behold a miserable fellow-being starving upon a gibbet, or burning at the stake, however just the punishment may be? Yea, could it be susceptible to the least enjoyment, with such a scene before him? Impossible—impossible!

Here, then, is the dilemma. Either the inhabitants of heaven must be totally destitute of benevolence, pity and mercy, and must possess that indifference which "is the substantial essence of earthly iniquity"—or there can be no such thing as happiness in heaven—or the doctrine of endless wo cannot be true! One of the two former of these propositions, unavoidably grows out of the latter. Reader, which will you adopt? Or will you more consistently reject the whole, as diametrically opposed to Scripture, nature and reason? Let these queries be candidly answered, and the light of truth will cheer your soul.

EPISCOPALIANISM.....No. VI.

UNINTERRUPTED SUCCESSION.

It is not intended to revive, or even to review to any extent, the controversy respecting the prepositional claims of Episcopacy to uninterrupted succession. This subject has been very fully discussed by some of the soundest theologians and the wisest and best men on either side of the question. And each succeeding examination has accumulated reasons for believing, that all pretension to Episcopal succession, is destitute of any proper foundation—and that were it otherwise, it is wholly unworthy of any religious regard or consideration.

We have had occasion to observe, that the Episcopal clergy admitted the divine authority, even of the pope—and that this admission was indispensable to the very existence of Protestant Episcopal institutions. The particulars to which this remark applies, are especially those which relate to the uninterrupted succession of bishops, and the consequent validity of ordination. It is notorious, that the clergy of the Episcopal church affect to be exceedingly sensitive and scrupulous on these subjects; and that they generally deny that any ministers are truly ordained, or have any sufficient and proper authority to administer the sacraments, who have not been consecrated by a bishop.

It is then, a matter of no little importance—how the English church became possessed of this extraordinary power of conferring an exclusively valid ordination. Admitting, for the present, that this authority is actually possessed—whence was it derived, and by whom was it conferred? It will not be pretended, that Episcopalians were more capable of originating such prerogatives than other Christians. And if they neither did nor could create them, they derived them from some source which they acknowledge possessed the power of bestowing them. The question therefore returns—whence did the Episcopal church derive the succession of its bishops, and their consequent exclusive authority to confer a valid Protestant ordination?

There is but one possible answer to be given to this question. The Catholic church claims an uninterrupted succession of bishops—otherwise called popes, from the days of the apostles. They maintain, that St. Peter was the first bishop of Rome—that those ordained by him, ordained their successors, and so on through every succeeding age of the church, down to the present time. It is therefore certain, that as the English church merely seceded from the Catholic, all the powers possessed by Episcopal bishops—be they more or less—were derived from the Papists. And as the pope consecrates the Catholic bishops, from which Episcopalians must alone date and derive their own ordination; then it follows, that their authority was centered in, and derived from the pope!

Whatever, therefore, may be the merits of the claim to ecclesiastical authority, by the Episcopal bishops—it is no less a claim for the authority of the pope in the same case; and if either, then both must be of divine institution. And hence, in order to render their claim even plausible, Episcopalians are constrained to acknowledge, that the popes have, in all ages, been the true and legitimate successors of the apostles, and the living representatives of St. Peter. This is Protestant authority with a vengeance! And it is curious and amusing enough, to witness the gravity with which it is urged and insisted on by those, who for three centuries have never omitted an opportunity to abuse the pope with the appropriate appellations contained in the New Testament, from antichrist down to the man of sin!—who have persecuted his followers without mercy—disfellowshipped his accredited ministers, though consecrated by the same hands which sanctified their own ordination—and who have withheld from them the exercise of their ecclesiastical functions, and the common rights of citizens! But we must leave the clergy of the establishment to reconcile their pretensions with their practices in this particular; and notice the evidences of their claims to uninterrupted succession.

The sober advocate of uninterrupted succession, will find himself strangely perplexed in the very first stage of his inquiry. As it is a matter of more than mere uncertainty, who were the immediate successors of St. Peter in the apostolic office, no effort of ingenuity, has yet been successful in unravelling the mystery which hangs over the succession in that period—or even in showing, that any regular succession then took place. And it is not enough that we are presented with the Roman calendar, which informs us, that St. such-a-one succeeded to another, as regular as cause and effect. Where authority settles every thing by prescription, this may silence, if it cannot satisfy the inquirer; but in this case, it should not be received with implicit confidence. We must first receive the evidence of a formal succession, and especially of the powers with which the representatives of the apostles were distinguished.

The succession to the see of Rome, if not absolutely interrupted, was often rendered exceedingly doubtful by frequent changes—as well as by the questionable manner by which those changes were effected. For during the turbulent periods which succeeded to the division of the Roman empire, and while every age was becoming more and more barbarous by the repeated inroads of the northern nations, the chair of St. Peter, like every other place of great power, was sought by divers competitors, who shrunk from no means calculated to secure its possession. The consequence was, that he who filled the papal throne one day, might be hurled the next from his lofty eminence by a more powerful competitor—who, in turn, was degraded, thrown into prison, or perhaps murdered. Each exerted himself to the utmost during his brief authority, in endeavors to secure the possession of the elevation he had gained; and each conferred bishopricks and other dignities upon his minions and favorites, while his opposers were treated as enemies, and were accordingly persecuted and anathematized.

But the difficulty of tracing a regular succession of bishops, is greatly augmented by other considerations. For the evidence must come embarrassed with the certainty, that there were times when two—nay, even three popes were exercising plenary powers at one and the same moment—when they were mutually hurling what is denominated “the thunders of the vatican” at each other; and to the expulsion and excommunication of refractory bishops, added the consecration of as many new ones as they deemed expedient. And last—but not the least difficult part of the process, must be taken into the account, the probable accession, not to say succession, of Pope Joan—a woman, whose character and ability appear to have been much better ascertained, than her title to the triple crown!

For several centuries in succession, the history of the popes, is a history of infamy, corruption, and blood. Laymen obtained the papedom by stratagem or bribery—boys of some nine or ten years of age, were thrust into the apostolic chair, either for the gratification of their friends—or what seems equally probable, to burlesque the holy see, and turn the papal pretensions into farce and ridicule. Frequently, his holiness fought his way up to the pontificate—and then as often found it necessary to fight in order to secure its possession.

In view of these facts—and they may be greatly aggravated by descending to their minutiae, how is it possible to ascertain who were the legitimate successors and representatives of the apostles? How can any honest and sober Christian hope for complete satisfaction, that such men were alone the true depositories of apostolic authority? But above all other things, how is it possible for learned and upright men to attach any importance to the pretension to an uninterrupted succession of popes and bishops since the first establishment of Christianity? How can such men cherish, for a moment, the notion, that even an undoubted succession can retain the least sanctity, when filtered through the enormous crimes, the complicated atrocities, the pride, prodigality, and impurity of the many monsters, who blasphemously arrogated to themselves the titles of the successors of St. Peter? Who would not rather trace his honors through some purer channel—or rather not trace them at all, than receive them at such hands? Who would not, like the great and good Master of Christians, spurn the fancied prerogatives of the order of Aaron, and adopt that of Melchisedek? How little have the characteristics of the popes comported with those of the accredited followers of the apostles—how illy suited the appellation of the “Vicar of Christ?” And surely those who claim ecclesiastical distinction from such hands, must have a strange fancy for hereditary dignities, or they would shrink from the task of threading their genealogy through the mazes of this labyrinth of darkness, uncertainty, and crime!

So well known are the abominations of the popes—and so deeply are they detested by the Episcopal clergy themselves—that notwithstanding their vanity in tracing the “divine rights of the bishops,” to, and even through these monsters of iniquity, both male and female, they have not unaptly called the whole succession of their spiritual God-fathers—antichrist. Be it so, then; and we bid them a cordial welcome to all the honors of their pedigree—to the only and exclusive use and benefit of all the powers guaranteed and conferred by an uninterrupted succession (if they can find it) in that ancient line—and if they please to claim it, the superior dignity of a valid ordination by the imposition of the hands of the “man of sin.”

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

It will doubtless be recollected, that the “General Convention of Universalists for the United States,” at its last session, resolved that the “propriety and expediency of establishing a Theological Seminary.....be recommended to the consideration of the members of our denomination.”

The time has now arrived, when the public mind should be prepared to act upon this very interesting subject. With a view to which, it is indispensable that all the information that can be elicited in relation to it, should be generally diffused—all the reasons for and against such an institution, candidly and dispassionately stated. In this way, and in this only, can the respective members of our different ecclesiastical bodies, which are soon to meet in the State of New-York, be in any measure qualified to act understandingly on the resolution. They may indeed act, and otherwise will act from the state of feeling and excitement produced by calling up the subject at the time, but as it will be comparatively new to most of the members, any resolution which they may take on the spur of the occasion, will be far from conveying with certainty the real views of the denomination. And this, because in all our public meetings, Conventions, and Associations, little time for the full discussion of any subject is allowed; and consequently, when one involving general interest, and requiring both candor and caution, claims consideration, it should, where practicable, be made the subject of previous examination.

It is proposed, therefore, to lay before the public some brief remarks on this subject, which have been suggested by observation and a small share of experience—with a view to draw some attention to its importance, and that the sentiments of the writer respecting it, may be fully and distinctly understood.

1. It is believed that the importance of respectable literary attainments to a clergyman, will be conceded by every person who reflects at all on the subject. He must at least, possess a competent knowledge of the language in which he is to preach; and so much general information respecting history, chronology, and geography, as not to be liable to great and gross mistakes in reference to time and place. Without these, whatever may be his native talents, he must never expect to gain, and never will gain hearers of good information. And for the same reason, every additional literary attainment which he may possess, will constitute an additional reason why the sphere of his usefulness will be enlarged; as mankind are little disposed to seek instruction from those whom they esteem less informed than themselves.

2. The same, or at least, similar reasons operate in producing a necessity for theological knowledge. By some means, whatever they may be, it is indispensable, that he who would impart religious instruction to others, must be so far informed himself as to have something to teach. And without adverting to instances, it is not difficult to imagine situations in which the theological novice will feel and lament his deficiency—where he must feel degraded in the estimation of opposers, if not in that of his friends; and realize a full and distressing sense of his incapacity to be extensively useful, as well as to secure and command public respect.

And the importance of these facts, is much enhanced in their application to Universalists at the present time, from the circumstance, that nearly every other religious denomination in our country, possesses an educated ministry. Whatever, therefore, we may choose to think, or say, or do, in respect to the literary and theological improvements of our own, until we embody a respectable proportion of learned preachers, of sound biblical knowledge, the public will certainly consider us behind the age. So that it is not alone in what we think of ourselves, but in what others think of us, that we are interested. It is granted, that we are not bound to regulate our conduct or opinions, even by public sentiment, in all cases; but we are under obligation to treat it with so much respect, as to examine the subject with patience, candor, and deliberation.

It should not be overlooked, that we are in great danger of misjudging in this particular, from the well-known fact—that those who are to decide, are very generally unacquainted with the full value of a competent education for a clergyman. And unhappily, it is not among the least of the impediments to improvement, that those who most need it, are usually among the last to perceive and appreciate their wants. A very great change has, however, taken place in the views of our denomination, in relation to ministerial qualifications; and though they may not have extended to the establishment of a theological seminary, they have been very decidedly expressed in favor of approximating our acquisitions to the standard of other sects. Yet neither preachers nor people have adopted any effectual measures for the attainment of this object; and new candidates are obliged to seek and adopt such means, as location or accident may place within their reach.

These means are frequently so deficient as to be of little or no use, and at the best are extremely defective. And it not unfrequently happens, that much time and labor is devoted to a course of reading, which, however interesting in itself, is yet of no imaginable consequence to the biblical student. Most of our earlier preachers who have read at all, will recollect with pain the many hours of anxious toil, spent in fruitless endeavors to select that kind of reading most suited to their wants. And finally, when that point was gained, how very few of them could derive any substantial benefit from the discovery. Age, or poverty, or cares had dissolved the charm of anticipated improvement, or extinguished the zeal for its acquisition, and left them to go down to the grave, honored for their toils and sufferings, beloved by the few for their virtues, and perhaps respected for their talents—but with their labors half performed, in consequence of a defective education. Could these men have entered the field of labor with the resources which if acquired at all, have been acquired in the midst of perplexing duties, and even then at the termination of their career—how much more would they have done, and how much better would their work have been performed!

Nor is it possible that these inconveniences should be effectually remedied, without establishing an institution for the purpose. The resources of individuals will always be inadequate. No one preacher can find a sufficient motive to collect such a library as will meet the demand—or if he could, in the capacity of a preacher he can never give that attention to the subject of instruction which the circumstances require. Of the certainty of this, few will entertain a doubt, who have spent a season in the study of some clergyman, preparatory to entering the ministry.

That individuals have made respectable attainments both in literary and theological science, is undoubtedly true, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which they labored. But it is also true, that these impediments have effectually discouraged others from making the attempt for self-improvement. And we hazard nothing in saying, that there is not among our preachers a truly scientific man, nor a profound biblical scholar, who did not commence the ministry with a good education, or devote more than ordinary time and means to the study of theology. They may be, and doubtless are, able men in all the ordinary duties of the ministry—eminently competent to meet an opposer in the common field of controversy; but when we want, as we certainly do want a critical and creditable commentary on the Bible, adapted to the situation of the denomination, by whom is the labor to be performed? Our best informed, self-taught men, diffident of their acquisitions, shrink from the undertaking.

3. And it may be fairly presumed, that we are now about as favorably situated to give facilities to students for the ministry, as we ever shall be, without changing the mode. And yet with the best means which we can command, every student must almost certainly feel, that they are greatly deficient. To remedy this defect, we seem to need an institution, where a larger and more suitable library can be consulted, where every study can be properly directed, and where all necessary instruction can be imparted. Such an institution is a theological seminary.

From the possible evils growing out of such an institution, we have much less to apprehend, than from the certain consequences produced by rejecting its uses. The latter we have long endured, and from it we are now suffering inconveniences, the full amount of which, we do not probably comprehend. It is the part of wisdom, both to guard against the evils pointed out by experience, and to improve and render accessible all that is useful to our species. Things good and valuable in themselves, are therefore not to be rejected, because they have been, or may be abused. And while we possess all the requisite means for the improvement of our condition, the errors into which others have fallen, so far from inducing us to decline the use of what has really benefited them, should stimulate us to higher exertions in order to realize these benefits without involving their inconveniences.

It is not the name or the form of an institution, in which we feel any particular interest—the facilities which it would open for the great and lasting improvement of our preachers in literary and theological knowledge, alone give it importance. And the scandal which such institutions have incurred, should no more deter us from using proper means for securing their actual and undoubted benefits, than the gluttony and foppery of any class of men should deter us from seeking and using food and raiment.

Such are our views respecting a theological seminary—they are offered to the consideration of that denomination in whose welfare we trust ever to feel a deep and lively interest, with the hope that they may induce a candid and dispassionate review of the subject. These views are the result of some years of painful experience; and may not be the less deserving of regard, because they are the triumph of honest conviction over previous prejudice. And we feel assured, that a small share of the attention which the writer has been compelled, from his situation, to give the subject, will allay every improper prejudice against an institution, having for its object—the improvement of the Universalist ministry.

MISPLACED KINDNESS.

BY REV. C. S. BROWN.

"Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you." Matt. vii. 6.

It appears that this lesson of our Lord is frequently lost sight of by many preachers of universal reconciliation. There are instances when man is over anxious for controversy; at such times he often loses sight of the above admonition, and offers the sacred promises of eternal truth for the consolation of his enemies, when they manifest a disposition to turn and rend him. I would, in the first place, condemn myself in this particular, before I offer advice to others. For often I have received contempt and abuse from those who would require the length and breadth of Universalism to give them the least hope of salvation, and it is a truth that cannot be successfully disputed, that these are the worst foes we have to contend with. For, in all my experience, I never came across an individual who was violently opposed to universal benevolence, but he was characterized by a narrowness of soul corresponding with the partiality of his creed. Such minds are deserving of pity, but require chastisement in mercy. I have therefore come to the conclusion, that if a man is determined to act the part of an unmerciful bigot, to leave him for a season to the natural consequences of his spirit, and not counteract the laws of nature, by preventing the gall from effecting its office, in producing a vomiting which may cleanse the stomach more effectually, of its moral impurities, and leave the patient in a more likely situation to recover.

NEW ANSWER TO AN OLD OBJECTION.

BY EVANGELIST J. LEWIS.

"If Universalism is true, what is the use of preaching?" This question, so often in the mouths of our religious opposers, has been frequently taken up and replied to, by showing the importance and good effects of preaching "the Gospel of our salvation;" as if the sense of the interrogatory were, "If Universalism is true, what is the use of preaching Universalism?" Now it strikes my mind that, in answering the question thus, the true nature and spirit of the objection designed to be wrapped up in it, has been lost sight of. The question, as coming from a Partialist, I should conceive would amount to this: "If Universalism is true, what is the use of preaching the common doctrine?" Understanding it thus, I answer, unhesitatingly, very little use, indeed. The alpha and omega of the common doctrine, alias Partialism, is the heart-withering dogma of an endless hell; and the main object of the generality of Partialist preaching, is, professing, the salvation of souls from the torments of this hell. Take away this object, and the generality of preachers, unless they were to become Universalists, and preach the "Gospel of the grace of God," for the moral and spiritual improvement of mankind, could have very little except pecuniary motives to induce them to continue their ministrations. And it certainly requires no very uncommon share of discernment to be able to discover that, (allowing the doctrine of ultimate universal holiness and happiness to be true,) so much of any man's preaching as is directed to the inculcation of the doctrine of an endless hell, or to the saving of souls from its torments, must be utterly useless, to say the least.

THE HEATHEN.

"Why, even the Heathen believe in endless misery," said a fanatical opposer of Universalism, in attempting to shew that Universalists are the greatest fools on earth. Doubtless they do: for by their actions they prove themselves consistent believers in that doctrine. But what then? Because the Heathen believe in an unmerciful God; and, in order to appease his wrath and satisfy his thirst for cruelty, cause their children to pass through the fire, or prostrate themselves before the car of Juggernaut, does it follow that more enlightened nations are bound to reject the testimony of the Bible—which declares that "God will not cast off forever;" but, "though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies," and receive in its stead the blind, superstitious notions of the Heathen world? OUR OPPOSERS ARE PLEASED

When they see professed Universalists attend Limitarian meetings because they are the most popular; for they know that such professors are a dead weight to the cause.

They are pleased when they hear a professed Universalist swear; for they know that such conduct goes to confirm them in their assertions, that Universalism is licentious in its tendency.

They are pleased to hear the haunters of grog-shops advocate Universalism; for they know that such advocates do the cause more injury than the whole phalanx of self-styled orthodox preachers.

They are pleased to see professed Universalists engaged in little petty quarrels and law-suits; that they may tauntingly exclaim, "see how these Christians love one another!"

Shall we gratify them?

EXPERIMENTAL PIETY.

BY REV. A. H. CURTIS.

"Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."—Jesus.

An apostle describes the kingdom of God in language that need not be mistaken. "The kingdom of God," says he, "is not meat and drink; but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." It is worthy of remark, that the apostle uses the present tense—"The kingdom of God is righteousness," etc. To seek the kingdom of God, therefore, does not mean to seek the reward of immortal felicity in the future world, by any thing that lies within the compass of our feeble powers; but to seek present salvation from sin, by a belief of the Gospel, and obedience to its precepts. Or, by a diligent and careful study of the divine testimony, seek to understand the principles and requirements of the Christian religion. Of the individual who experimentally believes the Gospel, it may be said, that the judgment seat of Christ is erected in his bosom. He becomes a member of his spiritual kingdom, by submitting to his sceptre; or receiving his doctrines and precepts, as the rule of his faith and practice. Christ thus becomes his governor, or spiritual ruler. Having thus promised, we are now prepared to make the application for which this text was chosen.

The principal object of this communication, is to invite the attention of my brethren and sisters of the Abrahamic faith, to the importance of attending diligently, and immediately to the admonition of Jesus—by seeking the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

That, as individuals, we are under an obligation to love God, and obey his commandments, will of course be admitted by all: but as members of a Christian community, and partizans in the cause of Gospel truth, we are under additional obligations to depart from iniquity; adorning our profession by well ordered lives, and good conversation; thus proving by our example, that the doctrines we profess and urge upon the attention of our neighbors and friends, are better calculated to make them virtuous and happy, than those of any other church. For we cannot expect to be made the instruments of God, in the advancement of his kingdom among others, unless his kingdom be first established in our own hearts. Nor can we be justly considered a Christian fraternity, unless we are Christians individually. Ought we not to see to it, therefore, that we first become imbued with those heavenly truths ourselves, which we are laboring to communicate to others?

Never, in the whole course of my experience, have I known a religious society to prosper for any great length of time, which was not leavened with the leaven of practical and experimental godliness. Flourish it may, for a brief period—for a brief moment, its members may manifest a laudable zeal and engagedness—but, alas, when the novelty of the preacher's eloquence and manner ceases, and his doctrines no longer interest them; the exercises of the sanctuary become irksome and disagreeable—apathy and inattention prevails—the preacher becomes discouraged, and cannot preach—the congregations grow smaller and smaller—till, perhaps, their meetings are abandoned! The preacher is dismissed—with a heavy heart he retires, under the consciousness of having spent his strength in vain!

I think, beloved brethren, that we shall be obliged to admit, however disagreeable, that as a denomination we seem to come short of the exhibition of that lively zeal, that animated devotion, that experimental and practical piety, that ought to characterize a Christian community; and which is so indispensable to the prosperity of any denomination. And why is this? Is it because our doctrines are uncongenial to the growth of true piety? No one, at all acquainted with the system, will admit this. For surely it contains every stimulant to the exercise of pure devotion that is found in any other system. It will not be presumed that the absence of the tenet of endless punishment in our creed, clips the wings of devotion. There can surely be nothing in the dreadful anticipation of the eternal misery of millions, subject to the vindictive wrath of God, calculated to foster that lively gratitude and filial love, which is the parent of devotion. Nay, our opponents have sometimes acknowledged, that could they fully believe in the restitution of all things, their souls would overflow with joy and praise.

From whence, then, arises the apparent coldness and want of spiritual devotion among us? Is it because there are no real Christians among our people? I am unwilling to admit this. For I rejoice to believe that we have many brethren and sisters in all our societies, who need only the manifestation of a little more zeal and animation, to place them upon an equality with any Christians of any order. And may God grant that this may not long be wanting, to give the finishing touches to their otherwise excellent characters as followers of Christ.

May not the apparent want of zeal and devotion among our people, arise rather from the force of habit than otherwise? Besides, man is a creature of extremes—in striving to avoid one extreme, he is prone to sink into its opposite. We have witnessed with pain, what we verily believed to be an excess of zeal, on the part of our brethren of some other denominations. We have seen the madness of popular excitement—leading to extravagances that ill becomes the simplicity of the Gospel, or the sacredness of the temple of worship. Resolving to avoid this extremity, we seem to have insensibly sunk into the opposite; an extreme equally destructive to the interests of spiritual piety, and still more so to the progress of our cause. Whatever may be said of the religious extravagances of others, it is evident that we are somewhat extravagant on the other side of the question. Our error consists in being too cold—too formal—too destitute of the spirit of Christianity, either for our good, or the good of the cause which we delight to honor. This is the clog that binds us to the ground. This is the great obstacle to our advancement. We bless the name of God, however, that the evil is not apparent in all our societies, and we hope not in a majority of them. Yet, as a denomination, we shall be compelled to admit, that this is the most formidable obstacle to our advancement. Though we prove the truth of our system by the most convincing arguments, and the most positive scriptural evidence—though we answer all the objections of the opponent, and refute all his arguments—no prudent person will receive it, without the evidence of example, that it is capable of amending the heart, and reforming the conduct of its believers. Nay, though we were to exhibit all the talent of a Newton, a Campbell, or an Addison—and employ all the eloquence of a Demosthenes or Cicero; multiplying argument on argument, and testimony on testimony, to prove the moral tendency of our doctrine; no prudent person will receive it, unless our arguments are illustrated by the good fruits of its professors.

The doctrine is so congenial to the benevolent heart—so consistent with the desires and prayers of all true Christians—so full of rich and exhilarating comfort to the believer, that nothing is wanting but practical godliness on the part of its professors, to place it in the advance of any other system in Christendom. Moreover, it is so congenial to the spirit of our government, and to the feelings of our people as republicans, and friends of civil and religious liberty, that it would infallibly out-run, and ultimately swallow up, every other denomination in our country; provided its adherents would pay more particular attention to the practical part of their profession; proving by their own example, that the doctrine is favorable to the growth of genuine Gospel religion.

We must be able to come to our brethren of other denominations, in the language of Moses to his brother-in-law; "Come with us, and we will do thee good." They must be convinced of its power to do them good, by its having done good to ourselves, or all the ministers in Christendom cannot convince them of its truth.

Brethren, may not the destructive coldness, that prevails in many of our societies, be somewhat chargeable upon our ministry? For my own part, I am sensible of having erred in this particular. The tenor of our preaching has been almost exclusively doctrinal. This seemed to have been required, by the circumstance of our doctrine not being generally understood, and the interest of our cause requiring that the public should be enlightened on the subject. But may we not have erred in this? Have not our labors too frequently produced a doctrinal religion among our people, rather than experimental and practical? A religion that "plays round the head, but comes not near the heart."

Has not this mode of public instruction too often produced a spirit of sectarian prejudice on the part of our own people, while it has served to strengthen the opposition of the opposer, rather than bring him into our views? My imperfect experience in the ministry of reconciliation has brought me to the conclusion, that the most successful mode of propagating our system, is to overcome the prejudices of the public mind, by practical and experimental preaching; and practical godliness on the part of our people. I would therefore beg leave to suggest to my brethren in the ministry, the propriety of confining our labors more generally to the propagation of spiritual and practical, rather than theoretical Christianity—striving to awaken the thoughtless and secure to a sense of their condition, by reason of sin; and the great importance of "repentance towards God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ." To our brethren of like precious faith, setting forth the indispensable importance of not being mere nominal Christians—but Christians in deed and in truth; and the absurdity of resting in a mere profession of religion, without the spirit and power of religion in the soul. Striving to awaken them to the importance of having the kingdom of God built up in their own hearts, as the starting point in their exertions towards building it up in others.

We that are Universalists, are fully persuaded that our system contains much stronger dissuaves from vice, and incentives to virtue, than are found in any other system extant; yet the public must be fully apprised of that fact, before they can be expected to receive it. And how is this to be accomplished? Not by the preacher, exclusively—he can do but little towards convincing the public of the moral influence of his doctrine, unless his efforts are seconded by his people.

The wise and prudent will ever esteem that the best religion, which exerts the best moral influence over its adherents; and this is the religion which the prudent man will choose. Hence, it is by no means difficult to decide as to the necessary requisites, to the advancement of our cause.

How frequently has the faithful preacher been censured by his people, and perhaps dismissed as unworthy of confidence, on account of not having been able to multiply converts to the society for whom he labors? But before the minister is rejected for this cause, would it not be well for his people to inquire, whether they have been careful to prove by their good fruits, that the doctrine he promulgates is worthy of the public confidence? Have they ever been careful to prove by their own example, that he told the truth, when laboring to prove by argument that his doctrine was calculated to purify and reform its adherents.

Without this necessary evidence, the most accomplished and zealous preacher in Christendom must labor in vain.

Yet I presume we have all seen the heart-broken preacher dismissed from his charge—turned upon the world in disgrace—perhaps without the means of support—smarting under a sense of the unjust reproaches of the people, whom he has labored by every power within him, to instruct, edify, and build up. Censured, for not effecting what their own carelessness and neglect rendered impossible. "My brethren, these things ought not so to be."

I would to heaven that the members of our societies, and the liberal and rational friends of Christianity throughout our country might be awakened to a sense of the responsibility of their situation as partizans in the cause of the Redeemer, and the indispensable importance of seeking the "righteousness of God," and having his kingdom built up in their hearts, that they may thus become fit instruments of its advancement among others.

I would to heaven that a zeal for God—a zeal of good works—a heart-felt devotion to the cause of Gospel truth, might inspire our every heart, and accompany our zeal for the prosperity of our order:—Then, indeed, will our success be sure. And while contributing to the success of our own cause, we shall have the heartfelt satisfaction of knowing, that we contribute to the common cause of pure religion in the world.

LETTER IX.

To Rev. Josiah Keyes, Presiding Elder, Cazenovia.

"Have I committed an offence in abusing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the Gospel of God freely?" 2 Cor. xi: 7.

DEAR SIR—I now take into consideration your main pillar of devotion—the idol of all your hopes—the moving impulse of your practical (or outward) religion—the great object of your worship—the great heart and soul, alpha and omega of your Christianity—the delightful theme of your fire-side conferences—"eternal death."

Yet whilst this is so precious, sacred, adorable, and all-in-all to you, I desire you to be sensible that it is the most productive of all causes, of wretchedness, insanity, and despair. Will you deny that it is so darling a thing to you—so moving a cause of your devotions and worship—the main pillar of your religion? Then, Sir, why do you and your church denounce as heretics, infidels, hypocrites, and refuse to fellowship and befriend those of your fellow-beings who sincerely disbelieve in your "eternal death," yet are firm, unwavering believers in the Scriptures and all that they teach?

Your beloved brother, Luther Lee, says, speaking of your precious penalty, "endless death," if this be given up "we must give up our holy religion." What a system of religion that must be, which is built upon endless death! What a foundation! It is sufficient for the present, to say, such a system is not built upon "the rock," Jesus Christ.

In your chain of absurdities, which you hurry together for the Banner, you next say—"The death to which the law condemned Adam, was also eternal death." You say—"the death"—was there but one to which the law condemned Adam? Or do you mean to say "one of the deaths"? Have you abandoned the first two, that is, temporal and spiritual? Or do you intend to say, when he died temporally, he died eternally, and when he died spiritually, he died eternally? For you say, "the death was also eternal death." You seem at some times to speak of three distinct deaths, and then again to mould them into one. If it be true, as Elder Keyes says, that "the death to which the law condemned Adam was also eternal death," let us see how easily and effectually the Elder uses up that truth. Just before, the Elder says—"yet the life that is to be restored at the resurrection, is the same life that Adam, by transgression, forfeited for himself and all his posterity."

You intend by eternal, as you use it, endless. How can life be swallowed up in an endless death, if that same life be restored at some future time?

Will you say, some are saved from it by faith? Then I ask, were they ever involved in it? Will you say your eternal death is in the future world, subsequent to the resurrection? Then how is it, that by the resurrection the same life will be restored which was forfeited?

But you well know that the word "eternal" is a word expressive of duration, and nothing else, as you use it; and your merely applying a word denoting a duration to death, does not avail any thing, unless you show what is to be thus dead, and what kind of death it is. You have spoken of temporal and spiritual death, and now you say "the death is eternal." You can not mean the "temporal" death is eternal; for, you say above, "it is the life of the body that is to be restored at the resurrection; that is, temporal life." You cannot mean that your "spiritual death" is eternal, (endless,) for you define spiritual death to be "a state of guilt and condemnation," and you make all Adam's posterity to partake of that spiritual death. Now, Sir, if any be "restored," or saved from spiritual death, then, in spite of your white hat, you must confess that death was not eternal (endless).

Then what was "the death," which you will have to be endless? Will you say, "the death consequent upon the transgression?" That you have said before. But disclose, if you can, what is to be endlessly dead, or what is to be in endless death. The song of "eternal death" is on the tongues of all your clergy, but whilst they thus declare a long death, we are not told by authority what they mean; and I am very happy to learn that, from your writings and definitions, they cannot mean temporal or spiritual death.

Without stating what was or is to be eternally dead, you go on to show "the death" to be eternal, and say, as of inference—"This we may infer from the nature of death itself. All death, in its own nature, is eternal. If a human body becomes dead, all that is necessary to make that death perpetual, is to leave it to the uniform operation of the laws of nature; if left in this condition, the different chemical agents by which it is surrounded, will soon produce decomposition, and it will be resolved into its original elements."

So the man that is morally dead, if left under the natural operation of the divine law, will continue so eternally." Admirable logic, this. "If and if, etc." Let me use some "ifs." If the Deity suspends his power, and the devil be omnipotent, Arminianism may prove true. If God change from love to wrath, some souls may be endlessly miserable. So if God should cease to be "kind to the unthankful and the evil," and endlessly damn a whole sect of people, it would as likely be the Arminians as any other class. There, I have reasoned with "ifs." How do you like it, Elder?

To prove your "eternal death," you proceed—"Scripture testimony is also very clear on this point. [That is as clear as your reasoning with 'ifs' is.] St. Paul tells us—"The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi: 23. We are told in this place, that "the gift of God is eternal life;" but the death mentioned in the text, is contrasted with eternal life, and they are co-extensive: the conclusion follows then, that this must be an eternal death."

This is some of your "very clear" Scripture testimony. I will not deny but what it may appear clear and plain to you. I think it is some with you as it was with a certain old gentleman and a needle; he was asked (in order to test his powers of vision) to thread a small needle—he made several efforts, and not succeeding, said, "strange I cannot thread it, when I see the eye of the needle as plain as day"—when in fact the eye was broken off, and he was working at the point!

It appears very plain to you, that because eternal life is spoken of in contrast with death, death must be co-extensive with it. Is it not something new in ethics and morals, that contrasting two truths, one with the other, makes them to be co-extensive?

The apostle is speaking of the loss or consequences occasioned by sin—the wicked acts of man; and then tells us what God gives to man. How it is that you can twist your thinkables so as to say the death (the consequence or wages of sin) is eternal, because the gift is, I cannot conceive. Let me apply your new logic. The wages of Peter's wickedness was the loss of ten dollars, but the gift to him of his father was a thousand pounds unto a good livelihood. Here, the gift spoken of, is a thousand pounds unto a good livelihood; but the wages or loss of Peter is contrasted with the gift, "and they are co-extensive:" the conclusion follows then, that Peter's loss or wages (ten dollars,) must be a thousand pounds unto a good livelihood!

People who will make use of such absurd positions as you do, to prove your eternal death, may say with all consistency with their doctrines and purposes, that "man ought not to reason on the subject of the Scriptures and religion."

It would be supposed by an impartial and unprejudiced mind, from hearing endless death preached up in the world as much as it is, that on every page of the Bible, the black mark and image would be seen and read. But so far from this is the truth, that after all is said and done by the believers and preachers in the doctrine, in all their attempts "to show" it, not one "Thus saith the Lord" can be produced to prove it, nor can the words "eternal death," nor "endless death," nor any thing of an express import, be found in the Bible. What a lamentable thing it is, Elder, for the Pharisees, that the Bible is thus devoid of all evidence of their partial and wicked doctrine. AMICUS.

REASONS.....NO. X.

FOR BELIEVING IN UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

"Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter iii: 15.

Having argued the final holiness and happiness of all mankind from the revealed and universally allowed character and attributes of God, and clearly shown, as we conceive, that no other conclusion can legitimately result from the premises allowed; we next proceed to another branch of the subject, and as a Second general head, shall consider the advent, character, doctrine and labors of Christ in their bearing on the subject.

1. The advent of Christ and the character which the foregoing predictions and prophecies ascribed to him.

What character did the ancient prophets and inspired writers ascribe to Christ before and at the time of his advent? In what capacity or character did they predict, and set forth his appearance? Did they ever ascribe to him a partial character, or that of a partial Saviour? Did they ever represent him as a weak, a capricious or a revengeful being. Did they ever represent him as undertaking less than the salvation of the world? or as engaging in a work for the accomplishment of which he was incompetent? or in the pursuit of which he should encounter obstacles insurmountable, or difficulties that should discourage him? No, neither. He is uniformly represented as an all-sufficient, entirely competent, completely successful, and gloriously triumphant Redeemer and Saviour. He is called the Seed of the woman who should bruise the serpent's head. Gen. iii: 15. The Shiloh to whom the gathering of the people should be. Gen. xl: 10. The righteous Branch, and Tree of life, whose healing leaves should cure the nations of their moral diseases—a Fountain to wash in from sin and uncleanness—a Feast of fat things for all nations—a Refuge for the weary—the shadow of a great Rock in a weary land—the Bread of God that cometh down from heaven to give life to the world—a Refiner to purify—the Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings—the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world—a Shepherd to guard and protect his flock—a Physician to heal the sick—the Deliverer to emancipate from sin and turn away ungodliness from men—the Captain of salvation—the salvation of God to the ends of the earth—the Heir of all things—a King and Governor, whose dominion should be from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth—the Prince of Peace, of the increase and peace of whose government there shall be no end—the Saviour of the world—the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world. And it was predicted of him that he should never fail nor be discouraged; but the pleasure of the Lord should prosper in his hand, and he should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied.

From all these and numerous other similar descriptions of his advent, character, and the object of his mission, what else can be inferred but that he came for the purpose of effecting the salvation of all men, and was purposely represented as a universal Saviour, both in the Old and New Testaments? Can all these representations possibly accord with the idea of his being only a partial Saviour, or Deliverer of mankind? Surely not.

2. The character of Christ as exhibited in his life, labors and teachings, while on earth.

In what character did Jesus appear—in that of a destroyer, or saviour? that of a friend, or foe of mankind? in that of an impartial and kind benefactor of all, or that of a capricious and petulant avenger of pretended or real wrongs? When persecuted, did he retaliate? When reviled, did he revile again? When reproached and scoffed at, did he curse his foes? Nay: his whole life was one continued exhibition of love, benevolence and compassion. It is emphatically and truly said of him, "He went about doing good." To the poor and the needy he was condescending and humane. He gave health to the sick, feet to the lame, eyes to the blind, ears to the deaf, speech to the dumb, sanity to the lunatic, bread to the hungry, forgiveness to the sinful, salvation to the lost and life to the dead. Ever merciful and mild, he compassionated the suffering of every condition, wept at the grave of Lazarus and over the approaching woes of Jerusalem, where resided his bitterest foes; and for his bloody and cruel murderers, prayed on the cross, and in the agonies of death at their unfeeling hands, besought his Father for their forgiveness! As his life was one of ever-enduring benevolence and compassion, so was it one of spotless purity and holiness, alike removed from the ascetic austerity of the monk, and the heartless levity of the unthinking gay; from the moroseness of the bigot, and the phrenzy of the fanatic; from the hypocritical and pretended sanctity of the ancient Pharisee, and the affectation of the extraordinary unworthiness of the modern. He was ever submissive to his Father's will, and heartily acquiesced in every dispensation of his providence. His language was, "not my will, but thine be done." "The cup which my Father giveth me, shall I not drink it?" The same resignation which he practiced, he inculcated upon the minds of his followers, teaching them that God was good and worthy of all confidence and trust. Sometimes he reproved his disciples for their want of faith or confidence in God, but never for putting too much in him. "O ye of little faith, wherefore do ye doubt?" He teaches them the very hairs of their heads are all numbered—that even a sparrow falls not to the ground without their Father's notice, and that God even clothes the grass of the field and the lillies of the vale, and will by no means neglect the interest and happiness of his nobler creature man. He also taught them to practice the same benevolence and kindness to their fellow-men, that they experienced at the hand of God, and to become themselves imitators of God as dear children. "I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust—Be ye therefore perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect." Looking at the life, the labors, the spirit, the temper, the example, the doctrine, the precepts, and the moral instructions of Jesus Christ, we seriously ask, is there aught to be found in any portion thereof incompatible with the benevolent doctrine of universal salvation? Nay, are not the whole in perfect accordance therewith? and can they possibly be reconciled with any other or opposing system? Had he inculcated the idea of the implacability and hatred of God towards his enemies—that he caused his sun to shine and his rain to fall only on the just and the good, and withheld them from the wicked and the unjust; had he taught them to hate and curse their enemies, that they might be like God; in short, had he set them the example by cursing his enemies and dooming them to endless woe, instead of praying for them on the cross; then indeed we might well doubt his impartiality, and question whether he either believed or taught the doctrine of universal salvation. But now it seems next to impossible to question or doubt one moment, when we look at the life and teachings of the Prince of Peace.

Moreover, if he is to be looked upon as the image and representative of God, and his spirit and his temper to his enemies as the spirit and temper of God, (as he certainly does so teach,) how can we come to any other conclusion than that God is good to all, not excepting his enemies, and designs the salvation of the whole world? Did Jesus pray in faith, and did a double portion of the spirit of his Father rest upon him when he prayed for his betrayers and murderers on the cross? If so, will they not be saved? And if their sins are to be blotted out and they are to obtain salvation, (as Peter taught, Acts iii: 14-26,) who is there in the world that will not? In short, "if God be for us, who can be against us?"

3. The consummation of Christ's mission.

From what has been already said on the subject of Christ's advent, the object of his mission can hardly be mistaken. If this were possible, the inspired apostle would set us right at once, by saying, "we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." (1 John iv: 14.) And even the Samaritans could inform us by saying, (John iv: 42.) "We have heard him ourselves and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world." Christ is nowhere called the Saviour of a part of the world; nor a part of a Saviour of the world, but emphatically and repeatedly, the Saviour of the world. Now if he be the Saviour of the world, will not the world be saved? That the object of his mission was the salvation of the world, few if any will now deny. The question then occurs, Will that object be accomplished, or will Christ fail or be defeated? Now we maintain, and think the Bible abundantly warrants the conclusion, that he will not fail nor be defeated. (See Isa. xlii: 4, and liv: 11.) But that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, all his gracious designs will be consummated, his labors of love accomplished, his object completely attained, his doctrine and predictions fulfilled, the whole world redeemed from sin, purified in the blood of the Lamb, rendered holy, and happy, and glorious, and blessed forevermore, and the reconciled kingdom delivered up to God the Father, that God may be all in all. Not one word of all he predicted shall fail; not one for whom he died shall perish everlastingly; but all shall, when reclaimed, shout "salvation to God and the Lamb forever."

4. His resurrection from the dead is the confirmation and pledge of all he taught. He claimed to be the Messiah, sent of God, whose advent the prophets had long before predicted. He foretold the manner of his death, the length of time he should remain in the earth, and that he should rise again from the dead on the third day. Now had he not arisen, although his predictions concerning the manner of his death would have been verified, yet as they had proved false in regard to his resurrection, no confidence either in his doctrine or the resurrection of mankind and the salvation of the world by him, could have been reasonably entertained. But as his predictions relative to himself were all verified by his resurrection from the dead and his showing himself to hundreds and hundreds of witnesses, so that the fact should be confirmed beyond a doubt, so we have no ground to question the certain accomplishment of all his predictions concerning the resurrection and salvation of all men.

In his resurrection we behold the pledge and assurance of ours, and hear the blessed Redeemer saying, "because I live, ye shall live also." He is the head of every man, the first begotten of the dead, the first born of every creature, that in all things he might have the preeminence. Now as the Head has risen, so also shall the body, which is his church, and the fulness of him that filleth all in all, arise incorruptible and immortal. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality, and death must be swallowed up in the victory of life everlasting. D. S.

DEATHS.

By a circuitous route, but still so authentic as to leave no doubt on our minds respecting its truth, we have received the truly melancholy intelligence of the death of our most amiable and excellent brother, Rev. JOSEPH POTTER, of Cooperstown. The particulars nor date we have not been able to learn, but hope to receive them in time for our next. Hence, we will only add, in the language of our first informant, "few men lived more beloved, or died more sincerely lamented."

While buried in grief for the above loss of our own denomination, we still sympathize with our Methodist brethren in the death of Rev. J. KEYS, Presiding Elder, who died at Cazenovia, on the 22d inst. The letter of AMICUS, in reply to the errors advanced by Elder K. in the (Methodist) Western Banner, published in this day's paper, was in type and partly printed off in our first form, before we received this melancholy intelligence, or it would have been suppressed. Our removal also, added to the difficulty, as hands are scarce, and we have already lost more time this week than we can remedy.

A. B. G.

ELDER KNAPP.

We have received a copy of a sermon delivered by this vagrant revivalist, in Waterville, a short time since. It was taken down precisely as delivered by a stenographer, and written out at length for our columns. While we are thankful for the kindness and even proud of the labor bestowed to serve us, we must respectfully decline its publication, as wholly unfit for any decent periodical, and as coming from a source too filthy and destitute of veracity, and as containing language and anecdotes too silly and disgusting, as well as false, to merit any public notice whatever. Besides all this, it is destitute of a single argument but what is based on utter misrepresentations of Universalism. One anecdote will satisfy every man who knows any thing of the parties, of the truth of what I state. It is a fair sample of the whole sermon, as any one may see by calling at this office. Elder Knapp says that Skinner (such is his courteous language) went to Leyden to preach. When he came to the schoolhouse he found it filled with all the drunkards, and all the Sabbath breakers in Leyden. The officinings of the world were there. There was not a single respectable man there. Skinner was mad because they came to hear him, and told them they were not Universalists—they were infidels—they should all go home immediately, and repent, or they would all go to hell and be damned.

No person who knows Mr. Skinner, or the Universalists of Leyden, or Elder Knapp, need be told this story is a positive and unqualified falsehood. As for those who know not either, we will merely add that Mr. Skinner is remarkably mild and bland in his manner—the language is not that of a Universalist—the Universalist society of Leyden embraces the most respectable portion of the people there, and has in it none worse than are attached to the Baptist or other denominations—and as for Elder Knapp, it is enough to say he knew all this, and yet retailed this low, vulgar, lying, slanderous anecdote. And such is the character—such the acts—such the preaching of a Baptist preacher in New-York State in 1836!!! Oh, the times, and oh, the manners. A. B. G.

Br. O. ROBERTS, of Verona, Oneida county, wishes all letters, papers, etc., intended for him, to be directed to Lakeville, Livingston county, whither he has removed.

Br. WILLIAM QUEAL intends visiting Michigan and Illinois this Spring, and returning through the interior of Ohio. He is an authorized agent for this paper, and is in good standing in the order as an able minister of the New Testament. He expects to preach in Chicago, Ill. on the first and second Sundays in June next. A. B. G.

WHISPERING IN CHURCH.

This is an evil felt more by the congregation generally, than it is by the preacher; though to all it is sufficiently annoying. To be obliged to hear a hissing like the safety valve of a steam engine, or the noise of an angry goose, with once in a while a word intermixed, when you are anxious to hear what the preacher is uttering, is surely a great evil under the sun. Then the turning of heads to see where the noise comes from, the rustling of dresses, and the suppressed giggles of the whisperers, altogether forms a scene disgraceful in a decorous assembly, and shameful indeed in a worshipping one. Is there no way of checking this evil? Cannot the parents or other guardians of such silly and shameless disturbers of congregations take some means to stop it? It is a painful task for strangers to rebuke such persons, and still more so for the public speaker to do it—yet if it cannot be stopped in any other manner, perhaps strangers had better rise up and publicly and loudly request such disturbers to be silent until the sermon is finished. Any method is better than a longer continuance of the evil. Let the guilty take heed to themselves. Whoso hath ears to hear let him hear.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A few weeks ago I read a call from Br. Price, of the Union, for communications—our pile was then a large one, and I had just laid by several articles for Editor's Lent, and was thinking in what order I should prepare the others. I wished I could conveniently and properly hand over to Br. P. some of what he wanted, and of which we had plenty. Since then, "more copy" has diminished our pile materially, and Br. Price's appears to be replenished finely, as I see by a late Union. We must beg or borrow, and he, I dare say, could lend for a week or two. Thus we ebb and flow. Two or three brethren who have promised us some articles, but who have not yet furnished us with even one, are informed that a fulfilment of their promises will be very acceptable indeed, whenever convenient to them. Those from whom we have received nothing for several weeks, are requested to let us hear again from them—and even those who have but lately sent us wherewithal to satisfy the never ceasing cry of "more copy," are informed that their favors are not the less welcome because continually flowing in upon us. The season is at hand when many discontinue writing much, and we wish to lay in a store to last us through it.

A. B. G.

J. H. W., who inquires (for the satisfaction of one of our Presbyterian brethren) how our correspondent "D." came to be present at the Presbyterian church meeting, is informed that when "D.'s" statement is denied by any respectable person who was present, his query shall be attended to. We are not in the habit of giving up the names of correspondents. We know who "D." is, and believe his statements, or we should not have published them—at least not without comment.

Marriage and obituary notices must be accompanied with a responsible name as voucher, or they will not be attended to. Our anonymous correspondent at Factoryville will understand us—postage paid is not sufficient.

BACK NUMBERS.

We shall, at least during the first half of the volume, continue to send the back numbers to all new subscribers, unless otherwise directed—presuming that nearly all of them will choose to have the volume complete.—We prefer having our agents specify the time of commencement; but as but few of them do, we shall confine ourselves to the above rule.

AGENTS.—William Barrett, P. M., Jackson, (O.).—Augustus D. Butterfield, Ottawa, (Ind.).—William Eggleston, West Groton—Amaziah Ashman, Springfield—R. P. Hughes, Bellville, (Ill.).—Orange A. Lewis, Spring Mills, (Pa.).—Levi Davis, P. M., Greenwood—Uriah Coulson, Unadilla, (M. T.). and J. E. Dey, Athens, (M. T.), will please act as agents for this paper.

Br. E. H. Webster, Haminton, Pa., will please act as our agent on the condition he proposes.

SERMONS.

In reply to several subscribers who have requested us to publish more sermons, I would say that we shall furnish from fifteen to twenty sermons in the course of the volume. We will not engage to publish them at regular and stated intervals, for to do so will be at times very inconvenient to those who write, and us who print them. But we will furnish that number, selecting such times as will be most convenient for us to publish them. There are seasons when our correspondents generally, are too busy to furnish us with many communications—hence, we shall "make hay while the sun shines," and publish the sermons "when there's nothing else to do."

A. B. G.

The three first numbers of a new volume of the Star in the East and New-Hampshire Universalist has come to hand, filled with its usual excellent variety of matter. It is one of the neatest periodicals in our order, and one of the few whose weekly arrival is hailed by us with peculiar pleasure. It is our fervent desire that it may long continue to shed its bright benignant rays over the land, and that hundreds may flock to share in the brightness of its rising, each with the advance payment in hand.

REMOVED.

Will persons who have occasion to seek us for the purpose of transacting business, please remember, that we have removed from our old stand, to the second and third stories of KNICKERBOCKER HALL, south side of Catharine-street, a few doors east of Genesee-street?

* * This removal will account for any little delay that may be noticed by our patrons in their reception of this and next weeks' papers, or attention to some small orders. Having a more commodious office for the transaction of business, than formerly, we shall soon "make all good again."

G. and H.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

SCHOOLS.—The Summer Term of the Institute will commence under the former able teachers, on the fourth Wednesday (25th) of May next.

A competent assistant has been added to the Ladies' School.

AGENCY.—Br. S. R. Smith, General Agent of the institute, will be in Wayne, Ontario, and other western counties in the latter end of May, (see religious notices), and will be happy to receive donations and subscriptions, from one dollar and upwards, to any amount which the generosity and public spirit of the well-wishers of unsectarian education may induce them to bestow.

STANDING NOTICE.

The Executive Committee of the Clinton Liberal Institute respectfully solicit donations of one dollar, or upwards, from all the friends of unsectarian education, for the use of said Institution.

* * Remittances can be made to this office, by any of our agents, in the same letters containing money for us, and will be paid over immediately to Br. Skinner, and acknowledged in the paper.

EDITORS.

LIBERAL OFFERS.

Having purchased a number of files of volumes three, four and five, from Br. Skinner; and being desirous at once to increase the subscription list to the present volume, and to get these volumes into circulation, that both may do more good than they now do lying dead in our office, we hereby make the following

PROPOSALS.

1. Any person sending us five dollars free of expense to us, shall be entitled to three copies of the present volume, and one copy of either volume three, four or five.
2. Any persons sending us six dollars, in the same manner, shall be entitled to four copies of the present volume, and one copy of either of the volumes above named.
3. Any person sending us ten dollars, in manner above named, shall be entitled to seven copies of the present volume, and two copies of any one volume, or two volumes of volumes three, four or five.
4. Any person sending us fifteen dollars, in manner aforesaid, shall be entitled to eleven copies of the present volume, and two copies, or two volumes, as above stated.

5. And any person sending us twenty dollars, as above prescribed, shall be entitled to fifteen copies of the present volume, and a copy of each of the volumes three, four and five.

Applicants will state to whom the several papers of the present volume are to be directed—what volumes are claimed of three, four and five—and how they shall be sent. They are unbound, of course, but perfect.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in May, by Br. BODEN at Richmondville—Br. C. B. BROWN at the shingled schoolhouse, Palermo, and at Jennings Corners at 5, P. M.—Br. WHITNEY at Howlet Hill—Br. S. R. SMITH at Madison, (he could not reach his last appointment at that place)—Br. STAS at Depauville—Br. D. BIDDLECOM at New-London, at 1, P. M., and at Shaver's schoolhouse, at 4, P. M.—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. NEWELL at Cooperstown.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in May, by Br. BODEN at Colliersville—Br. S. R. SMITH at Lyons, Wayne county—Br. STAS at Lowville, and at the brick schoolhouse, East Martinsburg, in the evening—Br. GROSH at Salisbury as the friends may appoint.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday in May, by Br. S. R. SMITH at Victor, Ontario county—Br. C. B. BROWN at South Pompey, Onondaga county, as the friends may appoint—Br. STAS at the shingled schoolhouse, Palermo, and at Jennings's Corners at 5, P. M.—Br. BODEN at Nelson Flats.

Br. STAS will preach at Lowville, Friday evening, May 13th, as Br. Jacob Windecker may appoint.

Br. C. B. BROWN will preach at the following places in the evening, or at 4, P. M., as the friends may appoint—Tuesday, May 17th, red schoolhouse, Hastings—Wednesday, 18th, Brewerton—Thursday, 19th, Salina.

HOPE.

BY HENRY SHUTTS.

Could but the fond, devoted heart,
Believe that the insatiate tomb
Would be the goal at which must part,
Communing spirits, to resume
No more the bond which mutual love,
With all its heaven-born sanctitude,
Here cherished toward the objects of
Its changeless, deep solicitude:
That were to clog the buoyant wings of hope,
And leave us darkly bore with wild despair to cope.

But when to anxious sense is given
Assurance that affection's tie
Shall reunited be in heaven,
In one eternal constancy;
That when beyond death's valley, still,
Those tendrils of the heart which clung,
Around life's earthly altar, will Immortal bloom with us, among Those whose existence formed, with ours, one whole:
That—that is hope, indeed, the anchor of the soul.

THE CHRISTIAN HOPE.

"In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began."—St. Paul.

O yes, 'tis so, 'tis even so,
The finest forms decay,
And cords that bind our spirits here
Must break themselves away—
Then hail the hope—the blissful hope,
Which God to us hath given,
The glorious and immortal hope,
That anchors fast in heaven.

'Tis true, indeed, 'tis very true,
These mortal bodies must,
With all their pride and vanity,
Commingle with the dust—
Then hail the hope—the blissful hope,
Which God to us hath given,
The glorious and immortal hope—
That spirits meet in heaven.

This cannot be our 'biding place—
(A world of sin like this!)
Our hopes, and faith, and spirits press
For pure unchanging bliss—
Then hail the hope—the blissful hope,
Which God to us hath given,
The glorious and immortal hope—
"WE ALL SHALL MEET IN HEAVEN."

WHO IS GOING TO PREACH?

MR. ERROR—I find this phrase is getting into such frequent use in the present generation, that I have determined that it shall be the caption of my article for this week. Every body knows how it is used.

"Are you going to church to-day?" said I, the other Sunday, to a friend who is sometimes at meeting.

"Who is going to preach?"

"Rev. Mr. Pointblank"—was my answer.

"Mr. Pointblank? pray who is he? I have not heard of him before; if you can assure me I shall be interested, I will go."

"He will preach some truth of the Gospel I doubt not; if the truth will interest you, I think you may venture."

My friend however did not choose to go with me, for just as our conversation had proceeded as far as above noted, one Mr. Love-parade came along, and invited him to accompany him, at the same time declaring that the Rev. Mr. Show-off was to preach, and he was accounted one of the most popular men in all these parts. They both walked away together, and left me—to tell you Mr. Editor, how it was in my younger days.

MY YOUNG DAYS! the very thought of them seems to give steadiness to my trembling hand as I write: I would that I could find again their sweet simplicity. In those times there was not a handsome church erected at the distance of every mile; but notwithstanding the inconveniences resulting from distance over bad roads, and often an uncomfortable place of assembling, it was our question, "Where is the meeting to be next Sabbath?" On being informed, our little neighborhood on the holy morning would set out, the children (except the youngest) on foot, and our parents upon the back of the family horse (for there were pillions in those days,) and many was the time, that we were all seated in the house of God, in waiting for his ministering servant, whose appearance in the broad aisle gave the first intimation who he should be, and whose words were listened to as a message from God, to be revered on that account; and not because this or that man was more showy, and given to adorning.

I ventured to ask once, as we were all seated in the pew, "who we should have to preach to-day?" [This was said in a soft whisper to my mother, in the midst of the sound of cautious footsteps, as the congregation were entering; we had no bell to be tolled.] I never shall forget the impression I received, as she mildly looked in my face and said, "The minister, my son; you must remember what he says." And all was still. In my young days it was looked upon as a privilege as well as duty to present ourselves before the "Lord in his holy place," and we were not accustomed to suffer our attendance to be interrupted by the fact, that this or that messenger was to "speak in the name of Christ." And after a lapse of many a Winter, I have yet to be convinced that this was not a suitable state of feeling. It does appear to me, that it becomes us to be in such a state of heart, that we shall be "glad when they say unto us, let us go up into the house of the Lord." If such be the state of our hearts, our chief desire will be "Lord shew us the light of thy countenance." "Speak to us of thy law." Our religion would not then come and go with time and circumstance, but would shine with a steady light, and our love would burn with an uninterrupted zeal. We should then live upon God; our faces would be turned to him, as to the "hills from whence our help cometh." It was so in the early days of New-England.

Reader! on each returning Sabbath, go where the Gospel is preached: go hoping to meet your God in his earthly courts; and, when you hear the question asked by others, or find it arising in your own bosom, "Who is going to preach?"—remember my mother's admonition to me, and think of the early days of an OLD SETTLER.

THRILLING ADVENTURE.

I have heard a story somewhere of a merchant who collected a party together to give eclat to one of those little family festivals which brighten the dark trace of life and cheer the human heart in every clime. It was his daughter's wedding day; crowds of her young acquaintance circled round her, and as the father gazed proudly on the face of the young bride, he wished as bright a prospect might open for his other children, who were gambolling merrily among the crowd. Passing through the passage connecting the lower rooms, he met the servant maid, an ignorant country wench, who was carrying a lighted tallow candle in her hand without a candlestick. He blamed her for this dirty conduct, and went into the kitchen to make some arrangements with his wife about the supper-table: the girl shortly returned with her arms full of ale bottles, but without the candle. The merchant immediately recollected that several barrels of gunpowder had been placed in his cellar during the day, and that his foreman had opened one of the barrels to select a sample for a customer. "Where is your candle?" he inquired, in the utmost agitation. "I couldn't bring it up with me, for my hands were full," said the girl. "Where did you leave it?" "Well, I'd no candlestick, so I stuck it into some black sand that's there in one of the tubs." The merchant dashed down the cellar steps; the passage was long and dark, and as he groped his way his knees threatened to give way under him, his breath was choked, and his flesh seemed suddenly to become dry and parched, as if he already felt the suffocating blast of death. At the extremity of the passage, in the front cellar, under the very room where the children and their friends were revelling in felicity, he discerned the open powder barrel, full almost to the top—the candle stuck lightly in the loose grains, with a long and red snuff of burnt-out wick topping the small and gloomy flame. This sight seemed to wither all his powers, and the merry laugh of the youngsters above struck upon his heart like the knell of death. He stood for some moments, gazing upon the light, unable to advance. The fiddler commenced a lively jig, and the feet of the dancers responded with increased vivacity; the floor shook with their exertions, and the loose bottles in the cellar jingled with the motion. He fancied the candle moved—was falling!—with desperate energy he dashed forward; but how was he to remove it? The slightest touch would cause the small live coal of wick to fall into the loose powder. With unequalled presence of mind he placed a hand each side of the candle, with the open palms upward, and the distended fingers pointed toward the object of his care, which as his hands gradually met, was secured in the clasping or locking of his fingers, and safely removed from the head of the barrel. When he reached the head of the stairs, the excitement was over; he smiled at the danger he had conquered; but the reaction was too powerful, and he fell into fits of most violent and dreadful laughter. He was conveyed senseless to bed, and many weeks elapsed ere his nerves recovered sufficiently to allow him to resume his habits of every-day life.

DEATHS.

In Sweden, Monroe county, February 27th, Mr. SOROM SHUMWAY, Jr., in the 22d or 23d year of his age. This, I think, is the fourth son taken by the hand of death from the domestic circle of father S., within the last three years. But thanks be to Heaven for the fond and triumphant hope offered us in the Gospel, of a glorious and happy reunion of kindred and friends, beyond the varying scenes of this short and transient life. May the Father of our spirits grant this mourning family the rich consolations of that faith, which disarms death of its sting, and robs the grave of its victory. And may the doctrine of universal love and impartial grace, which they have imbibed, lead them to cultivate within their bosoms, a spirit of forgiveness even towards some of their neighbors who hold a different sentiment, and who did not hesitate, in the hour of sorrow and affliction, to revile them by uncharitable accusations. The writer, by request, attended the funeral at the house of the father of the deceased, on February 29.

W. ANDREWS.

In Gaines, March 27, Mr. EBENEZER TOWLE, in the 64th year of his age. The funeral services were attended to in the Presbyterian church, where the consolations of the Gospel were administered to the relatives and friends, by the writer.

W. ANDREWS.

At Glens Falls, N. Y., February 7, Mrs. MARIA SEAMAN, wife of Mr. Allen T. Seaman, aged 32. Also, on the 29th March ult., Mr. ALLEN T. SEAMAN, aged 36.

By these mysterious dispensations of God's holy providence, three small children are left orphans to struggle with the trials and temptations of the world without a father's or a mother's care. We commend them to that God who is emphatically the God of the widow and the orphan, and we rejoice that we are able to do it in faith that he will never leave nor forsake them. Mr. and Mrs. Seaman were among the number of our best friends, and as they were virtuous in life so were they resigned in death. It is some relief from the poignancy of our sorrow, to know that they both died rejoicing in the faith, and bore their dying testimony to the sustaining power of the doctrine of God's boundless grace. Speaking of Mr. Seaman, our correspondent who communicates the intelligence of his death says: "I have been much with the sick, and have witnessed the death struggles of many, but never before have I seen such resignation as was manifested in this instance." Among his last words was an exhortation to those brethren who stood around his bed, to do all in their power to spread the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation, adding that it was his stay and staff in that last trial. The infidel may deride this Gospel and the bigot may count the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, but for one we are prepared to say, "Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his."

I. D. W.

In Auburn, April 9, CHARLES BAKER, only son of Rev. G. W. Montgomery, aged 1 year and 14 days. The funeral was attended on the 11th inst., and an address suitable to the occasion delivered by Rev. J. Chase, of Geneva.

"As the sweet flower, which scents the morn,
But withers in the rising day,
Thus lovely seemed the infant's dawn,
Thus swiftly fled its life away."
"It died to sin, to woe and care;
Yet for a moment felt the rod;
Then, springing on the viewless air,
Spread its light wings, and soared to God."

In Mansfield, Cattaraugus county, April 4, very suddenly, Mrs. MARY WORSTON, aged about 20 years. She has left a friendly companion to mourn her sudden departure; he being at the same time afflicted with a fever which threatened him with death. But blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted.

The usual services were performed by the writer, who humbly prays that this dispensation of God may be sanctified to the benefit of all who mourn. JUSTUS TEND.

THE INFIDEL HUSBAND.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

"Oh! ask not, hope thou not too much
Of sympathy below;
Few are the hearts whence one same touch
Bids the sweet fountains flow:
Few—and by still conflicting powers
Forbidden here to meet—
Such ties would make this life of ours Too fair for aught so fleet."—Miscellaneous Poems.

"Sunday morning is certainly different from all others in the week," exclaimed Irene Bentley, as she drew her husband towards the open window and gazed out upon the beautiful fields surrounding their pleasant dwelling. "There is a difference in its very air—it hath a balmy freshness and sweetness, all unlike other days; and the sunshine seems to fall more reverently upon the meek, up-lifted flowers and silken grass, and even the little bird, which yesterday sang so gaily upon the sweet briar, hath now a tenderer melody and singeth a holier song. Yea, all things seem to remember the Lord." "You are a sweet enthusiast, Irene," carelessly answered her husband, "and had I not vowed before marriage, never to tolerate a fanatical wife, I know not but I should even love you the more for these little bursts of insanity—they are so becoming to one of your peculiar cast of beauty." "Bursts of insanity! Herbert," mournfully rejoined the wife, while a deep, sickening pain, (the nature of which needs no explanation to those who have bent with crushed feelings over hope deferred) crept slowly through her quivering heart, and drew from her cheek its warm and mellowing tide.—"Bursts of insanity! Oh! Herbert, how can you deem the simple aspirations of a spirit conscious of its sins and weaknesses—conscious of its entire dependence on its Maker, and alive to the beauties of nature and to the beautiful character of Him who framed their excellencies—how can you deem these at all coupled with insanity? Let me convince you," she continued, eagerly opening the bookcase and taking from thence a much worn Bible—"let me convince you that you are wrong." "No, no. Another time will do just as well. I have a little reading of my own to do. Besides, you know conviction does not flash instantaneously upon my obtuse intellect, and it would be a waste of your precious Sunday moments; therefore, another time will do as well"—and he too advanced with an ironical smile to the bookcase, and soon threw himself upon the sofa, though Irene's streaming eyes dared not attempt to discover the book he had taken with him. She thought of an interesting religious work which she had long urged him to peruse. But no, she had been too often disappointed to hope that he had now turned his attention thitherward, and she bent her eyes close to her open Bible; but the words looked dim and wavering. "What a delightful writer Capt. Marryat is, though," exclaimed Mr. Bentley, after a long interim of silence. "The manner of Japhet's taming the royal tiger, is really admirable. Ha! where are your responding words, Irene? You sometimes give me three for one. Well! obstinate if you will—'tis the way of all you pious folks." And the novel-reading husband turned again, carelessly, to his lightsome pages. Irene did not reply, for her heart was full. Full of sorrow—full of choking remembrances—full of the corroding grief-drops of spiritual Marah. "Oh! Father of mercies," sighed she mentally, "must it be ever thus? Wilt thou leave me always alone—always unblest by the gentle communion of a kindred heart?"

"Yet I was formed to be so richly blest."

And the tears fell faster and faster, as she remembered a vista of happiness which had once opened to her eyes, but closed again just as the light entered her spirit, and told her what a blessed thing happiness must be. "And they do call me blest," she continued, half rejecting, half encouraging the visions which had risen from the oblivious fountain of memory,

"They call me blest, but did they know
The grief which this sad heart consumes—
The deep, the voiceless stream of woe,
Which gilds with tears soft fancy's plumes—
Would they still call me blest, and bind
Young roses round my aching brow?
No! fitter flowers their hands would find,
And fitter words their lips bestow.

I gaze upon the rising sun
Ere crimson sleep hath left his eye,
And my dark thoughts revert to one
Bright as that pilgrim of the sky.
I listen to the dreamy note
Of some wild melancholy bird,
And youth's bright visions round me float,
Till all life's feeble strings are stirr'd."

Irene did not repeat the other stanzas, for the contrast of a former blissful but unfortunate attachment, and her present unhappiness, was too painful for long contemplation, and she again bent her eyes upon the words of consolation. "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." "Oh if he would but search the Scriptures," murmured the wife bitterly—"if he would but search the Scriptures, that he might have life, then indeed might I catch a glimpse of life's sunshine. But, oh! to think that we have lived together three long, long years, and that never once in that time has he voluntarily opened the lids of this blessed book—never once listened with even complacency to the few beautiful chapters which I have dared to read in his presence. Oh God! Oh God! can I look with calmness upon the alienation from thee? Saviour of the dying! can I forgive such contempt of thy cross?" And for the first time, the flush of indignation threw its intense crimson upon her cheek, and she forgot for an instant that Herbert Bentley was—her husband. 'Twas but for an instant; the recollection of her marriage promise to love, honor, and obey him flashed across her mind, and she felt that she was wrong. True, she had loved him little when they were married, but he professed a belief in her peculiar and holy sentiments, and she rightly thought it would be no difficult task to love any one who, like herself, had a heart full of love for the Saviour. But he had deceived her. His profession was a ruse, and instead of the long expected, long coveted communings of a Christian, kindred heart, she had as yet experienced nothing but the cold cavillings, the coarse and bitter revilings of confirmed infidelity. The iron seemed to enter her very soul at the cruel retrospection, but she asked herself if his depravity had altered in the least, the nature of her obligations; and conscience immediately answered her in the negative—her promise was unconditional. Her heart smote her, and she arose and moved tremblingly and weepingly towards the sofa.—Her husband was asleep. The book had fallen from his hand. She knew that he slept soundly. She knelt by his side—she took his hand in her own—she lifted her voice to her God. The spirit of earnest prayer is like the spirit of the mighty winds. It heedeth not the control of man. It riseth almost silently from some pure and humble desire—with scarce a view of expression from some tender half-formed wish—yet soareth aloft as if upon the wings of the tempest, till space is made vocal with its vivid thoughts, and the air vibrates with its deep and importunate petitions. The silver voice of the kneeling Irene Bentley awoke like the first soft whisper of the breeze upon a mountain stream. But as her feelings became more intense, her deep, thrilling words reverberated loudly, but to herself unconsciously, along the lofty ceiling. "Bring him back, O almighty Father," she cried, "bring him back from his miserable wanderings to thine own dear fold—to the care of the one faithful and true Shepherd. His soul is in darkness—shine thou into its benighted recesses. His wishes are against the prosperity of thy kingdom—convert them, oh God, to thy cause. Father of the fatherless—Healer of the broken heart—Smoother of the dying pillow—hear me. By thy great kindness and mercy, hear me. By the misery of his darkened soul, by the groans of this breaking heart, by the oil and blood of thine anointed and bruised one, hear me, and bring him back, bring him back!"

A convulsed hand was thrown round the neck of the fair petitioner, and a low, deep, agonizing sob was in her ear. She gazed around in astonishment—her penitent husband was at her side, and his shaken voice continued her prayer, "take me back, oh take me back!" The long, violently-suppressed springs of his soul were awaked to action. Like Saul's was his conversion, sudden but lasting—and his beautiful wife soon learned by experience, that it was indeed an easy task to love one whose heart, like her own, was filled with love for the Father of our spirits, and the Saviour of man.

BRIEF CRITICISMS.....No. II.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"As He is wise, he knows what is best to be done; powerful, he can do it; good, he will do it."—Dr. A. Clarke.

It is a subject of frequent remark, how often the most learned writers of the Limitarian schools, in commenting upon some general subject of theology, will utter sentences which, when duly applied, will entirely overthrow their own sectarian tenets. This frequently occurs when they speak in relation to the Deity. Indeed, it does not seem possible that a believer in the popular doctrines of the day, can candidly comment upon the attributes of God, and their necessary influence over him, without undermining the foundation of his own system and strengthening the pillars of universal salvation. These remarks appear to be fully exemplified in the above sentence from the writings of Dr. Clarke, the literary giant of the Methodists. It is found in his "Observations on the being of a God, deduced from a consideration of Heb. xi: 6." He is speaking of the attributes of the Creator, and of the deductions consistently drawn from their operations. "Goodness," he says, "consists in being pleased with communicating happiness to others." Wisdom is the "making a right or beneficent use of knowledge or power"—"hence wisdom and goodness must be ever conjoined to make any act of power perfect." From these premises, the doctor draws the conclusion, above recorded, that—"As He [God] is wise, he knows what is best to be done; powerful, he can do it; good, he will do it." Premises were never more firmly founded, and deductions cannot be more logically drawn, than these. All the arts of sophistry, all the subtleties of metaphysicians, or the efforts of dogmatists, cannot affect the stability of that sentence, or prevent the reasoning mind from following to its legitimate conclusions. I know not whether Dr. Clarke thought of his creed within the hour in which he penned that paragraph; but if he did, it does not seem possible but he must have discovered the glaring contradiction, between them. Let us apply the sentence to the creation and destination of mankind.

It must be acknowledged by every consistent theist, that Deity was not compelled, by any necessity, to form the human race; but that he entered upon the work of creation of his own will and pleasure, actuated solely by the promptings of his own nature. And it also must be acknowledged, that in creating man he had some specific, definite design or end in view, solely to accomplish which, man was formed. What was this design?—for what purpose did God usher the human family into being? To answer this question, we must learn the character of Deity—and to learn his character, we must examine his attributes. Dr. Clarke has laid down the indisputable propositions, that “as God is wise, he knows what is best to be done,” and as he is “good, he will do it.” Very well. Then the purpose for which he created the human race, was the “best” which could be conceived by a good Deity. But this provokes still another question—What could that best purpose have been? Let us reflect for a moment. Could God have formed mankind only to annihilate them—to cast them back again into nonentity? This supposition does not appear reasonable—it is too near akin to the child’s play, of building up, only to have the pleasure of pulling down. Surely we have no proper grounds of ascribing to the Deity a motive so unworthy his wisdom, and all his infinite perfections. Could he have formed them for the purpose of plunging them into endless wretchedness?—for the purpose of placing them where they would become steeped in sin and corruption!—where their sole employment would be to curse and blaspheme forever, the name of the Author of their existence? Is this the best purpose which a good Being could entertain in forming a countless race of sentient creatures? Is it the most congenial to a pure, holy, righteous God, to perpetuate sin and transgression forever? The heart of the Christian repels such a thought, as a base libel upon the character of the best of Beings! The human mind can conceive of but one other purpose which God could possibly have entertained in creating mankind—and that was to cause them to become the recipients of his own holiness, happiness, and love! Here is truly a motive worthy a God of infinite perfections. It is worthy of his goodness; for Dr. Clarke says truly, that his “goodness consists in being pleased with communicating happiness to others.” It is worthy of his holiness, for surely a holy being can have no stronger desire than to have his creatures become pure and holy also. And it is worthy of his love; as nothing is more gratifying to him that loves, than to have his affection ardently returned by its objects! Consequently this purpose of conferring holiness and happiness upon his creatures, is, according to every power of human comprehension, the “best” which could have been originated by infinite wisdom, or sanctioned by infinite goodness; and this, therefore, must have been his purpose. From these remarks, it will be perceived, that no proposition is more firmly established, or self-evident, than that Deity created the family of man solely to have them become the participants of his own purity and felicity.

Will this godlike purpose be accomplished? Dr. Clarke answers this question—As God “is wise, he knows what is best to be done”—(we have seen, that in regard to the final state of mankind, the “best to be done,” is to make them holy and happy)—as he is “powerful he can do it,” as he is “good, he WILL do it!” The Scriptures return the same answer—“The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand.” “My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.” Reason also responds to this answer. It teaches that when God, under the light of infinite wisdom, has matured a plan to accomplish a holy design, his omnipotent power must enable him to carry forward that plan to a successful and glorious termination!

It is of no avail to assert that man has an agency by which he frustrates this holy design of Deity. Because, in the first place, the Scriptures afford no proof of such a sentiment, but all its testimony is to the contrary; and in the next place, it contradicts the self-evident position of Dr. Clarke, and is based upon the ground that God cannot do “what is best to be done,” which is an absurd impossibility!—and it also proceeds upon the supposition that, God would knowingly put into the possession of his frail creatures, a power to defeat his will, to their own destruction; which, if possible, is a still greater absurdity. It may also be objected that our arguments bear as forcibly against the existence of earthly sin and wretchedness, as against eternal. But this objection is groundless; inasmuch as the Scriptures and experience testify that God can bring permanent good out of temporary sin and unhappiness; and these, therefore, can form no obstacle to the ultimate success of his designs to bless the whole world with righteousness and happiness. But endless sin and suffering, would form an insurmountable obstacle to this blessed design, and therefore it could not have been embraced in the purposes of the Deity.

From this brief examination, it will be perceived by the reader, that the words of Dr. Clarke, at the head of this article, when carried out to their unavoidable result, join with the voice of inspiration and reason, in proclaiming the glorious truth, that mankind shall at length be exalted to a higher, holier, and happier state of existence. That sentence will, therefore, remain and live, in its simplicity and truth, to lead the benighted mind to a knowledge of the Gospel of the Redeemer, when by far the greater portion of the writings of its author, shall have long been buried in their native oblivion.

AN APPEAL TO FEMALES, ESPECIALLY TO THOSE CALLED UNIVERSALISTS.

This is an age in which much is said and written, fitly and justly too, for the mental improvement of woman. And while her knowledge in the arts and sciences is advancing, and her influence being felt, I would have her religious and moral improvement commensurate with her mental. I would have her influence felt with a strong, holy and all-enduring power, in the cause of Christianity. I would have her still more religious, not nominally and professedly, but practically, at home and abroad. In this age of unprecedented inquiry, in which no opinions are too sacred to be questioned—in which man dare lift a sacrilegious voice against his Creator, denying his existence and, if not his existence, his revelation—in such an age, with infidelity on one hand, which believes nothing, and fanaticism on the other, which believes every thing, both equally injurious to man and dishonoring to God, it becomes her, as she regards her own happiness and that of her children, to be watchful.

Here woman does not enter the arena of political strife—her voice is not heard in the hall of legislation, nor the council chamber; but a different and a far gentler province is allotted her—that of rearing the infant mind; and as that master chord vibrates as she pleases, weighty is her responsibility for the charge committed to her trust. Then let the nursery be the place where Christian principles are sown and nourished, and they will never be rooted out. It is there she can breathe on hearts whose answering tones will thrill with a religious and moral fervor, which will strengthen, beautify, and mature, in every department of social and public life; and enable her to say, with a Roman matron’s pride—“my jewels are my children.” But let her not mistake Christianity for creeds; for many pious mothers who now mourn over infidel sons might reflect, that had they imbued their minds with the principles of Christianity instead of the tenets of a particular creed, their mourning might now have been turned into joy. Woman is not always sensible of the weight of her influence, or her high standing in the religious world; yet it is a fact, that while in almost every town, men are more or less given to infidelity, there is not one female voice lifted in its defence, which proves her high prerogative, and the deep susceptibility of her religious feelings.

A friend, who was extensively acquainted with the world, once said to me, that he had met with a great many men that were skeptics and scoffers, but never with only one or two women, and I was proud, yes, even gloried in the thought, that female influence was on the side of Christianity, notwithstanding I had blushed that one had stood in public assemblies and ridiculed its excellencies. I can look upon man while he dare stand up, and with a smile of scorn on his lips, deny the imperishable truths of revelation, and the existence of an All-wise—hear him ridicule the Christian’s hope of immortality beyond the perishable things of time—hear him speak of religion as a dream, a speculative theory, unbecoming the dignity of high intellect—of the wonderful mechanism and construction of the universe—its unbroken order—of the unmultiplied beauties of this earth—their infinite variety—their surprising regularity and systematic arrangement, and of the human mind, unsatisfied and incomprehensible as it is—while he has the hardihood to declare “they are all the work of chance,” and feel no other emotion save pity. But to gaze on woman thus, is more than I can calmly bear; it touches the chord of my sympathies, and I could weep in bitterness of soul, to think she could ever fall so far. I never wonder that man, with his restless ambition and lofty aspirations, should sometimes become so self-sufficient as to question the existence of a Deity—that he should feel a sense of security and confidence in himself, independent of the influences of heaven, saying as did Pharaoh in the pride of his heart, “the river is mine, and I have made it.” But that woman, with her present advantages, should become so forgetful of obligation, as to raise one effort to demolish the structure of Christianity, or be indifferent to its promulgation, appears to be an anomaly of human nature. Can she, when so indebted, become so ungrateful? Does she not know that Christianity, guided by unerring wisdom, has brought her from the degraded slave of man, to be his warmest and most confiding friend—his equal in intellectual endowments—his superior in the active charities and kindly affections of the human heart? Let her look at female degradation in those nations where Christianity has never appeared in any form, and she will wish, even if it be false, for its perpetuation and advancement here, and pray that its renovating rays may yet be permitted to penetrate the soil of mental and moral darkness there. She cannot reflect upon the truth, that for what she is, she is indebted to Christianity; and become an infidel. It is impossible.

But there are other considerations which will forever forbid it. She must visit the poor, bind up the broken-hearted, watch by the couch of sickness and death: and it is in scenes like these that she learns her dependence, and it is here that she needs religion to sustain her. How can she stand by the couch of the dying sinner, with no Saviour to point him to? How can she comfort the childless mother, with the prospect of annihilation? How can she stand by the grave of departed worth, with no hopes beyond its cold embrace? She cannot; therefore it seems to be unnatural for her to be irreligious, and I am proud and happy to believe there are few of her sex that are so. She is too weak to be independent of an All-Supreme; and too dependent to be ungrateful.

That woman is more religious and devotional than man, will not be denied; but whether she is naturally so, or whether it is owing to circumstances, I shall not pretend to decide; but this I know, that her heart is a soil fitted for the cultivation of the Christian virtues, and without them she is a mere toy. Let man proudly boast of his superiority in every other respect; but in firm religious principles and heart-felt devotion, woman claims pre-eminence, and of this let her ever be meekly conscious, remembering that her influence will be felt in after ages; and as I firmly believe that the progress of Christianity will be in proportion as she engages in the work, I would exhort her to diligently cultivate her religious feelings, improve her moral faculties, search into and investigate the principles of the Bible, that she may be able to withstand the missiles of infidelity, and transmit to her children by the purity of her life, an imperishable memento of the correctness of her faith.

AN INCIDENT.

"What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

To the long list of evils resulting from Limitarianism, may safely be added that of greatly affecting, if not destroying, domestic happiness. I do not allude, solely, to the unkind feelings and sharp contentions (sometimes denominated quarrels) which are known frequently to arise out of a difference of opinion in matters of religious faith between man and wife. They may live on terms of friendship and harmony in every other respect; still, their different systems of faith may greatly diminish the happiness which would otherwise be complete. But to my story.

I called some few weeks since on an old acquaintance, who is an Arminian. The conversation soon turned upon religious topics; when my friend freely expressed his opinion, that God wills the salvation of all men, and that Christ died for all. His wife (a Calvinist) was very confident that all whom the Father willed to save, and all for whom Christ died, would certainly be saved. Yet each believed the other to be in an error, and both professed a belief in endless misery. The husband particularly, manifested considerable anxiety about the future well-being of some of his children, whom he believed to be out of the "ark of safety," and from present appearances, were as likely to land in the regions of endless despair, as in the blest mansions above.

Truly, thought I, "what God hath joined together, let not man put asunder:" for, verily, they are twain, but of one flesh; and, were it not for the divisions effected by the doctrines and commandments of men, they would be of one spirit too. For the faith of one is as firmly supported by divine testimony as the other; and, had not one learned from his creed the absurd idea that God has not power to accomplish what he earnestly desires, and the other, that he never desired or intended to save but a part of his offspring, their two systems of faith might have been blended into one, and they could have united heart and hand, in praising a God, almighty in goodness and boundless in love. Yes, they could then by an eye of faith, view not only their own dear children, but a ransomed universe redeemed from sin and corruption, to a state of immortal glory and ceaseless joy.

It would have been really amusing to me to sit and hear each of them contending for their respective systems of faith, and quoting positive declarations of Scripture in proof, such as:—"God will have all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth;" and in reply: "His counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure"—were it not that their systems, taken separately, afforded them so little consolation; but as it was, I felt to pity rather than laugh at them. I could scarcely help exclaiming: How long will men and women continue to render themselves and their fellow-beings unhappy, by limiting the Holy One of Israel! How long will fond parents be tormented with the belief that their tender offspring are liable to endure the indescribable pains of ceaseless torments! How long will the soul-chilling influence of Partialism continue to destroy the peace and happiness of the social and domestic circle! And how long will a set of men be paid for preaching to mankind the belief that their kind heavenly Father is possessed of a character and disposition, which would excel in malignity the most bloodthirsty tyrant that ever disgraced humanity! O that a generation might spring up, that would act independently and honestly—that would prize liberty more than slavery—principle more than popularity, and honesty more than hypocrisy. Then would the Gospel be proclaimed in its purity, its principles would be reduced to practice; and mankind would become better and happier. H. O.

AN EXTRACT,

FROM THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE AND JOURNAL.

The author of this extract, after having remarked upon the duty of prayer, and pointed out the manner in which it should be observed, writes as follows:—"Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven." Then he justly observes:—

"But how many are the defects in our prayers which render them in a great degree abortive! What want of confidence we manifest when we approach our heavenly Father! We do not trust him with that degree of confidence we do the fathers of our flesh, in order to receive of them; we fear when we ask bread, he will give us a stone. We have been faulty in not believing our prayers shall be answered.....What want of earnestness! We have failed in employing the whole man in this duty.....Let us then be diligent and earnest in praying for ourselves, our friends, the church of God, and the world at large."

Every sincere and well-instructed Christian, and especially every Universalist, will give a hearty assent to the truth in this extract, and to the reasonableness of the requirement here made. The author, though he might have professed to be a Methodist, wrote under the dictation of the spirit of truth. And I cannot help wishing in all the earnestness of my soul, that every man in Christendom would practice as he here directs. And it appears that the writer himself had the same wish. But how he could cherish this wish, follow his own recommendation here given, and at the same time disbelieve "the restitution of all things," is passing strange. I affirm without the fear of contradiction, even from the writer himself, that no man can sincerely follow his recommendation, and not be strictly a Universalist. For he recommends that we pray for all men believing that our prayers shall be answered; that we should "employ the whole man in this duty," and "approach our heavenly Father," without a "want of confidence." Supposing all professing Christians should do as he has here required. They would "approach our heavenly Father" praying earnestly in faith and with the utmost "confidence for the world at large;" and saying, "Our Father who art in heaven.....thy will be done," believing with all possible strength of faith that it will be done in the ultimate salvation and bliss of the whole world. God be thanked that there are many who can offer this prayer which Christ proposed, and offer it believing, and thus do as this writer has recommended. Does he believe that, "If two on earth shall agree as touching any thing they shall ask, it shall be done for them by our Father in heaven"? If he does, and at the same time "approach our heavenly Father, praying for the world at large, believing his prayer shall be answered," he must be a Universalist; and he and I being "two" out of the many who "agree as touching" one "thing," the salvation of all, he must believe the promise of Christ that the thing shall be granted which we ask. Did the author of the above extract believe while writing that there would be two who would follow his recommendation, or agree in praying in faith for the salvation of all? If he did not, he had no encouragement to write, and he might have spent his time in more profitable employment, especially if he does not himself follow his own recommendation given to himself and others. And does he do it? If not, he needs himself to be taught and to be converted before he instructs others. And if he does do it, professing at the same time to be a believer in, and an advocate of Partialism, or teach that there is no reason to believe his prayer will be answered, he must be a most consummate hypocrite. What! a man pray for the salvation of himself, his friends, the church of God and the world at large, believing that his prayers shall be answered, and yet speak contemptuously of, and profess to despise the sentiment that his prayer shall be answered? May the Lord forgive such deception and wickedness, for of all hindrances, to the spread of divine truth and the advancement of righteousness, such is the worst.

Judging, however, from the extract above, I think the author when he wrote, could not, if he wrote in sincerity, have been "far from the kingdom," the true and spiritual kingdom of Jesus Christ. And while praying in faith for the salvation of all, he can with the utmost propriety say, while no one with a limited faith can with reasonableness, "Thy kingdom come," because it most certainly will come, and he will believe it, therefore he asks with propriety. That kingdom which will come unto him, is that of "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit." I repeat, this kingdom will come to the true believer and consistent suppliant. It is the fruit of that "faith once delivered to the saints," and which caused "joy unspeakable and full of glory;" a faith which looks with a bright and steady eye to that "brighter and happier world," and sees in blissful triumph, the accomplishment of God's will in the renovation of this sinful world.

I regret that there are so many destitute of this faith, and consequently of its joy-inspiring blessings. The author of this extract seemed also to regret it. For lamenting over "the defects" of his and his brethren's prayers, he says, "What want of confidence we manifest, when we approach our heavenly Father!.....We fear when we ask bread, he will give us a stone. We have been faulty, in not believing our prayers shall be answered." And if he be made sorry on account of these faults, may the Lord grant that his sorrow be of a godly sort; "For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of." And this salvation which he may experience, will consist in a deliverance from "fear" and this "want of confidence," and which deliverance will be consequent upon a belief and unwavering trust in God as "the Saviour of all men." This is a "salvation not to be repented of."

But how inconsistent with every thing in the Gospel, and every thing sanctioned by reason, for a man professing to be a Christian and to "trust in the Lord always," to "approach" God, hungering and thirsting after the bread of eternal life, and pray God that he would grant it to all the wanting children of humanity, fearing that instead of this, he will give that which cannot satisfy!! O may God forgive such a fault, and speedily deliver those justly accused of it, from the thralldom of this worst, this most tormenting of all "fear." And may they "trust in him with" a greater "degree of confidence" than they "do the fathers of our flesh." And if it be the will of God, may they all follow earnestly the recommendation of this writer, to "Be diligent and earnest in praying [in faith] for themselves, their friends, the church of God, and the world at large." Such a prayer is acceptable in the sight of God, and it will be heard, yea, it will be answered. O. R.

LET US BE CAREFUL.

It is my opinion that Universalists are not always careful enough in representing the views and feelings of their opposers. Perhaps I am wrong; but it does appear evident to me, that those who represent our opposers as having no desire for the salvation of all men, are not as charitable as they ought to be; for how often do we hear Limitarians pleading with their heavenly Father to save the whole world. Now their desires are ample enough, and if they could only persuade the Almighty to be as benevolent as they are themselves, all would be safe in his hands. Let us, then, attribute their want of faith in the fulfilment of their own prayers, rather to the prejudices of education, than any evil design toward their fellow mortals. H.

OBJECTIONS TO UNIVERSALISM CONSIDERED...No. IV.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

Another objection which is frequently brought against Universalism, is, that we deny the doctrine of regeneration, new birth, change of heart, or conversion. This is, indeed, a very important charge, inasmuch as it supposes that we deny all those texts of Scripture, which set forth this doctrine in the most decisive manner, as belonging to the faith of the saints in Christ Jesus. Hence, persons who are unacquainted with our sentiments on this subject, are often deceived by the misrepresentations of the wicked. They have been taught by those in whom they place great confidence, that all Universalists deny the doctrine of regeneration—that they do not believe in being born again; and, consequently, they apprehend that Universalism is opposed to the Bible, and unworthy of a candid investigation. Those who have been thus deceived concerning Universalism, are always surprised, when they first have a proper opportunity to hear a Universalist advocate his opinions; and they can hardly persuade themselves that such is the belief of the denomination. They appear inclined to the idea, that the Universalist has accommodated his belief to the Scriptures, for the purpose of securing favor and reaping an advantage, which his real sentiments would never obtain. This, however, is not the case. There can be no objection raised against us on account of our denying the Scriptures. Our opposers must seek other causes of complaint, or relinquish the hope of success. We ask them not to make up a kind of Universalism no one believes, and then, because they can show its absurdity and falsehood, proclaim a triumphant victory over us. No: we ask them to set forth Universalism as it is, and if they are able to refute it by reason or Scripture, they shall have our thanks for their labor. We affirm that we believe in the change, expressed by the terms regeneration, conversion, etc.; and if they require assistance to tear down a kind of Universalism that is opposed to the scriptural meaning of these words, our services are at their command.

But it should be remarked, that although the scriptural signification of these terms is true, the terms themselves have been most grossly perverted. That such is the truth, appears from the diversity of opinion which exists among professed Christians. Formerly it was thought that regeneration was the work of the Holy Spirit; but since protracted meetings have become the way to get religion, men have disputed this agency. Formerly, certain changes were considered miraculous; but now the same change is produced by human efforts, and the force of a miracle is lost in the frequency of the occurrence. Thus we perceive, that words and phrases change their meaning. By a perverted application they gradually lose their primitive signification, and obtain a new one. The common acceptance of the word hell, is very different from what it was two hundred years ago. So it is with a great many other words. Hence, our inquiry should be, in reading the sacred Scriptures, what is the general usage, and what ideas were originally conveyed by these words. There is a necessity which demands the adoption of this course by all sincere inquirers after biblical information; since a perverted application of many words and phrases has obtained in the religious world; and, consequently, an adherence to this degeneracy would defeat the object sought. It is this difference between the ancient and modern signification of certain words, that has given origin to many objections to Universalism. Our opposers complain that we do not believe in regeneration; but this complaint is unjust, and cannot be sustained. There would be more propriety for us to make the same charge against them, because we adhere to the primitive, while they have adopted a spurious meaning of this word. "But how," says the objector, "do you determine the truth of this question?" I answer, by a comparative view of our respective opinions with the Scriptures.

Does the objector, then, inform us, that it is necessary for all mankind to feel willing to be damned to all eternity—that they must see that God's justice requires their eternal sinning and wretchedness—that they must feel that they are totally depraved by nature, and exposed to an infinite curse because of Adam's sin; and, moreover, that they must believe in the eternity of the devil and his works, in the doctrine of election and reprobation, and in free grace and universal atonement at the same time? Would he not object to the fellowship of any person, and consider him unprepared to meet God, who had not experienced a change of this description? Most certainly. Compare this change with the Scriptures. 1 Peter i: 23, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever;" 1 John v: 1 and iv: 7, "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God. Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God."

In the apostles' times, those who believed that the Saviour was the anointed, believed, as a consequence, the Gospel he proclaimed. And surely there is nothing miraculous or mysterious in forming the belief of any person, it is always the result of evidence, real or imaginary. When the Jews or Paynims were converted to Christianity, they experienced a great change in their faith and character, and it is equally so now. All who become converted from the errors of Jewish or Heathenish traditions to the faith of the Gospel, experience, as a consequence, a "change of heart," and become regenerated into the spirit of a better doctrine. Prior to their conversion to the truth, their hearts were filled with the terrors of their cruel creeds. But when they come to a knowledge of the truth, perfect love casts out all fear and torment. As a consequence, all converts to the Christian religion experience a moral change in their minds, and a practical change in their characters. They love God, not through fear of an endless hell, but because he first loved them. They obey his commandments, because it is their meat and their drink to do good; and because they prefer the fruit of righteousness, rather than the fruit of sin. Every sinner must experience a change of this description, to be happy here or hereafter. And as the Scriptures affirm that "all shall be made alive in Christ," I would recommend to the objector that consideration of what they teach, which cannot fail of convincing him that the Bible and Universalism are one.

LETTER II.

To Rev. Mr. Smith, Pastor of the First Close Communion Baptist Church, Boston, N. Y.

BR. SMITH—In pursuance of the intimation given at the close of my letter to you, of the 9th ult., I take pen in hand to address you upon the subject of your misrepresentations of Universalist sentiments. From what I have heard of your preaching, both personally and from others, I am constrained to say that, in your public communications, such misrepresentations are quite frequent—so much so, that it might not be going beyond the truth, to say, that the practice, with you, has grown into a habit. And yet you profess to have once been a Universalist, and, if I do not misunderstand you, a confident and zealous one, and that too for a number of years. I hardly know in relation to your case, which of the three following conclusions ought to be adopted as true:

1. That you really, as you profess, have been a Universalist; 2. That you never were, and that you do not suppose you were; 3. That you really suppose you were, while in fact you were not.

To adopt, in full view of those circumstances which furnish the occasion for this letter, the conclusion, that you really have been a Universalist, though it gives you full credit for the truth in one point, would still be to suppose you guilty of wilfully slandering the denomination to which you formerly belonged, in that you frequently represent them as holding sentiments which they not only do not profess, but which they positively and wholly disavow. This first conclusion, then, being repugnant to Christian charity, ought not to be adopted as true, but upon the fullest and most convincing evidence.

The second conclusion, namely, that you never were a Universalist, and that you do not suppose you were, is scarcely less unfavorable than the first; for to adopt it as true, would be to suppose you guilty of deliberate falsehood, oft repeated, and solemnly persisted in, even while professing to declare the truth of God. This conclusion, also, as it would be extremely painful to Christian charity, ought not to be adopted on slight grounds.

The third conclusion, namely, that you really suppose you once were a Universalist, while in fact you were not, is the only conclusion I can think of, which does not impeach your moral, not to say your Christian character. To adopt this, would be to suppose merely, that you are laboring under a mistake in the matter; and hence, that your misrepresentations arise from misconception of what Universalist sentiments really are. It is true, this might be deemed rather derogatory of your intellect; but it would leave your morals and piety unimpeached. Since, then, I must adopt one of these three conclusions, if I am to have any opinion on the subject; since, also, when one of two or more evils is evidently unavoidable, it is our duty to choose what appears to be the least; I have been, and am still strongly inclined to adopt, as true, the third conclusion, in preference to either of the others; believing that in thus doing, I follow the dictates of that charity, which "rejoiceth not in iniquity." For surely it is incomparably the less evil, for an individual to labor under the most egregious mistake, than to be criminally guilty, in what some might denominate the lowest degree.

I now design to specify some of the more prominent points of doctrine, which I am knowing to your charging upon us wrongfully, and shall proceed upon the conviction that you are not aware of using misrepresentation, but that you really once held all those absurdities which you are in the practice of charging upon Universalists, and suppose, as a matter of course, that they really hold them, and endeavor to defend them. Yet I apprehend, that it is at least doubtful, whether the generality of people will consider it possible that such can be the facts, in relation to your situation and views. I imagine most persons will find it difficult to believe, that a man of your talents and apparent discernment, should have so egregiously mistaken the sentiments of a sect to whom he belonged for a series of years. For myself, however, I know that strange things frequently happen; that reality is sometimes more marvellous than fiction, and that there are mysteries in almost every thing around us; hence I am inclined to imagine that you did thus mistake, though by what means it happened, I am not at liberty to conjecture. I am inclined to think also, that at the time you thought yourself so much of a Universalist, you still believed the popular creed, only that you had incorporated with it the doctrine of ultimate universal happiness, divorced from that of ultimate universal holiness; and that you had slightly modified some parts of the same creed, in order to bring them more nearly to agree with the newly adopted article; as for example, by believing that endless misery, though threatened, would not be inflicted; hence, that your system of belief, to use a figure, was composed of the old tattered garment of Calvinism, patched in one of its worn-out places, with a new piece, torn from the seamless robe of Universalism, and darned in others, with threads ravelled from the same piece. But it is scarcely necessary to add, for even your information, that such a system is not that of Universalists. But to the specifications.

1. Universalists do not believe, nor profess to believe, "that God will take all mankind to heaven in their sins." It is perfectly astonishing to the generality of those who have any acquaintance with the Universalist belief, that a man of your profession and standing, should even insinuate such a thing. Yet you did this, in my hearing, by setting forth that, when a Universalist, this was your belief. How you came to believe in happiness without holiness, we were not informed; but I have endeavored to account for it in the following manner:—According to the popular creed, (the greater part of which I suppose you to have believed,) sin originated in heaven; and granting this to have been the case, what is a more reasonable conclusion than that it will return whence it came? Moreover, it is commonly taught that there is no moral change for the better after death. If you believed this, and also believed "that God will take all mankind to heaven," you would be very likely to believe that he would take them thither "in their sins;" for it is frequently the case, that the best of men confess themselves, in some degree, sinners, to the end of their lives.

But permit me now to repeat to you, that this is not Universalism. It may be an improvement of Calvinism, or something else, but it is not the faith of Universalists. For consider once, its inconsistency. To go to heaven, is usually understood to mean the same as to be saved. And to speak of being saved in sin, is as plainly a contradiction in terms, as to tell of a sane madman, a healthy sick man, or a wise fool. Salvation is a deliverance from sin. "Thou shalt call his name Jesus," said the angel that predicted the birth of our Lord, "for he shall save his people from their sins." And as we believe, "that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world," so also we believe that Jesus is "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Matt. i: 21—1 John iv: 14—John i: 29.

2. Universalists do not deny the doctrine of punishment. When I heard you insinuate that they did, it was to me a matter of considerable surprise; for I had been well assured of the fact, that about a year ago, some three or four numbers of a Universalist periodical, entitled "The Christian Visitor," were presented to you, containing, along with some other matter, a series of articles, headed "Punishment;" the whole being an essay upon the design, object, effect, and duration of punishment, as believed by Universalists to be "inflicted by the divine Being on transgressors." I say, your insinuation, mentioned above, was rather surprising to me at first, and your conduct appeared not easily reconcilable with moral honesty; for I was sensible, that whoever should have read even the first paragraph of the before mentioned essay, could not avoid knowing, that at least, the writer of it professed to believe, (as in fact the denomination believe,) "that scarcely any point of doctrine is more frequently and explicitly taught in the sacred writings, than that our heavenly Father, in the administration of his government, punishes, or corrects, or chastises his intelligent creatures, when disobedient to his requirements." Upon further reflection, however, it occurred to me as probable, that you judge of Universalism altogether by the views you entertained at the time you profess to have believed the doctrine; and that as regards deriving any information from the aforesaid essay on punishment, you merely glanced at the caption, and concluded that the work was written to disprove the doctrine thereby named. If I was correct in this, then perhaps the fact of your believing in no punishment may be accounted for thus: It is believed by many, that there is no punishment at all in this world, and none hereafter for those that are to be saved. Now, whoever should believe in this, and also believe that all will be saved, would of course believe in no punishment here or hereafter. But permit me to remind you, that though, for aught I know, this may be Calvinism improved, it is by no means Universalism.

3. Universalists do not deny the doctrine of conversion, regeneration, or the new birth—your insinuations to the contrary, notwithstanding. I do not at all dispute what I once heard you relate, that on a certain occasion, during the time in which you claim to have been a Universalist, you did tell a certain preacher, on his quoting to you "Except a man be born again," etc., that you did not believe any such doctrine; but I do deny that this is any proof that Universalists do not believe what the Scriptures teach about being born again, begotten again, born of God, born of the spirit, converted, etc. By what means you came to deny this doctrine, I acknowledge myself unable to guess. Be it known to you, however, that Universalists believe the doctrine, as they understand it to be taught in the Scriptures.

There are other particulars which might be named, but the foregoing I deem sufficient for my present purpose. I trust that from the specifications already given, you will be sensible that it is incumbent upon you, as a man and a Christian, either to prove that Universalists profess to hold such views as you ascribe to them, or else to confess and forsake your error. If you are really honest, as, in this letter, I have supposed you to be, I shall expect you to pay immediate attention to the subject, and endeavor to make yourself acquainted with our real sentiments; in which case, I am confident you will find that you have misrepresented us, not merely in the particulars herein named, but also on other points of considerable importance.

With respect to your anecdotes and narrations respecting Universalist ministers, which I alluded to in my former letter, I have concluded, to let them pass for what they are worth; since the version of them which I was favored with hearing, contained no direct allegations against their moral character. Any advantage which your cause is susceptible of deriving from such stories, you are welcome to.

I offer no apology for addressing you in this public manner, except the simple fact, that your misrepresentations have been given in public, and have been very common for a long time.

Should no circumstances occur within a few weeks, rendering it certain that the conclusion is a false one which supposes that you are honestly mistaken respecting Universalist sentiments, I shall probably write you again, setting forth in brief, what the sentiments of Universalists really are.

Your brother,

J. LEWIS.

THE WATERER... No. VII.
SINGING.

"Admonishing one another with psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs."

A most beautiful, interesting, and attractive part of the exercises of public worship, is the singing. A meeting without singing is like—I know not what. "Whereunto shall I liken it? It is like a pasture without water—a garden without flowers—a feast without butter—a wedding without wine. There is something wanting in the effect of the services—an indescribable void in our feelings—an inward, silent dissatisfaction.

A pretty true indication of the state of a religious society—its prosperity, and the zeal of its members—is the condition of the singing. In one society it is fervent, animated, sweet, and thrilling; in another, it is low, embarrassed, and languishing; and in another, there is none at all.

Now I would earnestly recommend, brethren, that ye take early and efficient measures to have good singing. Procure a teacher, and start a singing-school. Let the teacher be, if practicable, a true believer, that he may be able to sing with the spirit and the understanding, eschewing "trinitarian doxologies" and "judgment anthems." If not able to sustain a teacher, independently, unite with other societies of the like precious faith.

By this means, you will soon be able to "admonish one another," interestingly, "with psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs." Let not the married, and even the advanced in life, be ashamed to be seen in the gallery. Nature has not given to all of us the organs of melody; or has made a difference in their susceptibility; and those who have voices for music, ought to manifest their gratitude, by making melody for those who cannot make it for themselves. Besides, "it is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto his name."

The following are some of the advantages resulting from it: 1. It secures the attendance of the young, whose bosoms always vibrate to the strains of melody, and whose minds, not preoccupied by the roots of prejudice, are fruitful gardens for the plants of truth and fruits of righteousness. 2. It warms up the whole congregation, enlists the feelings, and pre-engages the attention to the other services. 3. It animates the preacher, and enables him to enter with warmth and power into the merits of his subject.

A shrewd observer, in the circle of my acquaintance, more famed for wit than piety, once said to the chorister, "You must not be absent again, from meeting; for the choir depend upon you. And when our preacher reads his hymn in the morning, and we sing two lines, in discord, and then sit down—if he has any poor preaching on hand, we are sure to have it."

But there should always be more than one person in a choir, who can pitch a tune and take the lead; and the choir should practice frequently, and rehearse together. Besides, a good and attentive chorister should be paid something for his services, that he can afford to devote some time and attention in qualifying and preparing to superintend this difficult, but interesting portion of the services.

One great beauty in the performance of sacred music is modesty. This beauty is sometimes marred by an ambition in some to be heard above the rest. You will frequently be disgusted with the best singer in the choir, in consequence of such immodesty; and you may observe that this propensity in a singer, even though found in connexion with superior skill, always renders its possessor disagreeable to the other singers, and unwelcome in the choir. Instead of each one striving to be heard above the rest, all should aim to harmonize, and produce the effect, as far as possible, of but one voice, and that a sweet one.

One caution, brethren. The most skillful and flourishing choirs are sometimes divided and destroyed, by indulging in personal jealousies, envyings, and differences. This is deplorable in any case, and in Universalists, most disgraceful and inconsistent. We expect that, eventually, "every creature" will unite in songs of redemption, ascribing "blessing and honor, and glory, and power to him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb." If that time shall ever come, all personal difficulties will be laid aside; and how inconsistent for those who thus believe, to refuse to sing praises together in this world. It is poor Universalism to retain hard feelings through life, and lay up quarrels to be settled at the gate of heaven.

"Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry;
We're marching through Immanuel's ground,
To brighter worlds on high!"

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY.

Reader, do you wish to cure your neighbors of that polite accomplishment, called Tale-bearing? If so, be careful and never speak a word or do an act, that you would be ashamed to have made public.

BALTIMORE.

A meeting was held in Baltimore, on Wednesday evening, 20th inst., preparatory to forming another congregation in a new section of the city. It is expected that a numerous congregation will be collected. "Should our expectations be realized," says the Southern Pioneer, "we shall soon have it to say that there are three worshipping assemblies of Universalists in the city of Baltimore." May success crown their efforts.

The discussion which has been in progress there through the winter, between the Rev. J. Brackenridge, Presbyterian, and the Editor of the Pioneer, has done much doubtless towards producing this state of things.—Union.

MISTAKES OF CLERGYMEN.

To every class and condition of mankind, there are attached certain characteristic virtues and vices, propensities and follies—and to the influence of these, equivalent and peculiar benefits and injuries. And from the position held by clergymen, they diffuse a wider influence either of good or evil according as they are wise and good, or weak and vicious, than almost any other class of men. Because their station and profession sanctify all that is upright in their principles and practice, while the real or apparent want of integrity in them, produces a tremendous reaction in the public mind. In pointing out some important mistakes into which clergymen have very generally fallen, we would not be thought to question their sincerity so much as their prudence and discretion. Nor would we disturb the complacency of this class of our fellow-men, nor provoke their unkind feelings, were it not for the visible injuries which they have entailed upon society.

1. By an extreme tenacity for assumed positions, either unimportant if true, or obviously untrue, because indispensable.

Among the numerous instances which might be adduced in support of this particular, a single instance is selected for our purpose. It has long been common for clergymen to maintain—that every word, sentence and sentiment contained in the Bible, was dictated and even written by inspiration. The parade of feeling on this subject should certainly exonerate them from the imputation of insincerity, and this extreme sensibility has no doubt deterred many kind-hearted Christians from ever once examining the correctness of a subject on which their ministers were so very positive.

But there are those in almost every society, who are not so courteous as to believe any sentiment without evidence. The mere dictum even of the clergyman, passes with them for no more than it is worth. And they may perhaps, be so incredulous as to entertain very serious doubts whether the spirit of inspiration accompanied the translation of the Bible into any language. And these doubts will be augmented and confirmed by the clergyman himself—who after repeated assurances that the common Bible is wholly by inspiration of God, very deliberately proceeds to show that many passages are of uncertain import in the original, and that others are absolutely incorrect in the translation. Besides in the course of ministerial labor, it will frequently happen that quotations from, and references to particular parts of the Bible, are made, which do not contain any very prominent evidence of being dictated by the divine spirit. Sometimes it is a matter of plain history, or an abstract from the record of passing events—at others, the malediction of the wicked, or the detail of the deep-laid policy of demoniacal ingenuity and craft.

Now as no sufficient reason can be given why the Deity should inspire either wicked men or devils, to say and do many things which are ascribed to them, so it is equally improbable, that the aids of his spirit were either required or given to enable men to record the events of common history. And there are persons who observing these facts, instead of being convinced of the inspiration of the whole Bible, are led to question the actual inspiration of any part. The infidelity of many worthy men, is thus the result of a mistake of clergymen—a result, which would have been prevented by attaching the aids of inspiration to those parts only of the Bible, which obviously demand a divine interposition. Thus while the gracious promises of God, the doctrine of the prophets, and the great truths of the Gospel contain both internal and external evidences of inspiration; we should not hazard their acceptance by insisting on the necessity of similar aid to secure the relation of the most common events—much less, to make it an instrument of the atrocities of the wicked.

2. Another mistake into which clergymen fall, is an affliction of particular reverence for what they denominate holy time.

There is good reason to believe that most of them know, that they have no authority from the Scriptures for considering the first day of the week, or Sunday, as a day set apart by divine appointment, either for rest or devotion. And however sincere they may be, in believing that the appointment of such a day is suited to the Christian economy, it is preposterous to attempt the support of their views by a “thus saith the Lord.”

The attempt to enforce the observance of a Christian Sabbath on the mere ground of authority, deprives its advocates in some degree, of the only true and consistent arguments on which the plea for its institution at all, can be founded. Because they are not entirely at liberty to change their position, so long as they claim an exclusive and direct authority. And being as they must be, driven from this claim, the public mind will feel diminished confidence in any other. The strenuous efforts which have all along been made for the sanctification of the Sabbath, have led to a blind and superstitious veneration of the day by the more ignorant and credulous part of the community, and an almost total disregard of it by a large portion of the remainder. And this evil is greatly enhanced, by the fact, that many who thus disregard the day, are among the most influential members of society; and their influence goes far, especially in the large towns, in producing a licentious indifference to its devotional objects, among the rising generation.

Besides, as matters are now managed by many of the clergy, some of their Sabbath-keeping friends in order to escape—perhaps public censure—are at times induced to adopt expedients incompatible with moral integrity, and utterly inconsistent with their general professions. A pretended indisposition covers a review of the account-book; and the half closed window blind, while it admits light enough for the occupant within, also admonishes his neighbor of the stealthy violation of the Sabbath. We most solemnly protest against every act of this description. It is a pitiful, and too common act of hypocrisy—but one which has been almost forced upon even upright men, by the indiscretions of clergymen. And it is vain to expect a general reformation of morals, until age and experience shall leave examples of greater frankness and integrity for the consideration and direction of youth.

These evils may be remedied to a great extent, by resting the decent observance of the Sabbath, on the reason and fitness of things. Reasonable men will not, and cannot long resist the unanswerable appeals which are to be made respecting the propriety of a day of rest, and the manifold and lasting moral benefits flowing from its uniform appropriation to the purposes of public devotion.

3. Another mistake of clergymen, is the profession of uncommon devotedness and zeal.

There are various ways, in which this particular feature in the clerical character, is exhibited. But whatever they are, they may be readily distinguished; and may always be referred to the same cause, or the same motive. In a great majority of instances, a staid and inflexible demeanor, or an ever ardent and obstreperous devotion is the index to its existence. And while the former wages an eternal war with all the elements of rational and social cheerfulness—the latter declaims without mercy and without end against spiritual coldness. The one is a monk in temper—the other an enthusiast; and while both have added much to the popular dislike of clergymen, they have introduced and perpetuated evils peculiar to themselves.

But this religious seeming has its fashions; and that anti-social austerity—that fixed and stately gravity which was the prevailing characteristic only a few years since, has now very generally amalgamated with a warmer temperament, and riots in fanatical excitement and presumptuous declamation. Excitement has therefore become the order of the day, and unwearied efforts are continually made to spread its bewildering and contagious animalism over every denomination. The calm, devout and rational piety, which abides through all the days of “good or ill” allotted to man below, is considered too cold and calculating—too dull and lifeless, to merit any other notice than reprobation. The transports of enthusiastic ardor are preferred with all its fitful and short-lived phrenzy, to the sober ability of giving “a reason of the hope,” whose steady light dispels the darkness of the tomb.

We know of nothing except drunkenness, which has brought so many and such fearful evils upon our country as this same furious zeal. It has inspired an unnatural warmth for a season, to be succeeded by an apathy bordering upon the coldness of death. It has thronged the sanctuary with passionate devotees, and filled churches with untaught children and unstable professors, by substituting zeal for knowledge and profession for principle. It has brought confusion and contention into every neighborhood, and discord into nearly every family. It has undermined the health of thousands—driven thousands more to insanity and suicide, and filled the land with blasphemy and irreligion—with mourning and despair.

These evils are too palpable and too prevalent to escape observation. And they are to be traced to that passionate zeal, which has had a place under every form of religion since the creation. Some of its advocates may plead constitutional warmth; but many others urge it only as a matter of expediency—honestly believing no doubt, that the end justifies the means.

Let him who would deprecate the results of religious excitement, beware how he approaches the means. The waters once broken forth, may roll onward with accumulating force, and no longer subject to his control, may carry himself down the common current, with the common ruin.

SAFETY OF THE MAIL.

There is probably no method of conveyance, (for money,) either public or private, that is entirely safe and uniformly certain. Several losses of money, said to have been directed to our address, by mail, have occurred during the time we have been engaged in publishing. But in several of these instances we believe the losses have been occasioned in part by the careless manner in which the money was enclosed and forwarded. But after all, the losses have been, comparatively few by mail—probably the proportion is smaller of losses by mail than by private conveyance. But carelessness in enclosing and directing does not always nor necessarily subject to loss. A few days since we received a letter from a generous friend at Kanawha C. H., Va., enclosing twenty-five dollars, (ten dollars of which was for the Institute, the rest for the paper,) without the least sign of a wafer or any other seal. We give thanks both to him and Uncle Sam; but we hope he will take the precaution on any other similar occasion to seal his letter.

UNIVERSALIST INSTITUTES.

These social, literary and religious associations have doubtless been a means of doing much good, and widely increasing the horizon of happiness of all who have attended on them. It is good often to meet together and exchange sentiments freely. For the want of social sympathy and cheering conversation on profitable subjects, man grows morose and sad of heart; or, anxious to indulge his flowing spirits, he mingles in scenes ill calculated to afford him lasting pleasure, or to administer to the growth of his moral and intellectual nature. Hence, Bible classes, Institutes, Berean societies, etc., are eminently useful in a moral, religious and social point of view, and can be made to minister also to literary improvement, if rightly directed. Every populous place should have some such association where the youthful might meet together and freely act for their own good, and where occasionally the aged might resort to look on with joy at their successors on the stage of life, preparing themselves happily to bear their fathers' burdens and toils.

Can we not form some such an association in this city? There are not lacking numbers—ability—spirit—nor inclination. Union of these is all that is wanting. I notice that in one of these Institutes at the East, females are admitted as members. Would it be advisable to organize on a similar plan here? Or, as our females have now a benevolent association of their own, will the admission of our sisters as spectators be most gratifying and useful to them.

Finally. Will our young men please consult among each other on this subject, ascertain the general sentiment, and call a primary meeting of the most deeply interested, to fix upon some general plan or outline for the organization of such an association? After this, a public notice can be given, and a full and general meeting be held, and the plan be submitted for revision, amendment and adoption. Let us hear soon again of this matter.

THE LITERATURE FUND.

It is seldom I meddle with any matters whatever which are connected with party politics—nor do I intend to do so at the present time, further than I conceive to be consistent with the objects of this paper. Sometime ago a discussion took place in the legislature of this State, on the propriety of excluding a certain academic school from its usual portion or quota of this fund, because political and other principles, inconsistent with the views of the people generally, were taught in it. My mind stopped not at the individual case before it, but recurred to principles. The Literature fund—whose is it? The people's. What is its object? The encouragement of literature in its higher departments. May it be applied to the encouragement of theological, political, abolition or other studies in their higher departments? Not if it is merely a literature fund.

This was one end of the chain. I believe my views are correct. If so, there is no injustice in excluding abolitionism, as a study or science—or party politics of either side, as a study or science—from its fostering support—but the injustice consists in excluding these alone, when that support is extended to many colleges whose theological departments are as obviously not merely literary—not in accordance with the views of the people generally—and which are no more entitled to their several quotas than is the institution here referred to.

The truth is, it is high time that religion and the civil government were fully separated. There is yet too much of the union between Mr. State and Madam Church. The people's money should in no wise be bestowed by civil rulers to advance any theological school. Let them devote it to education, not to the advancement of sectarian—to unsectarian education—to literature—and let every sect support its own theology—every party, its own politics—every combination, its own measures.—That legislator will deserve well of freemen who will carry through a reform of the measures here complained of.

A DISCUSSION

Has for some time been carried on in a Berean association in the Northern Liberties of Philadelphia, between Universalists and Partialists, on the subject of endless misery. Two weeks since, or more, the "pugilistic theologian," as Dr. Ely termed Rev. W. L. McCalla, a Presbyterian clergyman of the old school, (better known as the opponent of Mr. Kneshand in a similar debate some ten years since,) attended and took part in the debate, being confronted by "the evangelist" "of that ilk"—A. C. Thomas. This led to a regular engagement for a debate of the question, "Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of endless misery?" It is probably yet in progress, and it is to be continued from night to night as long as both speakers choose to continue it.

Unless Mr. McCalla has improved very materially in manners and in matter, the match will be much more unequally yoked than were the parties in the discussion with Dr. Ely. Courtesy, charity, candor, truth and argument will be nearly all on one side, and rudeness, abuse, malice, satire, error and assertion on the other. It is however to be ardently desired that Mr. McCalla will come to the point, and stick to the question, and fairly meet all arguments relating to it which his opponent may advance, so that what Dr. Ely neglected by withdrawing too early, may now be fairly attended to. It is a question that must be fully and fairly met by our opposers, and that before long, or the field will be lost to them forever, without a single effort made by them to show them conscious of deserving to retain it. They may rely upon it, that their dignified silence—their one-sided examinations—their quibbling and equivocating discussions—and above all, their slanderous misrepresentations of our sentiments and abuse of our denomination, are rapidly multiplying our numbers and opening the eyes of community to see the right and to follow it.

BR. JOB POTTER.

It is with no ordinary pleasure, though with considerable embarrassment, I deny the report recorded by myself in last week's paper, respecting the decease of Br. Potter. It was a false report—and we bless God it was false—but came to us in no questionable shape. How the report originated we have not certainly learned. We had it from three different ministering brethren, who believed it themselves—being led to credit it by the assurance that it was published in a Cooperstown paper received by a friend in Clinton.

That it is not true will readily and joyfully be believed after reading the following letter.

"Cooperstown, May 1, 1836.

"Br. GROSH—I have received the melancholy news of my death, through the Magazine and Advocate, which found me in tolerable health. I start for Lockport to-morrow morning, and hope to see you in Utica in two or three days, and will then make some further inquiries respecting this mysterious affair. In haste, I remain yet in the flesh, and claim to be your brother in Christ,

"JOB POTTER."

"Rev. A. B. Grosh."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

It is a busy time, and I hope you will excuse a little delay for a short period, when we will again punctually attend to you. To save more trouble and time, take the following.

"A Sister" is very welcome—we hope she will give us the pleasure of hearing from her as often as convenient.

"Notes on Sacred Subjects"—gladly received—they are highly valued by us and we hope the writer will continue them. He will send the articles he speaks of at our expense—private conveyance too seldom offers.

"Brief Criticisms," a new arrival. Br. A. will be heartily welcome to what we intended sending him, one hundred copies of the pamphlet when printed. He may have more if he wants them, for distribution among his friends.

Br. J. Lewis' request shall be attended to.

ASSOCIATIONS.

As many of our preachers wish timely notice to make arrangements to attend several of these bodies, we give the following.

The Central Association meets at Madison—the Niagara, at Ridgeway, Orleans county—the Western Reserve, at Windsor, Ashtabula county, Ohio—all on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June.

The Mohawk Association meets at Leyden, Lewis county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in June.

The Black River Association meets in Watertown on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June.

The Otsego Association meets at Richfield Springs, and the St. Lawrence Association at Columbia village, Madrid, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in June.

The Allegany Association will meet when the committee of discipline may appoint, "one year from the" 24th of June, 1835.

The Union (Pennsylvania) Association will meet at Womelsdorf, Berks county, on the last Saturday in May.

NEW HYMN BOOK,

NOT TO BE PUBLISHED, BUT WITHDRAWN!

Brs. Queal and Montgomery notify the public that, as the price of Streeter's Hymn Book has been reduced, so as to prevent any complaints on that score, and as they wish to preserve the present peace and harmony of our denomination, they withdraw their proposed collection, and shall not publish it. By this withdrawal they make a pecuniary sacrifice, which we hope will be gratefully remembered in their favor—though their doing so is what might have been expected, from their well-known love of the peace and welfare of the good cause.

NOTICE.

One or both of the resident Editors of this paper will be present at the State Convention at Auburn, on the 25th and 26th inst. Any of our former or present patrons wishing to settle arrears or pay for the current volume, will then and there have an opportunity. We hope many from different sections of the State will be prepared to do it, either in person or by some delegate or other person attending from their respective neighborhoods.

STANDING NOTICE.

The Executive Committee of the Clinton Liberal Institute respectfully solicit donations of one dollar, or upwards, from all the friends of unsectarian education, for the use of said Institution.

* * Remittances can be made to this office, by any of our agents, in the same letters containing money for us, and will be paid over immediately to Br. Skinner, and acknowledged in the paper.

EDITORS.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. BODEN at Colliersville—Br. S. R. SMITH at Lyons, Wayne county—Br. Sias at Lowville, and at the brick schoolhouse, East Martinsburg, in the evening—Br. GROSH at Salisbury as the friends may appoint—Br. WAGGONER at Eatonville—Br. BRITTON at South Champaign—Br. NEWELL at Newville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. S. R. SMITH at Victor, Ontario county—Br. C. B. BROWN at South Pompey, Onondaga county, as the friends may appoint—Br. Sias at the shingled schoolhouse, Palermo, and at Jennings's Corners at 5 P. M.—Br. BODEN at Nelson Place—Br. NEWELL at Cortland village—Br. WAGGONER at Russia, and at Newport at 5 P. M.—Br. BRITTON at Evans's Mills, Jefferson county—Br. WHITNEY at Paines Hollow.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. WHITNEY at Marshall as the friends may appoint—Br. WAGGONER at Remsen—Br. NEWELL at Truxton—Br. C. B. BROWN at Toronto, U. C., and the same week in Pickering and Whitby—Br. Sias at Henderson Point at 10 A. M., and at Stony Creek at 2 P. M.

Br. QUEAL will preach at Chicago, Ill., on the first and second Sundays in June next.

The Niagara Association will meet at the Universalist church, at Ridgeway, Orleans county, on the first Wednesday of June next, which will be the first day of June, 1836, and continue in session two days.

It is desired that every society within its bounds send two delegates to represent them in said Association.

N. SAWYER, Standing Clerk.

I wish also to notify our brethren, that I have a quantity of Universalist Books which I shall have with me at the above Association, which will be sold at the first cost of them at Boston, comprising Hymn Books and many other kinds.

N. SAWYER.

NEW-YORK STATE CONVENTION.

The ministering brethren and delegates, who will attend the Convention, on arriving in the village of Auburn, are requested to call at the Western Exchange, from whence they will be directed to their several places of accommodation.

POETRY.

From the Rural Repository.

EVENING DEVOTIONS.

When twilight dews are falling soft
Upon a rosy sea,
I come, my Father, where so oft
Thy child has met with thee.

I come when pleasure's votaries fly
To fashion's giddy fane;
Nor shed a tear, nor breathe a sigh,
To leave the sinful train.

Thou art my Friend, my dearest Friend,
My home thy heaven above;
And the calm hour with thee I spend,
Is that which most I love.

For oh! thy grace has taught my heart,
That youthful life was given,
To seek for Mary's better part,
And tread the path to heaven.

And can I ever wish to share
The noise, the mirth, the strife;
I who can breathe celestial air,
And taste immortal life?

Oh! no, if thou my Father smile,
Thy face to me's so dear,
With Jacob's love my heart shall glow,
And fix my pillar here.

LINES TO HIS WIFE.

BY REG. HEBER, BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.

If thou wert by my side, my love!
How fast would evening sail,
In green Bengal's palmy grove,
Listening the nightingale.

If thou, my love, wert by my side,
My babies on my knee,
How quickly would our pinnace glide
O'er Gunga's mimic sea.

I miss thee at the dawning gray,
When on our deck reclined
In careless ease my limbs I lay,
And woo the cooler wind.

I miss thee when by Gunga's stream
My twilight steps I guide;
But most beneath the lamp's pale beam
I miss thee from my side.

I spread my books, my pencil try
The lingering noon to cheer,
But miss thy kind approving eye.
Thy meek attentive ear.

But when of morn and eve the star
Beholds me on my knee,
I feel, though thou art distant far,
Thy prayers ascend for me.

Ther' on! then on! where duty leads,
O, course be onward still,
In broad Hindostan's sultry meads,
O'er black Almorah's hill.

That course nor Delhi's kingly gates,
Nor wild Malwah detain;
For sweet the bliss us both awaits
By yonder western main.

Thy Lowers, Bombay, gleam bright, they say,
Across the dark blue sea;
But no'er wore hearts so light and gay,
As then shall meet in thee.

JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN DISPENSATIONS.

Mr. Editor.—As you have lately published several pieces concerning the Jewish and Christian dispensations, perhaps the following quotation from the writings of Martin Luther may be interesting to some of your readers.

"Moses is the mediator and lawgiver of the Jewish people alone, to whom he gave the law. If I receive Moses in one commandment, I must receive the whole of Moses. Moses is dead; his government has come to an end; since Christ has come, he serves no longer as a lawgiver. We will regard Moses as a teacher, but we will not regard him as a lawgiver, unless where he agrees with the New Testament and with the law of nature. When, therefore, they hold up to thee Moses with his laws, and would bind thee to observe them, say thus: Go to the Jews with thy Moses, I am no Jew. If I receive Moses in one point, says Paul to the Galatians, I am bound to keep the whole law. For not the least point in Moses applies to us. When now the sectarians come and say, 'Moses has commanded,' etc., do thou let Moses go, and say, 'I care not what Moses has commanded.' But say they, he has commanded, thou shalt have but one God, and in him put thy trust and faith, thou shalt not swear by his name, thou shalt honor thy father and mother, and must not a man observe these commandments? Answer thus: Nature teaches that man should call upon God—it is the law of nature to honor God, not to steal, not to commit adultery, not to bear false witness, etc. Thus I hold the commandments, which Moses gave, not because Moses commanded them, but because they are implanted in me by nature. It is all the word of God; but what of that? I must know and consider to whom this word is spoken. You must not only consider whether it be the word of God, but also to whom it is spoken, and whether it applies to thee or to another. God spoke many things to David and commanded him to do this and that; but it does not apply to me; it is not spoken to me. The false prophets run and say, beloved people this is the word of God. This is true; but we are not the people to whom it was spoken. God hath commanded us to do neither this nor that, which he commanded them to do. Leave Moses and his people with each other. Their time is past. He is nothing to me. I hear the word which concerns me. We have the Gospel," etc.

MR. FARADAY.

Frazer's Magazine gives the following interesting piece of biography.

Mr. Faraday—now anno ætatis 42, at the head of one of the noblest of sciences—honored as the compeer of Cuvier, Laplace and Buckland, was the son of a poor blacksmith, who was apprenticed at nine years of age to an obscure bookbinder in Blandford-street, and earned his bread by that humble calling until he was 22! Mr. McGrath, now Secretary to the Athenæum, happening five and twenty years ago, to enter the shop of Ribeau, observed one of the bucks of the paper bonnet, zealously studying the book he ought to have been binding. He approached—it was a volume of the old Britannica, open at "Electricity." He entered into talk with the greasy journeyman, and was astonished to find in him a self taught chemist of no slender dimensions. He presented him with a set of tickets for Davy's lectures at the Royal Institution; and daily thereafter might the nondescript be seen perched, pen in hand, and his eyes starting out of his head, just over the clock, opposite the chair. At last the course terminated; but Faraday's spirit had received a new impulse, which nothing but dire necessity could have restrained; and from that he was saved by the promptitude with which, on his forwarding a modest outline of his history, with the notes of these lectures, to Davy, that great and good man, rushed to the rescue of kindred genius. Sir Humphrey immediately appointed him an assistant in the laboratory; and after two or three years had passed, he found Faraday qualified to act as his Secretary. The steps of his subsequent progress are well known; he travelled over the continent with Sir Humphrey and lady Davy—and he is now what Davy was when he first saw Davy.

EDUCATION.—Pour in knowledge gently. Plato observed that the minds of children were like bottles with narrow mouths; if you attempt to fill them too rapidly, much knowledge was wasted and little received; whereas with a small stream they were easily filled. Those who would make young children prodigies, act as wisely as if they would pour a pail of water into a pint measure.—Education Magazine.

A gentleman expatiated on the justice and propriety of an hereditary nobility. "Is it not right," said he, "in order to hand down to posterity the virtues of those men who have been eminent for their services to the country, that their posterity should enjoy the honors conferred on them as a reward for such services?" "By the same rule," said a lady, "if a man is hanged for his misdeeds, all his posterity should be hanged too!"

An exchange of good offices is the life of society; a commerce of giving and receiving, fosters all the kind sympathies; the more need we have one of the other, the more likely mutual regard and attachment.

When we preach rather words than matter, they catch people's ears not their souls.—Watson.

Those who are born of God all possess one common nature, and that is a benevolent one. They all love one object. They make a common centre. They all, like so many planets, revolve around the Sun of righteousness. Being perfectly free from selfish affections, they rejoice in each others happiness. Perfect benevolence excludes unfeelingness from their hearts, and pride and malice cannot enter. They ever take the greatest complacency in each other's characters, on account of that unceasing love to God, which will forever reign in their hearts, and be manifested in their actions.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 13th ult., by E. S. Barnum, Esq., Mr. PELETIAH S. EDWARDS, to Mrs. POLLY ANDREWS, all of this city.

In Richland, Oswego county, on January 28, by Rev. C. B. BROWN, Mr. JOSEPH C. FORCE, of Palermo, to Miss CLARISSA DOUGLASS, of the former place.

In Grieg, Lewis county, by Aaron Perkins, Esq., Mr. ALEXANDER HESS, to Miss ELIZA CARTER, both of that place.

In Perrinton, January 14, by Rev. T. Parker, Mr. A. F. CHAMBERLAIN, to Miss A. T. MALONA, all of that place.

In Verona, on the 26th ult., by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. CHARLES L. CURTIS, of Westmoreland, to Miss ALMIRA ROBERTS, of the former place.

In Canajoharie, on March 23d by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. JOHN ADAMS, of Fort Plain, to Miss MARIA WENTWORTH, of the former place.

In Middlebury, Ohio, March 30, by Rev. Mr. Hallack, INCREASE SUMNER, Esq., to Mrs. ELIZABETH MILLER, all of that place.

DEATHS.

In Tully, on March 31st, of dropsy, Mrs. RUTH STRONG, consort of Mr. Ansel Strong, in the 37th year of her age. She was formerly a member of the Baptist church, but by a perusal of the Magazine and Advocate, and carefully comparing its teachings with the Scriptures, she became convinced that "God sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world." In this faith she rejoiced in life—by it she was enabled with fortitude to endure the pains of sickness, and in it she rejoiced as it lit up, before her, the shadows of the valley of death. Those who stood around, though deeming her faith an error, were convinced it could render a dying bed glorious, and make the dying conquer even as they fell.

In Scituate, R. I., April 4th, Mr. JOHN WHIDDEN, in the 70th year of his age.

In Truxton, March 30, JAMES, son of Alexander and Phebe Dorwood, aged 18 months.

The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the bereaved parents and sympathising friends, by the writer, from Eccl. xii: 7. A. K.

In Brownville, April 16th, ALONZO WILSON, son of Henry and Ruth Lord, aged one year and four months. The funeral was attended on the 18th by the writer, and the consolation, which the Gospel so richly affords believers in seasons of affliction, tendered to the bereaved parents and relatives. J. B., Jr.

At Union Settlement, Constantia, Oswego county, of consumption, on the 23d February last, Mrs. MARY HILLS, wife of Mr. Benjamin Hills, in the 45th year of her age. Mrs. H. was a firm and consistent believer in the final "restitution of all things," and died in the triumphs of that faith which was an anchor to her soul. She has left a companion and eight children to mourn her departure, but they "sorrow not" as "others which have no hope." On account of the inclemency of the weather, and the almost impassable state of the roads at the time of her death, the funeral services were not performed until the 7th of April, when the writer of this tendered the consolations of the "Gospel of our salvation" to the mourning relatives, friends and neighbors of the deceased. THE PREACHER.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered in Fulton, Oswego county, February 14, 1836.

BY REV. T. C. EATON.

"Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city." Matt. x: 15.

Most of my hearers are aware that this portion of divine testimony is taken into consideration this afternoon, by the request, indirectly, of a Methodist brother, residing in this village. You are also aware that it is supposed to furnish evidence of future, endless, unmerciful torments, of which the text says not a word; still it is often quoted with an air of triumph as though it established that unlovely theory beyond controversy, and left no ground for debate. I esteem it a great privilege to be placed in circumstances where I can publicly answer those objections that are usually brought against the doctrine of the ultimate restoration of all men to holiness and consequent happiness; and believing, as I do, that this text furnishes no objection to the salvation of all mankind, I cheerfully stand forth in vindication of the triumphs of Christ over all rebellion, believing that he will "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied"—that he will rule and reign until the "last enemy shall be destroyed," until "all shall be taught of God," and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Phil. ii: 11. Let us, therefore, come to a consideration of the subject with those grateful feelings and that respect which its importance requires, and that reverence which divine authority demands.

By referring to the context, the commencement of the chapter, we learn that Jesus "called unto him his twelve disciples and gave them power to heal all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease." He enlightened their minds, deeply imbued their hearts with the spirit and principles of his Gospel, instructed them in the "unsearchable riches" of his kingdom, and disclosed to them many important events that lay buried in the vista of future years. He told of the hardships and trials they would be called to encounter, if they united with him in the great work of moral reformation—that they "should be hated of all nations for his name's sake." He informed them that his claims as the true Messiah would be rejected by the Jews, though "it was necessary that the word of God should first be spoken to them." Acts xiii: 46. He portrayed to their minds, by familiar emblems, in the clearest light, the solemn judgments of Heaven which were about to come upon that nation for the punishment of their crimes, and declared that there should be a time of trouble, such as had never been known since the beginning of the world, and greater than ever should be in any future time. To use our Saviour's own words, "there shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." Matt. xxiv: 21—and again, "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." "These twelve (disciples, verse 5) Jesus sent forth and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." From this we learn that their teachings were confined to the Jews. "And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils; freely ye have received, freely give. And in whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, inquire who in it is worthy, and if the house be worthy, let your peace be upon it; but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you. And whosoever shall not receive you nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet." And then follows the language of our text, "Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city."

Now, to what period did our Saviour allude, when he used the word "judgment" in the text? This is the great question to which your attention is directed. And it will be proper to remark, that there are two opinions on the subject. One is, that it refers to events yet to come—the other is, that it was spoken in reference to those dreadful punishments of God upon the Jews, and that the judgment referred to, was one the disciples expected to see during their life time.

In further treating upon the subject, I propose to give the arguments on both sides of the question, and leave my hearers to judge which are the most conclusive, and which reflect the highest honor upon the character of our heavenly Father.

I. Firstly—It is argued that it must refer to the eternal world, because the text says, it "shall be more tolerable in the day of judgment," etc. But, in reply, I say the argument is without force. Because an event was predicted eighteen hundred years ago as being future, it does not follow that it is still in prospect. We speak of events that are to come to pass during our lifetime, with perfect indifference to the time that is to elapse before they transpire. And if the Saviour spoke of an event that was to happen in his day, it does not necessarily follow that it is yet future. Therefore, this position is proved to be untenable and the argument inconclusive. It proves that the event was future when predicted, but furnishes no evidence that it is so now. Besides, the apostles understood our Saviour to refer to a judgment in their day, when he said, (Matt. xvi: 27, 28,) "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily, I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom."—(John v: 22,) "For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." Where did our Saviour say the scene of judgment should be? You can have his own language to settle the question. "For judgment am I come into the world." "Now is the judgment of this world."

Secondly—It is contended that the judgment referred to in the passage under consideration, must be still future, because the cities that rejected the disciples are declared to receive their punishment at the time Sodom and Gomorrah receive theirs—and both are represented as suffering at a period yet to come. This is undoubtedly the most plausible argument that can be adduced in favor of that sentiment. But does the objector mean to be understood as saying that Sodom and Gomorrah are yet to suffer in the future world? If so, my reply is, that it was the usual manner of speaking by way of comparison: I can show you from Scripture that, when the punishment of a nation, already past, was contrasted with one yet to suffer, their punishments are both expressed in the present tense. Take, for example, Jeremiah's language, Lam. iv: 6; "For the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom, that was overthrown as in a moment and no hand stayed on her." That Jeremiah was contrasting the severe judgments that were to come on Jerusalem some hundreds of years after the time he wrote his prophecy, with the punishments that had long since been endured by the Sodomites, cannot be doubted for a moment, when we read the 10th and 12th verses, and yet they are both declared to be suffering at the then present time—"The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children, they (the children) were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my own people." The kings of the earth and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem."

The city of Jerusalem witnessed the most bloody persecutions of the followers of Christ. There they were dragged before the kings and rulers, and so many were put to death, that our Saviour's language was literally fulfilled, Luke xiii: 33, "It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem." And here was to be witnessed and endured the greatest tribulation since the beginning of the world. The punishment of Sodom is said to be less severe or more tolerable. And what the prophet had said concerning those cities, by way of comparison, in the present tense, our Saviour expressed in the future, as the greater punishment had not then been endured.

No intelligent person will contend that Jerusalem and Sodom were suffering together, the miseries described by the prophet at that time. All acknowledge that he was speaking by way of comparison. This is all we want. If it was consistent for the prophet to speak in this manner, and the Jews understood his language, it would be proper for Jesus, when alluding to the same event, to speak in a similar manner, and his language would be equally well understood by the disciples. Jeremiah looked back through the long vista of time to the period when the solemn judgments of God were poured out on the Sodomites, and brought the frightful scene of their dreadful punishment present before them; then, by prophetic vision, carried his mind in prospect into the bosom of futurity, through the approaching revolutions of time, and saw the still greater punishments that were to come upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and brought their sufferings also present before him, and represented them both as receiving their punishment together, and said, the former is more tolerable than the latter. Now it is certain that this judgment was not to come upon Jerusalem until about thirty-seven years after Christ's crucifixion. But still Jerusalem is represented as suffering with Sodom, at that period. Then was it not perfectly consistent for Christ to carry Sodom into the future, and represent her as receiving punishment with Jerusalem? There can be no good reason given why this argument is not sound and conclusive.

We will introduce the following paraphrase of our text. It shall be considered more tolerable, (comparatively speaking,) for Sodom and Gomorrah than for those cities that reject your mission. At the time God shall punish those cities, the sufferings of the Sodomites will rise up and appear to have been more tolerable—less severe.

II. The most eminent commentators among the Limitarians entertain the same views of this passage that Universalists do. Dr. Clarke says, "the day of judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah, was the time in which the Lord destroyed them with fire and brimstone from the Lord out of heaven." Dr. Hammond paraphrases the text, "I assure you that the punishment or destruction that shall light on that city, shall be such that the destruction of Sodom shall appear to have been more tolerable than that." Bishop Pierce says, "In the day of judgment—i. e., in the day of the destruction of the Jewish state."

I will now refer you to the language of a Limitarian writer, Mr. Sabine, who is known as a public opposer of Universalism, to show that cities and nations cannot be punished in a future state of existence. He says, "Punishment on a people or nation, cannot be inflicted in a future state." "The punishment must be inflicted while their national character exists; in a future state, nations or bodies politic cannot be subjects of retribution."—Here our opinions are confirmed, as well by the comments of celebrated Limitarians, as by the full testimony of Scripture. And it is remarkable that not a single disputed passage can be found in the New Testament, but that the same interpretation is given by some of our opposers that we hold to. These facts ought to have some influence on the minds of inquirers after truth.

III. The judgments that had been poured out on Tyre, Sidon, Sodom and Gomorrah, were events well known to the Jews as signal exhibitions of divine justice upon sin. The inspired writers frequently compared their judgments with the judgments that would fall upon the Jews. They had a lively sense of their sufferings, and to tell them that theirs should be greater, was to magnify the heinousness of their crimes. The sufferings of the Jews in the cities of Judea, particularly in Jerusalem, were beyond the powers of the mind to describe. Josephus, the eminent Jewish historian, says, "Our city, of all those which have been subjected to the Romans, was advanced to the highest felicity, and was thrust down again to the extremest misery; for if the misfortunes of all, from the beginning of the world, were compared with those of the Jews, they would appear much inferior upon the comparison." Again, he says, "To speak brief, no other city ever suffered such things, as no other generation from the beginning of the world was ever more fruitful of wickedness." He also informs us that one million one hundred thousand persons perished in the siege of Jerusalem, through famine, pestilence and war! Jesus said, Luke xxi: 20, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed by armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." He saw fond parents weeping over their children, who were pleading for bread, but no sustenance could be obtained for them. Their cruel enemies surrounded their walls, closed up every avenue, and cut off all supplies, determined to bring upon them the most lingering death by famine and pestilence. Imagine yourself one of that nation, that had assembled at Jerusalem to celebrate the passover, now shut up in that awful prison house, preparatory to the execution of the divine malediction. Pale famine stalks with desolating steps among their ranks, while pestilence diffuses its withering power over the wretched sufferers. Parents and children, brothers and sisters look upon each other in silent, unutterable grief, and behold death—a long, lingering death—advancing in all its blackening horrors. They pour forth their lamentations and implore the protection of Israel's God. But, alas! it was too late. They remembered the kindness that had been proffered them by the Son of God, and how they had spurned him from their presence, when he proclaimed the words of salvation and peace, and taught the morality of Heaven by his pure precepts, his bright and glorious examples, and his spotless life. All these things added pungency to the untold anguish of their minds. Internal divisions arose. Finding no opportunity to vent their rage on their enemies without the city, they commenced the scene of destruction within, and fell to devouring each other, and their national sun went down in blood. The famine raged to such an extent that, Josephus says, "they devoured whatever came in their way; mice, rats, lizards, serpents, even to the spider." He says also, that a Jewish lady was driven by hunger to kill and eat her own child. Thus literally fulfilling the language of Jeremiah—"The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children, they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people." Here was such tribulation as our Saviour said never was and never shall be. On the wings of imagination the mind is carried back, and beholds the awful scene, characterized by nought but the "raging horrors of war, pestilence and famine, madness and revenge, slaughter and death. A scene unparalleled in the annals of the world! O, unfeeling mortal, do you say they ought to have, in addition to these woes, endless pains added in the immortal world?

IV. We have the assurance of the Redeemer, that the sufferings of the Jews, though greater than those endured by the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, shall terminate. Christ by prophetic vision saw the approaching sufferings of his nation and their city. The affecting scene moved so strongly upon his heavenly feelings that, "when he was come near the city, he wept over it." Luke xix: 41. He announces the punishments that were soon to come upon his countrymen. Though commissioned from heaven to pronounce the merited but awful sentence, he cannot do it without intermingling a gracious promise—Matt. xxiii: 37-39, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." Here our opposers leave it, after pronouncing "ye would not," in the most solemn manner, two or three times. But did our Lord leave the subject here! No. He blends with the threatening the "precious promise" of Heaven. "Behold your house is left unto you desolate. For verily I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth," (and does he stop here? No: but adds,) "till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"

Here is a promise that the Jews should be restored. Do you ask when this shall be? I answer, "in the dispensation of the fullness of times," Eph. i: 10—when "every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Isaiah xlv: 23, 24—when the chastisements of Heaven shall have yielded the "peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby." Heb. xii: 11. Paul, speaking of the final ingathering of all Israel, says, Rom. xi: 11-15 and 25-27, "Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid; but rather through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles." "Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness! For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part is happened unto Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved. There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob."

V. Another reason why we cannot believe the chastisements inflicted by "a just God and a Saviour" will be endless, is this—such punishment would frustrate the plan of salvation, if the Deity ever designed the salvation of all. And Methodists will not deny this ground. They declare that "God sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world." 1 John iv: 14. If, then, God purposed to save all, he could not introduce penalties and punishments that would counteract the plan of salvation, without destroying his wisdom. The reason is obvious. Suppose Deity had created only ten individuals, and designed their ultimate and eternal happiness, and secured the means to accomplish it. He could not inflict a punishment for transgression, that would destroy that happiness, without destroying his original plan. He might, it is true, inflict a severe disciplinary punishment, that would secure the obedience of the punished, terminate in the destruction of sin and the salvation of his children, and his original plan remain good.

Again, such endless sufferings would accomplish no good to their unhappy recipients, and not only frustrate the original plan of God, but forever prevent the accomplishment of Christ's mission into the world. That Christ came to save all, cannot be doubted. This was the declared object of his mission. We read that God laid help on one who is "mighty and able to save." And it would be a dishonor to God to believe he ordained a mediator not able to make reconciliation. Perhaps it will be said, it is not for the want of power and ability to save, but because man is a "free agent," and because salvation is conditional. But I would respectfully inquire, has God given man an agency to destroy one of the best plans he ever formed—that of redeeming a world from sin? If so, the probability is, that he will also destroy those plans that are less beneficial to man! But to allow this, (to say nothing about his decrees,) is to charge God with the folly of making arrangements to defeat his own will. And besides, if we allow that God has given man power to defeat his will, and an agency that will seal his own fate in unutterable despair, we also accuse him of making arrangements, at least, to torment his own children eternally. Now, as it respects goodness, I cannot see any difference between decreeing eternal torments, and granting powers and faculties, the exercise of which God knew would bring it about. The latter may be a little more round about way, but the result is equally certain.

And do you also accuse Christ of undertaking to save man on such conditions, as he knew never would be complied with? If you do, then you represent him as the author of an imperfect system; seeking to do a thing in a way in which he knew he should never accomplish it. I cannot allow this. Has man in all his foolishness, undertaken to accomplish an object by means he knew would never allow him to effect it? Not a single sincere attempt can be referred to, in the annals of the world. Nor do I believe the "Saviour of the world" has commenced a work that will never be accomplished. God will carry into effect all his vast and glorious designs. Christ will "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." Isaiah xiv: 24. "The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, surely as I have thought so shall it come to pass; as I have purposed, so shall it stand." God purposed the salvation of the whole world, "spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all." Christ says, John vi: 37-39, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands." John iii: 35. Our heavenly Father raised up his Son Jesus, poured upon him his own spirit of love, light, wisdom, and power, without measure, sufficient to enlighten, redeem and sanctify all mankind—clothed him with such authority, and having the necessary means in his power, hear with what assurance he speaks. "I came down from heaven to do the will of him that sent me," "and this is the Father's will that hath sent me, that of all which the Father giveth me I should lose nothing." Then if he is true to his trust, "his people shall be willing in the day of his power." Not one of the great family of mankind shall be lost, but the last wandering child of our race shall return home, where there is bread enough and to spare.

Such are the hopes and consolations of the Gospel of the grace of God! Illimitable as the goodness of the Infinite—powerful as his omnipotence, and skilful as everlasting and universal wisdom can devise, that Gospel shall spread and run, until all are subdued, enlightened, reconciled, redeemed and saved by its energy, its truth and its love. Nor earth, nor sin, nor hell can withstand it—death cannot limit its power—eternity exhaust its goodness, nor a universe be too great for its salvation.

What honor does such a mode of government reflect upon the character of our divine Creator! Under such an administration, no individual is represented as being a loser by his existence. With these cheering views, which transcend all others in excellence, blended with moral uprightness in our daily deportment, we need not fear the frowns of the self-righteous, who arrogate to themselves all virtue in this life and all happiness in heaven. They will yield their appropriate fruits of salvation and peace in time, and enable the spirit to triumph in the hour of death. Amen.

BRIEF CRITICISMS.....No. III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"No creature can choose a state of misery for itself, because no creature can desire to be unhappy. If any being could choose that state for another, he must be led to it by some motive which may make it eligible or desirable: and this must spring from his envy, jealousy, fear, or a conviction that the wretchedness of the other will contribute to his own happiness. None of these can exist in God, the Creator; consequently, he must be supposed to have made man for happiness. His counsels never change; and therefore, when man had fallen, He provided him a Saviour. This might be naturally expected from his infinite benevolence."—Dr. A. Clarke.

This paragraph was penned by Dr. Clarke, in connexion with the same subject, as that upon which I commented in my last number. It is introduced in illustration of the doctrine of "redemption;" and in it he has seemingly unconsciously, struck another death-blow to that dogma of interminable suffering of which he appears to have been a firm believer. The first sentence above, is a truism, and needs no comment; but the second is worthy of notice. The Dr. declares that if any being could choose a state of misery for another, he must be led to it by some motive of "envy, jealousy, fear, or a conviction that the wretchedness of the other, will contribute to his own happiness." This declaration is both clear and reasonable. Let us apply it. It must be allowed by every candid individual, that when God created mankind, he foresaw distinctly the result of that creation in relation to every being formed; and that if any creatures become endless sufferers, he as certainly knew when he created them, that such would be their fate, as he will when they are actually enduring it. This position cannot be successfully controverted; to deny it, is to destroy all confidence in the wisdom and designs of Deity—to deny it, is to deny the omniscience and omnipotence of God, and to throw all the coming interests of the universe to the control of blind chance—to question it, is to discredit the Scripture testimony, wherein Jehovah proclaims—"I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times, the things that are not yet done."—This point, then, is fully established.

Now, possessed of this perception, this foreknowledge, prior to the creation of man, Deity must have been at liberty to choose one of two courses—he could choose to permit a great proportion of the human race to remain in harmless nonentity, or he could choose to create them for that awful fate of endless woe, which he knew as certainly awaited them as he created! Thus it will be perceived, that the fate of these beings depended entirely upon the choice which God should make. But what choice did he make? Did he choose the latter? Did he choose endless misery for these beings, rather than oblivion? He must have so chosen, if any suffer that doom! But why should a merciful and benevolent God make this terrific choice? Of what horrid crime had these unconscious objects been guilty, that he should awaken them to life, to behold them run into certain, irremediable, and ceaseless agony? Is the Deity an omnipotent misanthrope, that he should thus "curse" his creatures into being? Heaven dispel such a thought! I repeat, that if any created being suffers interminable misery, it must be because God chose that fate for them, in preference to nonentity! No sophistry can avoid this conclusion.

But Dr. Clarke declares that "if any being choose that state [misery for another being], he must be led to it by some motive which may make it eligible or desirable; and this must spring from his envy, jealousy, fear, or a conviction that the wretchedness of the other will contribute to his own happiness."—"None of these," continues the doctor, "can exist in God the Creator." The evident deduction then, is, that as none of these unholy incentives exist in the Creator, he could not possibly have chosen to create man with a knowledge that through that creation they would become the subjects of ceaseless woe! Every impulse of his nature would have arisen in warfare against such a choice. This conclusion is so perfectly obvious, that Dr.

Clarke was compelled virtually to acknowledge it; for he says—"consequently, He must be supposed to have made man for happiness!" At what other conclusion could the mind arrive? If God did not choose to permit man to remain in nonentity; as it is evident he did not; and if he did not choose to create him with the knowledge that he would thus put him upon the high road to endless wretchedness; as it is equally as evident, he could not, in consistency with his own nature; then he could only have formed him to make him endlessly happy.

Dr. Clarke admits that God created the human race to make them happy. This, then, was his express and only design. But in this admission, the Doctor allows all that is necessary to prove universal salvation, as clearly as a mathematical question can be demonstrated. Deity could not create mankind expressly to make them finally happy, without he foresaw and foreknew that they would certainly thus become happy. With the powers and perceptions of Jehovah, any other course would have been a moral impossibility. He could not have created men for happiness, foreseeing that they would through any means, become endlessly miserable. This is a solecism, a perfect contradiction in terms; and to attribute such conduct to God is virtually to charge him with hypocrisy or absolute imbecility. The conclusion, therefore, is unavoidable; that, as God created mankind for happiness, he must have foreknown that they would all eventually experience that happiness; and the foreknowledge of this event in the Deity, rendered it as certain in the creation—makes it as certain now, as it will be, when every son and daughter of Adam shall have commenced the deathless song of glory to God and the Lamb.

Dr. Clarke adds—"His [God's] counsels never change; and therefore when man had fallen, He provided him a Saviour." However we may differ respecting "the fall of man," we shall all agree that God hath "provided him a Saviour." This providing mankind a Saviour, is too often looked upon as a kind of contingent means, a new device, to which Deity was compelled to resort, to carry into effect plans which had previously been frustrated. But if his plans have been frustrated once, what assurance have we that they will not be again. This is evidently a wrong view of the subject. The advent of our Saviour was as much a component part of the original plan of God to create man for happiness, as was our existence upon this earth. And to view it in any other light, is to involve all the designs of God in confusion and uncertainty. Why did the Creator provide mankind a Saviour? Not because any of his previous designs had been thwarted, or in the least degree interrupted; but because they had thus far proceeded successfully and triumphantly—because the time designated in his eternal plan of creation and redemption had arrived, when the promised Messiah should appear and establish his Gospel kingdom—that kingdom into which every member of the human family is to be gathered. The existence of the Saviour upon earth, therefore, so far from leading us to suppose that Jehovah had been frustrated in his previous designs, should rather strengthen our confidence in the stability of his counsels, and increase our assurance, that, in due time, they will all be successfully accomplished.

It is acknowledged, in the above sentence, that God provided mankind a Saviour, because "his counsels never change." Or, in other words, he provided them a Saviour to carry into effect his original design to make them happy. Christ is, therefore, properly styled in the Scriptures, "the Saviour of the world." The express object of his mission was to save the world from their sins—"Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world." Would the wise God of heaven despatch his Son to perform a work which was beyond his power of accomplishment? Would he send him to "reconcile the world to himself," if the world could not be so reconciled? A weak-minded, short-sighted being might so act; but we may rest assured, that the actions of a God of wisdom and power are elevated infinitely above the weaknesses and imperfections of man.

Finally—As the Creator seeth the end from the beginning—as he could not choose an endless state of misery for his dependent beings—as "he must be supposed to have created man for happiness"—as "his counsels never change"—as he has "provided a Saviour" to carry his purposes into effect, and bring the world from their present bondage in sin, to that state of happiness for which he originally designed them—and as frail man cannot possibly defeat the purposes of an infinite God—is there not, therefore, every evidence that a sane and candid mind can require, to convince it that all mankind will eventually participate in the purity and joys of heaven? Let reason answer this question rather than fear, and a knowledge of the truth must be the result.

RELIGION.

Religion, instead of being a social concern with some persons, is vice versa. Its operation upon them, does not expand their bosoms with love and gratitude—but congeals all the finer sensibilities of our nature, and much of the enjoyment of our lives. It causes shades of melancholy to pass over their brow—sharpens their tempers—defects their spirits, and finally, sours and corrupts the whole man. Is this, then, the influence of religion? that religion, which is said to be "good tidings of great joy unto all people?" the consolation of the mourner—the hope of the aged and disconsolate? Must we throw away the honey of youthful charms, the desires and enjoyments of all that nature has in store to feast and enrapture the senses—to regale the imagination—to gratify the taste—and confine ourselves to monkish solitudes, more intolerable than death itself? Are all these privations of the comforts and conveniences of life, the flowery paths through which she leads her votaries? And is this that fountain which satisfies the desires of every thing? No, this is the language of superstition, which is propagated by the advocates of ceaseless torments throughout the wasteless ages of a never-ending eternity—a doctrine at war with the best principles of our hearts—sentiments replete with every baneful tendency. These are they who exclude themselves from all worldly concerns, and set their affections—I forbear to say where—instead of going about and doing good. These exhibit a course of life and conduct, which shows conclusively the fallibility of their views of the attributes of the Being they serve. We frequently hear such persons exclaim, "How wretched that man is, who has no hope of the life to come!" But how much more miserable are they, with the prospect of an endless hell (in that coming existence) before them! An everlasting sleep is preferable to everlasting misery. Let me, for choice, sleep that dreamless slumber, which knows no waking, if one single individual on God's footstool—much less our families and friends—must suffer endless burnings. The cries and groanings of that one individual would mar all the joys of heaven. Talk not of happiness when suffering is near. But to return—religion is not confined to solitude, nor cells. Its influence casts a cheerful countenance on its possessor—and draws out his soul to benevolence. She lightens the afflictions of the sick—visits the fatherless and widow—and tries to make all contented and happy, not in another world, but here, on earth. This is true, pure, and undefiled religion. ASA.

LIBRARIES.

It has been suggested, (but as I fear that that is all that has been done, I suggest it again,) that much good might be done, if each Universalist society would purchase a chosen library of the best Universalist books. Suppose, then, that each society, at its very next meeting, talk over this subject, and raise a collection at once, for this very purpose. Thus a beginning will be made.

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.....No. I.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

"The Lord shall be thy confidence."

As most of our present unhappiness proceeds from a want of confidence in God, I have thought proper to call the attention of the reader, at intervals, to this subject—than which none can be of more importance. From time immemorial it has occupied the minds of religious people, and has been urged upon them by their spiritual teachers as an imperious duty. But notwithstanding much has been said and written on the great duty of trusting in God, little has been done to explain and enforce its obligation, and to meliorate the condition of man.

In order to repose unshaken confidence in God we must view him as our benevolent Father and unchanging Friend. We must believe that his nature is love, and that all his attributes harmonize in this principle. To effect this, the prejudices of the world which have been treasured up in our minds, must be laid aside. False notions of the divine character seem to have established their empire in the human heart; and they have exercised so much control over the spirit and temper of those who are deceived by them, that the only remedy is the force of truth upon the understanding. The most special object of the present attempt, is to contribute something to remove from the mind, wrong views of God and his gracious economy, that the cheerful sun of hope may shine upon the heart and guide us in safety through the short journey of life.

It is sometimes the case that all future good is hidden from our sight by a dark cloud of adversity which hangs over our prospects, and an almost impenetrable gloom gathers round the heart. It is then we look for some arm to lean upon. The world presents nothing to support our sinking hopes. The arm of flesh is powerless and we are ready to say, "all these things are against me," when at the same time,

"The clouds we so much dread
Are big with mercy, and will break
In blessings on our head."

OBJECTIONS TO UNIVERSALISM CONSIDERED.....No. V.
BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

It is sometimes objected to Universalism, that it is not the doctrine of the Bible, because "Universalists do not believe in prayer." This is a very broad assertion, and could it be supported, it would prove our departure from the faith of Christ and his apostles. They prayed for the accomplishment of the divine will, both in public and in private. And I know of no Universalist, who would acknowledge, that he did not believe in prayer, either as a duty or privilege. Whence, then, originated this objection? I answer, that it must have originated in the ignorant and wicked zeal of those, who choose darkness rather than light, and attempt to serve God by bearing false witness against their neighbor.

I think it would be a hopeless task for the objector to undertake to show, that any denomination of Christians believe more in prayer than the Universalists. We pray for all men to be saved from sin and reconciled to God, and we believe in all that our prayers express—that God will graciously answer our petitions and save the whole world. But when Limitarians pray for the conversion and salvation of all men, they do not believe in what their own prayers express. Hence, it will be seen, that though the Universalist and Limitarian pray for the same thing, the former believes in the prayer, while the latter does not. With what show of propriety or justice, then, is it affirmed, that Universalists do not believe in prayer?

True, Christians may engage in this solemn exercise from a variety of motives. Some may hope to produce a change in God, and cause him to be more propitious, more merciful, and more willing to save and bless the sinner, than he otherwise would be, without our supplications. I acknowledge, for one, that I do not believe prayer will ever accomplish such an object. And my reasons are, first, because God is infinitely good, and, therefore, it is absurd to suppose a possibility of any change for the better in his character; and, second, he is unchangeable, and will eternally do that which is agreeable with his own infinite good will, whether we pray for, or against it. Hence, I do not believe in prayer, as a mean to make the unchangeable Deity any better; but I believe in prayer, as a religious exercise, most happily calculated to make man better and happier.

We are changeable beings, and affected by circumstances, either for our good or for our injury. Many objects allure us from the path of virtue, while others inspire our hearts with holy resolutions, and preserve us from actual transgression. Among those that have this healthful influence over our conduct and peace, the benevolent character of our Father in heaven, is the most powerful. Therefore, as the exercise of prayer brings the infinite goodness of God and our constant dependence upon him to our minds, it is, at once, salutary in its effects, and good for us to pray. It avails much for us and for others; and were there no law, human or divine, requiring us to pray, our own good, and the good of mankind, would be an argument in favor of its utility, worthy of a sober consideration.

But, however necessary prayer may be for individual or public good, there are certain forms and modes of prayer in common use that have not this tendency. And there are also cases in which men deviate from the spirit of the Gospel, being inclined to abuse or insult their less pious neighbors, or misrepresent the character of God, praying for their own wills to be done, however opposed it may be to the will of Heaven. I have often heard people pray for the salvation of all men, and for the overthrow of Universalism, in the same prayer. Such a prayer is inconsistent with itself; and if, because Universalists object to such inconsistencies, they must be set down as opposers of prayer, we shall claim the right to correct the injustice of such a proceeding. I am a friend to prayer, but not to the abuse, which I have heard heaped upon me for no other cause, than that I was a Universalist, under the name of prayer. If this be an objection to the religion I profess, I acknowledge that I have no peculiar anxiety to silence it, at the expense of what is clearly just and right.

PENALTY OF THE LAW.....No. II.

Some time has elapsed since we made a proposition to our friend Pomeroy, of the Presbyterian school, that if he would produce one solitary passage from the Scriptures, stating that the penalty of God's law was endless sufferings in hell, as he had previously asserted; I would forthwith renounce Universalism and give my support to him and his doctrine. The passage has not yet been presented. I therefore take it for granted, that such a passage cannot be produced, and that it therefore lies not in the power of our friend to find it.

We will now offer some reasons why we think God would never attach such a penalty to his law. The first is, because God being possessed of infinite wisdom never would, attach a penalty to his law, which, if executed, would make void his promise, or change "the truth of God into a lie." In the first place, God promised that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, Gen. iii: 15. This seed of the woman, the Scriptures inform us, is Christ, Gal. iii: 16. It is the seed of Abraham. In this seed (Christ) God promised to bless all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth, Gen. xii: 3, xviii: 18, xxii: 18, xxvi: 4, and xxviii: 14; Psalms lxxii: 17, and Acts iii: 25. Well; what is it to be blessed in Christ? The Scriptures abundantly show that it is salvation from sin and all its consequences. It is to be made alive in him, through the power of his resurrection, and clothed upon with life immortal. This, it is generally admitted, was the principal object of Christ's life, death, and resurrection. This was the blessing promised in Christ, by Jehovah. "Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness." Gal. iii: 6. He believed that what God had said was true. "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God. And being fully persuaded that what he had promised he was also able to perform." Rom. iv: 20, 21. It will not do to say that God made this promise to Abraham—to bless all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth in Christ—if they would all believe it. "No." The language to Adam and to Abraham is unconditional and unequivocal. There are no ifs about it. The promise being an unequivocal fact, it follows of course that God would not give man a law, and then attach a penalty thereto that must of necessity render this promise void. And if God had ever attached such a penalty previous to the promise, is it reasonable to suppose he would ever have made the promise? But Jehovah made this promise, and confirmed the same with an oath. Here is the promise and the oath. "Two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie." Heb. vi: 17, 18. The promise is, that all the families of the earth should be blessed in Christ. But if the penalty of God's law be endless suffering in hell, and that penalty should be inflicted, how could the subject of that promise be blessed in Christ? But suppose none are to be blessed in Christ except those that believe. What is the consequence? Why this: all those who do not believe must endure the penalty of the law, which is endless sufferings in hell. Well; carry this a little further. Suppose none believed but Abraham. The consequence would be, all the families of the earth must endure "endless sufferings in hell!" But for what? Because they did not believe the promise, as Abraham did, that in Christ all the families of the earth should be blessed, i. e. because they did not believe a lie, which, of course, must be a lie, if the penalty, "endless suffering in hell," be a truth. We see the inconsistency in which this system is involved. The amount of it is this: that the unbelief of man destroys the faith and veracity of Jehovah! Thousands of the families of the Gentiles, and tens of thousands of the Jews have not believed. What is the consequence? Must this unbelief destroy the faith of God in the promise? So it would seem, if the popular theology be true. But what says Paul? These are his words—"For what if some did not believe? Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? God forbid. Yea, let God be true, but every man a liar, as it is written that thou mightest be justified in thy sayings." Rom. iii: 3, 4. In this promise the faith of God is pledged. But shall the unbelief of any make the faith of God without effect? Paul says, No, God forbid. This promise another apostle calls "the record that God gave of his Son." In his Son God promised that all the families of the earth should be blessed. "This is the record, (says the apostle John,) that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." He that believeth not this record, that God gave of his Son, the apostle says, "hath made God a liar." Here the unbeliever is charged with making God a liar, because he does not believe the record, that he has eternal life in the Son. But how, I would ask, has his unbelief done this, if it be a fact, "that endless suffering in hell" is his portion? Does his denying that he has eternal life in the Son make God a liar, when he has not eternal life in the Son, but "endless sufferings in hell!" Instead, therefore, of its being a truth, that he has eternal life in Christ, according to the record and promise, it is a falsehood, and the truth is, he has "endless suffering in hell," which, as friend Pomeroy says, is the penalty of God's law. If this is a truth, I do not see how the unbeliever treats God as a liar. Perhaps our friend would say, the unbeliever has eternal life in Christ, if he believes it, i. e. it is in Christ, ready to be bestowed as soon as he believes it—but if he disbelieves it, it will not be bestowed. This is the last explanation I can make out with even the appearance of plausibility? Though at first thought, it might be deemed plausible, yet after all, it is, but moonshine. The truth is, whatever may be said of belief or unbelief, Jesus is the author and finisher of faith. Heb. xii: 2. And to make the condition of eternal life, or the bestowment of it, to depend on faith, is no more nor less than making it depend on the bestower—Jesus the author and finisher of faith. The truth is, God is the Saviour of men, and he (not they) will have the glory. Paul could say in truth, "By the grace of God I am what I am." Paul well knew that the truth of God's promise depended not on the belief or unbelief of frail man, "But as God is true, (says he to his Corinthian brethren,) our word to you was yea and ay." For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me, and Sylvanus, and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in high was yea. 2 Cor. i: 18, 19. This was Paul's view of God's word and promise—but the preaching of the present day is, God's promises are yea, if you believe, but if you do not believe, they are ay. That is, if you believe the promises of God in Christ, they are true—they are yea. If you do not believe them, they are false—they are ay. But Paul says "All the promises of God in Christ are yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God by us"—verse 20. It is evident from Paul's reasoning, that in what God has promised will not fail, whether man believes or not. Hence he says, "if we believe not, yet he abideth faithful, he cannot deny himself"—2 Tim. ii: 13. If God has promised to bless all the families of the earth in Christ, he will not render that promise void. "He cannot deny himself." This we think is one good reason why "endless suffering in hell" never was a penalty of God's law. We have several other reasons, but must reserve them for another communication. A. C.

THE WATERER... No. VIII.

EXAMPLE.

"Only let your conversation be as it becometh the Gospel of Christ."

We now proceed to consider the most important requisite, in order to the growth and prosperity of a religious society. It is, that the conduct of those engaged in it, be without reproach. In this case, success is certain, even though their means may be limited.

Let a few believers in the restitution attempt to organize and upbuild a society in any place; and "only let their conversation be as it becometh the Gospel;" they shall be upright in their intercourse, temperate in their habits, chaste in their language, amiable in their manners, and devotional in their feelings; and though they may number but half the little band that followed Jesus through Judea—though compelled, from poverty, to worship in a common school-room, or even shut out from that, by the prejudices of community, and obliged to worship in a barn—though destitute of a choir, and though their preacher may be a man unlettered and of feeble tongue, yet they will succeed.

Prejudice may rage for a season, and bigotry may be in arms to crush the infant band; but the one will be subdued and the other ashamed; and good men will begin to say, "Now, whether right or wrong, these folks are Christians." Their walk and conversation show that they have been with Jesus. Let us go then, and hear what can be said concerning this sect, which is every where spoken against.

Now, the moment the good and candid can be brought to hear, the work is done. "Faith comes by hearing;" and then the Gospel, which is the "power of God unto salvation," comes down upon the stony heart of opposition, like the sledge upon the flint-rock—breaking it in pieces and subduing it.

But, on the other hand, let the same enterprize be attempted by six individuals of an opposite character: the first shall be a corrupt, dishonest man, a knave and swindler—the second, a man uncharitable, hard hearted, cold, inhuman and unfeeling—the third, an infidel, an open reviler of and scoffer at all religion—the fourth, an intemperate man, a tippler, and a tavern-haunter—the fifth, a foul-mouthed, obscene, vulgar, and profane man, and the sixth, a lewd, licentious, incontinent debauchee; and they shall have the wealth of the East India company—they shall erect a temple as splendid as St. Peter's at Rome, or St. Paul's at London—they shall employ a chorister whose talents rival those of Handel—they shall have a preacher as profound as Butler and as learned as Blair, with the eloquence of a Whitfield and the zeal of a Paul, and yet they will fail.

People will say, "We have not heard this preacher, nor the new doctrine whereof he affirms; but we can form an estimate of the character of the man, by the company he keeps; and in regard to his doctrine, we want no better criterion than its practical influence, as manifested in the conduct of those who are its advocates."

Such members of religious society, "shut up the kingdom of heaven against men," and bring the cause of truth into obloquy with the world. Therefore I beseech you, brethren, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity." APOLLOS.

MORALITY OF ATHEISM.

Are we under any moral obligations if infidelity be true?

The above question forced itself upon my mind, on hearing a skeptic plead morality with much earnestness, and led me to the following reasoning which I submit for publication if worthy.

Does not man in denying the existence of a Deity, deny also moral obligation? for if we are answerable to no laws but human, we have no criterion to judge what is right and what is wrong. In such a case, one man's authority to say what is right, and what is not, is equal with another's. If man may say "thou shalt not murder," man may also say "thou shalt murder;" and has not one the same right to enforce his command, as the other? Upon what authority does man say to his fellow-man, "thou shalt clothe the naked, feed the hungry, administer to the sick, cleanse thyself from all iniquity, deal justly and love mercy." Are the evidences of nature sufficient to teach him this? Does he learn it from winds, and waves, and storms, and thunder and lightnings—from trees, and shrubs and plants—from flowers and fruits? Or, ascend one link higher, does he learn it from the beasts of the field, or the fish of the sea? But the deist will say I believe in a God. Yes, but he denies all revelation, direct or indirect, which is tantamount to the denial of a God, as it regards moral obligation. Does merely our having a Creator, if he has made no revelation of his will, purpose or design towards us, teach it? I cannot see why duty is better taught, in having a Creator without a revelation, than in being the work of chance. Upon what foundation, then, do infidels rest moral obligation? A SISTER.

UNCHASTITY.

The late murder of an unchaste female in New-York city, has opened the eyes of many persons to see this vice in its proper light, and to examine into the immense train of evils which unavoidably result from it. Among the many plans proposed for the suppression of it, none in our opinion has been more futile, and even injurious, than the formation of Moral Reform, or Seventh Commandment associations. Not to say anything of the indelicacy and impropriety of circulating pledges on this subject among the chaste and virtuous, their publications have formed too frequently a directory for the base and vicious to the haunts of profligacy, or paved a way to the introduction of the subject for the vitiation of pure and innocent hearts.

Let, then, some other mode be tried. Bring individual energy and influence to the task of purification. Commit the subject to those who are most deeply interested in the reform, and whose age, and experience, and tried virtue, and deep-rooted horror of the abomination and its desolations, will effectually secure them from being conquered in their efforts to triumph over the destroyer. And let them act promptly, vigorously, and continually against the evil, as if the ultimate result of the whole contest depended on the efforts of each individual alone.

And let them act in the might and majesty of the law. This wheel-within-a-wheel mode of action, which has so generally obtained in this age of combinations of combinations, is inconsistent with the character of our government, and with the genius of Christianity. It betrays a want of confidence in both, and implies that a society or a combination of societies, is more effectual than the body of the people—that a pledge is better than a belief of the Gospel, and that the influence of a few Colonels, Esquires and Judges is more powerful than the majesty and voice of the people embodied in a law. Hence the Gospel is forsaken as a means of reformation, and "sign our pledge" is pressed on the minds of men and women as the great reforming process. The law is neglected, and its penalties laughed at of course, provided the censure of a few individuals can be escaped.

Now these remedies, though they may sometimes do a partial good, must eventually inflict a general evil. Our political morals will become rather a matter of expediency than law, and the laws falling into neglect, become useless. Hence we say, let the laws respecting vice and immorality be kept continually in view—let their penalties be enforced—let their voice be heard mingled in all our threats and entreaties to and with those who are inclined to violate their wholesome provisions. If those penalties are too severe, moderate them—if too mild, increase them. If the law is deficient, amend it—if useless, repeal it—or if there be no law, let every man interested in supporting good morals, petition our public servants to pass one suitable to the crime and our wants.

And lastly—as the greatest remedy—let every man, woman and child, from henceforth and forever, place both sexes on a perfect equality in this, as in all other vices. Treat the man as the woman is treated—let the seducer be excluded from favor and respect as the seduced now is—and let the frequenter of the haunts of profligacy be viewed in exactly the same light in which the prostitute is now viewed, and the work will be performed. Public opinion has long been morbid on this subject—morally unsound, and females (I regret to say it, but it is too true) have been foremost in the evil, and dearly, bitterly have many of them suffered on account thereof. They have turned with scorn and loathing from the miserable victim of seduction, to smile and languish on the seducer. They have spurned the impure with disgust from their presence, as if contamination was in the very sight of her, and sat down by the side, and kindly returned the pressure of his hand, or drank in the flattering words of his lips, who made that poor wretch what she is, and who consorts with her and her associates! Is it any wonder, then, that vice has flourished, and that the laws against it are a dead letter, when its prime ministers are thus flattered and encouraged? These things must not any longer continue among us. The associates of the impure must be treated as such let them belong to which sex they may—and the seducer must learn that favor, if any, must be extended to the seduced rather than to the author of the evil—be that seducer male or female. Let these things be done—let those who indulge in such things be excluded from making and judging our laws, that the laws may be made what they should be, and then enforced strictly, and not only this, but all kindred vices must sink before the power of the laws of our country—the embodied majesty of a free and virtuous people. A. B. G.

REASONS.....NO. XI.

FOR BELIEVING IN UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

"Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter iii: 15.

Having argued the doctrine of universal holiness and happiness on the ground of the admitted character of God, and on that of the advent, character, doctrine, precepts and labors of Christ, we shall proceed to the Third general division, viz. To consider some of the most plain and direct scriptures bearing on the subject. For however clear and forcible may be the argument adduced under the former divisions, still, if the general voice of the Scriptures be against, or be not directly in favor of the doctrine, people will be (and indeed ought to be) slow to believe it. We profess to take the Bible as the rule of our faith and practice; and if that be against our faith, we are in duty bound, on ascertaining the fact, to renounce either the one or the other. But if on the other hand, the Bible fully and clearly teaches the doctrine, we ought to cling to it, sustain, defend, propagate and exemplify it by every laudable and judicious means. We say, "To the law and the testimony: if they speak not according to these, it is because there is no light in them." We profess to receive no doctrine but what can be proved by a "Thus saith the Lord." And if reason, common sense, philosophy, correct logic from allowed premises, benevolence and the prayers of all good people, are all decidedly against the doctrine of endless misery, and in favor of that of universal holiness and happiness, who shall longer question the truth of this latter sentiment? Or in other words, "if God be for us, who can be against us?" Let us examine then attentively a few of the many passages of Scripture bearing on this important subject. We believe in universal salvation

1. Because God is the Creator of all men, and would never have created them to hate or render them the endless losers by their existence. "Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?" "And hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth?" "For thou lovest all things that are, and abhorrest nothing which thou hast made; for never wouldst thou have made any thing if thou hadst hated it." Mal. ii: 10. Acts xvii: 26. Wisdom of Solomon xi: 24.

2. Because God alone is the rightful proprietor and owner of all men, and would never suffer his property to be irrecoverably lost and fall into the hands of his enemies. "Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the Father, so also the soul of the son is mine." "For of him, and through him, and to him are all things; to whom be glory forever." Ezek. xviii: 4. Rom. xi: 36. This last text is thus rendered and paraphrased by Dr. A. Clarke: "Of him, as the original Designer and Author; and by him, as the prime and efficient Cause; and to him, as the ultimate end for the manifestation of his eternal glory and goodness, are all things in universal nature through the whole compass of time and eternity—To whom be glory. And let him have the praise of all his works from the hearts and mouths of all his intelligent creatures forever, throughout all the generations of men. Amen, so be it; let this be established forever!" Com. in loco.

3. Because God wills the salvation of all men.—God our Saviour—will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." 1 Tim. ii: 3, 4.

4. Because God inspires the hearts of all good men to pray for this glorious end. "I exhort therefore, that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions and giving of thanks be made for all men—For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God," etc. "Thy will be done," 1 Tim. ii: 1, 3. Matt. vi: 10; xxvii: 39. Luke, xxi: 42.

5. Because Jesus came to do or accomplish the will of God. "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing but should raise it up again at the last day." "Then said I, Lo, I come

(in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will O God," "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." John iv: 34; vi: 38, 39. Heb. x: 7.

6. Because none can defeat the will of God—it shall certainly be accomplished. "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" "He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." John xvii: 4. Dan. iv: 35. Eph. i: 11.

7. Because God has no other will than that above expressed and clearly revealed; and he will never have a different will. "He is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth." "He is without variableness or the shadow of turning." Job xxiii: 13. James i: 17.

8. Because it is God's pleasure, as well as his will, that all should be saved and come unto a knowledge of the truth. "For thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." "For the Lord taketh pleasure in his people: he will beautify the meek with salvation." Rev. iv: 11. Ezek. xxxiii: 11. Ps. cxlix: 4.

9. Because God's pleasure shall be accomplished. "My counsel shall stand and I will do all my pleasure." Christ came to accomplish the pleasure of the Most High, and the prophet declares, "the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand." "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." Isa. xli: 10; liji: 10; and lv: 10 11.

10. Because God's purpose accords with his will and his pleasure; and that purpose shall certainly be accomplished. "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fullness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." "The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand—For the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it? and his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?" "I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it. I bring near my righteousness; it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry; and I will place salvation in Zion for Israel my glory." Eph. i: 9, 10. Isa. xiv: 24, 27; and xlvii: 11-13.

COLEMAN'S SERMON.

A sermon by Rev. E. B. Coleman, A. M., pastor of the Methodist society in Pembroke, Genesee county, attempting to prove the endless misery of the wicked, has been kindly forwarded to us, and should have been noticed ere this, but for the press of business incident to the season—for Editors have families to attend to as well as papers.

We have been requested to notice his criticisms on the word hades. He seems to intimate that Universalists contend that it means literally, the grave. To this we give a flat denial. If he will read Balfour's First Inquiry, he will find our denial made good. The English word nearest in meaning to hades, is grave. The word hell originally expressed the exact meaning of hades, for it originally denoted a hidden, concealed place—the place of the dead. Mr. Coleman admits that in one place only it means hell as that word now is understood. Dr. Campbell, certainly as good a judge as Mr. Coleman, says it does not mean hell, as that word is now understood, in a single case! He may therefore argue that single case with this eminent Scottish commentator.

In relation to Gehenna Mr. Coleman takes the best course a bad cause will allow—he asserts boldly, and carefully avoids giving what he cannot find any where, proof of the truth of his assertions. He says, of the word Gehenna, it "has but one sense, and that is literally hell, or endless misery!" This is the first time we ever heard or read this positive and unqualified assertion from any person possessing any knowledge of the originals of the Scriptures. Every Partialist commentator I have ever read, either by extract or in bulk, probably twenty or thirty in number, including Drs. Clarke, Campbell, Macknight, Lightfoot, and others, unanimously agree in stating that Gehenna is derived from two Hebrew words signifying the valley of Hinnom, and that it was only in process of time, that it came to be gradually applied to mean anything else. What it was gradually applied to mean is the point in dispute. We say it was made an emblem of the destruction of the Jewish State, and refer to the Bible for proof—they say it was made an emblem of a place of misery after death, and refer to Jewish fables and nonsense, (Talmuds and Targums,) written after the days of Christ, for proof. But even if their proof was valid and ours false, all this would not prove that Gehenna meant endless misery. The duration of misery in Gehenna, cannot be proven or signified by the mere name of the place in which that misery is inflicted.

Such, then, is the candor and honesty of Rev. Eliphalet B. Coleman, A. M.! He cannot plead ignorance of these facts to shield his misrepresentations.

Another sample. "Now damnation in our language, both according to Walker and Webster, means a sentence to endless or eternal punishment. The Saviour, therefore, [a non sequiter,] says to them, [the Scribes and Pharisees—Matt. xxiii: 33,] 'How can ye escape the endless misery of the eternal pit?' What a miserable, uncandid, dishonest subterfuge! Did Jesus use the English word, "damnation," even admitting that that word does mean what Webster and Walker say it does? No; and Mr. C. knew he did not—and knew, further, that the word Jesus did use, means simply judgment or condemnation!

But, look again at the sentence—he makes "damnation" to mean "endless misery;" and says Gehenna means "endless misery." Why not assert, then, that Jesus said, "How can ye escape the endless misery of endless misery?" But no, to suit his convenience, Gehenna now means "the eternal pit!"

The whole sermon is of a similar character—full of bold false assertions—perversions of the language and, meaning of the Bible, and uncandid appeals to the prejudices of the people, mingled with a smattering of learning and a show of fairness the better to impose on their credulity.

As to the eternal controversy, he offers nothing that has not been repeatedly refuted. The same may, indeed, be said of nearly the whole sermon. We therefore quit it for the present.

DRAFTS.

Drafts, payable to our order, on any good houses in this city, or New-York, (or small notes, when drafts can not be had,) will be received in payment of subscription to this paper.

If more convenient, drafts on any merchant or banker in Philadelphia, for money due us, may be forwarded to Ev. A. C. Thomas, 132 Chestnut-street, Philadelphia, payable to his order—or on any house in New-York, may be sent to P. Price, No. 2 Chatham Square, New-York, payable to his order. As these brethren are well known, and are our General agents, there can be no doubt the business entrusted to them will be well and promptly attended to.

Subscribers to the Union will particularly find this arrangement advantageous, as we are also appointed agents for that paper.

THE RECORD.

MEETING-HOUSES.—Br. G. N. Cox writes Br. Davis that the friends in Elizabethtown, Va., are about building a meeting-house in that place. He adds that there are friends enough in Elizabethtown and Wheeling to support preaching the whole of the time. The friends in West Amesbury, Mass., have raised the necessary funds for building their house of worship, and those in Southold, Long Island, have put theirs under contract, and commenced the building.

SOCIETIES.—We cannot record the formation of any new societies since our last, but what is equally as encouraging, we can state the great prosperity of several old ones. In Lynn, Mass., the increase has been so great as to warrant the purchase of a lot of ground with the design of erecting on it another meeting-house next year for the colony that may then be set off from the first society. A large and active Berean society has lately been organized here. In Methuen, same State, the society have been enabled to increase their amount of preaching from one half to the whole of the time. In Albany, the society has always been prudent and energetic, and therefore prosperous; but lately it has prospered more than usual. Thirty members were added on the last Sunday in March, and a number more were preparing to join. In Baltimore city, our friends are making exertions to sustain regularly, preachers for three congregations. We hope they may succeed, but fear they are overhasty and may produce a failure and a reaction which must be injurious.

PREACHERS.—We have the pleasure of recording some more conversions and additions in the ministry of reconciliation. Rev. Silas Russel, of the Freewill Baptist connexion, Brighton, Maine; and Rev. George N. Cox, of the Methodist connexion, Elizabethtown, Marshall county, Va.; and Rev. Benjamin Gass, formerly of Pennsylvania, now of Cincinnati, Ohio, all have been brought to a knowledge of the truth, and commenced its proclamation. And Mrs. Thompson Baron, — Galaca, of Boston, and J. Nichols, of Hingham, Mass., have lately commenced preaching the Gospel of impartial grace. A letter from Dr. Benton says that "Br. Stephen P. Landers has commenced preaching the doctrine of universal reconciliation. He is a young man of excellent moral worth, and good acquirements, and preaches very acceptably."

REMOVALS.—Br. D. Forbes, from Chester, Vt., to Norridgewock, Me. Br. William Frost, from Hiram to Bridgton, Me. Br. R. S. Pope, to Sterling, Mass. Dr. C. L. Gilson, from Stoddard to Rockingham, Vt. Br. Moses Ballou, from Bath to Portsmouth, N. H. Br. H. Boughton, from Auburn to Scipio, both in Cayuga county, N. Y. Br. G. S. Ames, from Tully, Onondaga county, N. Y., to Sheshequin, Bradford county, Pa.

MARYLAND CONVENTION.—Met in Baltimore on the 27th of April. Mrs. L. S. Everett, Moderator, and J. Wills, Clerk. Appointed a committee to revise the Constitution, who reported, and their labors were adopted before the close of the session. Bra. Everett and Fisk were chosen delegates to the Southern Convention—Everett, Knapp and Wills, the Standing Committee, (of correspondence and discipline,) and McCune, Secretary for the ensuing year. Circular letter by Br. Knapp. Preachers present—Everett, Fisk, Knapp, Wills, Miller, S. P. Skinner, and McCune.

A resolution disapproving the erection of a Theological Seminary was introduced, debated, and passed; but afterwards reconsidered, and a resolution substituted declaring it inexpedient to act on the subject.

The Essex county Quarterly Conference held a session in Danvers, Mass., on April 20th. The meetings were well attended—four sermons were delivered—a concert of praise held—and nineteen preachers were present. A. B. G.

The article on comets and eclipses, on our last page, proved so much longer than we had calculated it to be, that we are obliged to defer several obituary notices until next week.

PARTIALIST.

Ah! let me see—an article from Br. Drew's pen in reply to mine on this word. Hum—hum—m—Why he cannot, surely he cannot have read my article; for he uses the very objection there noticed and answered, as if I had not even named it! Limitarian—hum—"but even that is not correct"—why! where's the rest of it? Well, now, if this doesn't just beat even a more emy thing! Here's an Editor finds fault with every name used to designate the mass of believers in endless misery; this won't do—and that won't do—and Limitarian is the best word after all, and even that is not quite correct—and there he breaks off the article as short as a pipe stem, leaving all his readers sticking neck deep in the mud of doubt and difficulty. Come, come, Br. Drew—I could have found fault almost as well myself, but where's the remedy? A. B. G.

INFORMATION WANTED.

It often happens that we receive notices from Postmasters, agents and others, that certain of our subscribers have ceased to take our papers, or have removed to parts unknown. In some cases the information is not correct, and needs contradiction. Persons thus wrongly reported will please inform us of that fact, and blame the reporter, not us. In other cases, the subscriber may have neglected to give us notice—or may have designed to defraud us out of our pay. We do not intend to judge their motives, but publish the amount due, in connexion with their names, that our agents in those places where they have moved to, may respectfully request them to pay what they owe us, and receive their further orders, if they have any to give, respecting the continuance and transfer of the paper to them.

The list will of course contain all classes—from the wrongly reported, down through the careless and forgetful, to the dishonest subscriber who intends to cheat us out of our dues. But we shall deem every man named to be innocent, until neglect of this call, or other evidence proves him guilty.

S. H. Turner, Lyons—Postmaster says he has left the place. He owes us and Br. Skinner to the amount of $7.00.

Martin Kellogg, Milford—Postmaster says he has left the place. He owes us $0.67.

Prosper McCraney, Genoa—Postmaster says he has gone to Michigan. He owes us and Br. Skinner

$3.16.

Our friends or agents who may chance to see either of these persons in their new residences, will please inform them of the state of their accounts, and when collected, forward the money to us.

ASSOCIATIONS.

Each society in the bounds of each Association in this State, should send two delegates to represent it in the council. A certificate signed by the clerk of the society, is sufficient evidence to admit them.

Each delegate should prepare himself to state when the society he represents was organized, with what number of members, its increase and prospects, what portion of time it enjoys preaching, etc. Ten minutes devoted to this purpose, at any meeting of the society, will amply suffice to gather all the information here required.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Summer term of the Institute will commence on Wednesday the 25th inst., under the charge of the former able teachers in the same.

A competent assistant has been added to the Ladies' school.

Br. S. R. Smith, General Agent for the Institute, will be at Lyons, Wayne county, about the third Sunday inst., and at Victor, Ontario county, about the fourth Sunday inst., and will receive donations wherever he may travel in those and other western counties, from one dollar and upwards to any amount which the generosity and public spirit of the well-wishers of unsectarian education may induce them to bestow.

AGENTS.

Br. Seth Doubleday, and Br. Boden, of Cooperstown, will attend to the transaction of all business connected with our paper, in that quarter, in the stead of Br. Potter, who has removed to Lockport.

Br. Potter will continue his services as our General Agent, in his new region of labor and travel.

Gen. Robert Adams, of Livonia, will act as agent for this paper in that region.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. S. R. Smith at Victor, Ontario county—Br. C. B. Brown at South Pompey, Onondaga county, as the friends may appoint—Br. Sias at the shingled school-house, Palermo, and at Jennings's Corners at 5, P. M.—Br. Boden at Nelson Flats—Br. Newell at Cortland village—Br. Waggoner at Russia, and at Newport at 5, P. M.—Br. Britton at Evans' Mills, Jefferson county—Br. Whitney at Paines Hollow—Br. Biddlecom at Fort Plain—Br. T. J. Whitcomb, of Schenectady, at Madison—Br. Woolley at Bridgewater, and Br. T. J. Smith at Hamilton Centre.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. Whitney at Marshall as the friends may appoint—Br. Waggoner at Reusen—Br. Newell at Truxton—Br. C. B. Brown at Toronto, U. C., and the same week in Pickering and Whitby—Br. Sias at Henderson Point at 10, A. M., and at Stony Creek at 2, P. M.—Br. T. J. Whitcomb at Hamilton village—Br. Britton at Depauville, and at Lafargeville at 5, P. M.

Br. Queal will preach at Chicago, Ill., on the first and second Sundays in June next.

The Central Association of Universalists will meet at Madison village, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 1st and 2d days of June next.

The Niagara Association will meet at the Universalist church, at Ridgeway, Orleans county, on the first Wednesday of June next, which will be the first day of June, 1836, and continue in session two days.

It is desired that every society within its bounds send two delegates to represent them in said Association.

N. SAWYER, Standing Clerk.

The Western Reserve Association will meet at Windsor, Ashtabula county, Ohio, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 1st and 2d days of June next.

The Mohawk River Association will meet in Leyden, Lewis county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (8th and 9th) of June next.

NOTICE.....MICHIGAN CONFERENCE.

A general meeting of delegates from each society of Universalists, and one or more from each town or neighborhood where no society is organized, who are desirous of enjoying the benefit of preaching, in Michigan, is requested at Ann Arbor, on Wednesday, the 1st day of June next; to take into consideration the expediency of organizing an Association, and for adopting such measures as the best wisdom of the Council shall suggest, for the advancement of the cause of truth, and supplying, as far as possible, the loud and reiterated calls for preaching in this section of the Redeemer's moral vineyard. It is seriously hoped that this invitation will meet the promptest attention, and ready and vigorous co-operation of all the faithful in Michigan; and that a full representation from every part may be enjoyed. There is no restriction in the number of delegates to this meeting—we wish many: "In the multitude of counsellors is safety;" and we affectionately invite as many brethren to attend as can make it convenient, from every part of the territory. We presume that every ministering brother in Michigan will be on the ground; and we seriously and earnestly invite as many of the ministering brethren from other States, as can possibly make it convenient to meet with us; assuring them that their labors are abundantly needed. The meeting will continue two days. Two discourses, at least, each day, at 10 o'clock A. M., and at 2 P. M. The society will make the best arrangement they are able for the accommodation and comfort of visiting brethren. N. STACK.

COMETS AND ECLIPSES.

It is both interesting and gratifying to observe the universal care and foresight which pervade every object in nature. The celestial world bears, in its order and harmony, the signs of the wisdom and providence, as well as the sublime magnificence of its Maker. The class of larger terrestrial existences show in their conformation such perfect adjustment, and beautiful arrangement, and the microscopical objects whose mechanism optics have unveiled, such just proportion and delicate adaptation, that here, also, we see the tracings of the same power and wisdom which presided over the birth of the heavens.

This supervision of God over the universe, as well in its most minute as in its grandest scale, though rendered clear, bright and glorious, by the sun of modern science, still must have broken—perhaps with a misty, fitful light—on the darkness of the remotest antiquity. Its belief was the cause of many ancient superstitions, and was the soul of those fictions of mythology which breast every wave of time and opinion, till swept away by a more noble creed.

It produced a faith of no ordinary dignity—which led the historian to credit that the gods looked down with interest on human affairs; and which inspired the poet to introduce them in his song, as sympathizing with the virtuous love and the honorable ambition of man—a faith beautiful and excusable; for it sprung from a persuasion congenial with that which has raised to the Most High the temple of Natural Theology. It was a pellucid spring, gushing from a silver fountain, and then winding through the barren heaths of life. Though tainted by its impurities, and its passions, yet its course could be marked by the flowers of brighter hue, and sweeter perfume, blooming upon its banks.

To this same source, also, may be attributed the belief that the gods were willing to unfold, through their chosen oracles, the destiny of man, and the still more exalted idea that they occasionally manifested their approbation or anger by signs in the heavens. So agreeable is it to our vanity, so ennobling to our pride, to think ourselves objects of interest to the Deity, that when celestial phenomena occurred on the eye of some important event, surely it required little credulity to imagine the skies the face of Providence, whence beamed his look of pleasure, or darted his glance of disapprobation. We should reflect, too, that eclipses and comets were of no very frequent appearance, unknown to happen in the ordinary course of nature, and varying in their aspect. How natural for those about to engage in some mighty conflict, or commence some great enterprise—whose souls were thus raised by the prospect of action and glory to emotion, or elevated to enthusiasm—when the sun lost its wonted light—to sink to despondency, or when a comet streamed over the firmament, to be nerved to greater resolution, by the bright omen of success.

Two armies are brought up in battle array, one eager to contend for the honor of their prince—the other ready to risk their lives in protection of their homes and institutions. Cyaxares, confiding in the strength and discipline of his troops, proceeds to the encounter, and the conflict begins. As he advances, his soldiers clothed in armor of brass, meet the bristling pike of the Lydians. For a moment they are staggered, but these weapons are soon swept from the hands of the enemy, and a more deadly contest rages with the scimeter. The Medes falter and break; carnage rides through their ranks like a whirlwind, and Halyattes, the Lydian, rushes on to victory. But onward come the Median chariots, winged with death, mowing down the struggling soldier, breaking the array of the foe, and arresting them in the arms of triumph. The tide of battle is turned. High swell the notes of exultation—deep the cry of despair. Hush! Those shouts cease—those groans are smothered. The conqueror stops in his course—mingled horror and wonder seize the combatants. The affrighted seer raises his hand in adjuration to the skies, deprecating the divine wrath. The arm ready to strike, falls paralyzed with fear—the dying turn round in their last agonies to witness the miracle. Every eye is turned on high, and every hand points to the portentous phenomenon. Behold a veil is drawn slowly over the sun! An unearthly light illumines the scene. Man gazes on the countenance of his fellow, and shrinks back from its ghastly hue. Darkness follows, and either army retires from the field, filled with wonder and awe. The gods forbade the contest.

How beautiful to see a reliance upon the watchfulness, and a recognition of the sovereignty of the Creator, thus evincing their power, though erroneously, in remote antiquity—separating armies in the heat of battle, and checking the uplifted weapon of victory!

Eclipses, particularly when total, were ever regarded with terror, and considered as special interpositions. Ancient history shows a universal credence in this opinion. An account of one of these, is otherwise somewhat interesting, from its affording an instance of wit and presence of mind in a renowned captain. Agathocles, determining to carry the war into the realms of the enemy, sailed from Sicily for Africa, with a large army. At the moment of departure, the sun was eclipsed, which so daunted the spirit of his troops that they were irresolute whether or not to embark on the expedition. "An eclipse betokens change, and good fortune will desert Carthage," exclaimed the ready chief. Reassured, they sat out with good will, firmly confiding in the interpretation—nor did the result invalidate the prediction.

But Thales and his science gave a blow to this faith, and the calculation of eclipses, confirmed by their occurrence nearly at the time foretold, eventually struck a mighty link from the chain of superstition. Long after the knowledge of these calculations became prevalent among the intelligent, comets, rarely of a size to attract attention, occasionally varying in appearance, so that no connexion between their successive returns could be established with facility, were still watched with curiosity and consternation.

When important events occupy our whole thought, how easy to connect with them every incident! Hence a comet, which appeared at the time, was said to have announced the death of Julius Cæsar; another, which at this day, presents one of the proudest triumphs of science, the birth of Mithridates, and one in 1305, the great plague. Indeed, all which have been observed even to a very modern date, have been viewed in the same light.

We have mentioned the probable origin of this feeling; and cannot wonder, therefore, that one so much in accordance with the other opinions of the ancients, should have been generally disseminated. It was the natural result of the ambition of the imagination to explain facts, when Philosophy faltered and Science confessed her ignorance. Nor did Christianity dispel it. Taught to expect a day when the heavens would be rolled together as a scroll, and to look for the advent of the Messiah in celestial signs, the early Christians had nothing in their creed to estrange them from this belief. As the corruptions of the church crept into existence, and increased in magnitude; as the pictorial grandeur of the Greek and the gorgeous ceremonies of the Roman worship reduced religion to a pomp, and the Christian to a blind bigot, the priest sought gladly to magnify his power, by appeals to fear and ignorance. When unlettered cardinals condemned the Father of Astronomy to torture and a prison, because he did not believe that the proposition that the sun is in the centre of the world, and immovable from its place, is absurd, philosophically false, and formally heretical, because it is expressly contrary to the Scriptures, we can easily imagine that priestcraft would eagerly grasp at every instrument, artificial or natural, to strengthen its power and perpetuate its tyranny. Accordingly in the eleventh century it became a prevalent idea that the end of the world was approaching. It was usual to begin charters with "As the world is now drawing to its close;" and one of Otto's armies on the happening of an eclipse, actually thought the last day had come, and laid down their arms and dispersed.

Time passed on. The fires were lighted on the altars of knowledge and philosophy, and thought was unshackled by the reformation. And yet we hear an author, otherwise intelligent, remarking of the comet of 1410, that "it was like a two edged sword, and portended many mischiefs and calamities that happened both in the East and West." Another, noticing the death of Mr. Cotton, in 1652, mentions a comet, which about that time disappeared—"it being a very signal testimony, that God had then removed a bright star, a burning and shining light out of the heaven of his church here, into glory above."

Another century elapsed, rich in astronomical biography. Cassini, Halley and Newton, succeeded Kepler and Galileo. Strong philosophic minds examined these objects of terror, through the medium of a more perfect practical astronomy; they were investigated by the scrutiny of a close observation and comparison, by the keen glance, penetrating sagacity, and grasping thought of genius, till at last with hardly sufficient premises to justify the conclusion, the return of the comet of 1682 was predicted. Nearly seventy-six years afterward, and the prediction was fulfilled.

What a proud era in the history of humanity! Not because we can penetrate into the mechanism of the heavens, and explain its laws; not because we can wing our flight beyond earth, and feel that distance is no barrier to intellect: No! But because unaided, self-moved, and self-sustained, we have swept over the long established chimeras of the imagination. They were the birth of our nature, perverted by ignorance. From the bosom of that nature, nursed by science, comes a brighter spirit, which ends the reign of delusion. Hence arises the great and enduring glory of these discoveries. We exult in them because they are witnesses that nothing mean and ignoble can stand before the sure and onward course of the mind, when left to its own impulses and aspirations.

These triumphs of study and of knowledge tell us of progression—the influence of the intellectual over the destiny of the moral man. They are testimonies that science is an atmosphere of oxygen, in which bigotry becomes purified, error corrected, superstition enlightened, and thought burns purer and brighter. Soaring in this element, we can look back upon the past, separate the light of truth from the baneful exhalations of ignorance, and advance to the future, clothed in the paropy of experience.

It is not with a vain glory we should exult in this elevation. Abstractly considered these discoveries are of little value. Their only use is human improvement. Contemplated in any other view, they are robbed of their halo. As falls a monarch, when tyrannizing over a free people, so knowledge, misdirected to unworthy ends, and unproductive of utility, stands stripped of its glory and its crown—an inanimate statue.

And one great utility is in the reflection, that wrong opinions, though ever so strongly based, must perish. With the diffusion of this belief, imposture will become rare, theories will be cautiously scanned before adoption, and we can glide down the stream of time, satisfied that man will eventually be disentangled from every false faith, and erect the proud monuments of his progression upon their ruins. From such rich fields of contemplation, we rise wiser and better; we see the small opaque bubble of human life slowly expand into transparent beauty, and we feel assured that it will at last, buoyant and elastic, increasing in brightness, and decked with a thousand hues, float upward into a purer atmosphere.

DEATHS.

At Saratoga Springs, on the 17th of March last, of a lingering consumption, which for a number of years had gradually been wasting away her natural powers: Mrs. SALLY HULING, consort of Mr. Salmon Huling, aged 48 years. Long and familiarly have we known the amiable subject of this notice. The history of her former faith and conversion to Universalism is truly given in an article entitled "Narrative; Prejudice is strong but the love of God is stronger," originally published in the Evangelical Magazine (old series) in 1828, and since then republished in the Christian Visitor and several other Universalist periodicals. She was the "Mrs. H." there mentioned. And most worthily and faithfully has she exemplified the character there given her for the last eleven years of her life. The glorious doctrine of a world's salvation through a crucified Redeemer was her joy and consolation in life, her solace and triumph in death. She longed for the hour of her dissolution to come, and when it arrived she sweetly fell asleep in Jesus without a struggle or a groan, and went home to her Father and her God. She has left behind her a fond husband, a large family of children and a numerous circle of relatives and friends who will long, and dearly and gratefully cherish her memory. May the consolations of the Gospel be richly theirs. "Let me die the death of the righteous; and let my last end be like hers."—D. S.

BRIEF CRITICISMS.....No. IV.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit: by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which sometime were disobedient when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved by water." 1 Peter iii: 18-20.

This passage has long been a fruitful subject of comment. Various renderings have been exhibited, and many speculations and criticisms elicited. Upon a passage confessedly dark and obscure, and in the interpretation of which the most eminent commentators have failed to coincide, I have not the vanity to imagine I can throw much, if any, light. Nevertheless, it having been with me a subject of some reflection, "I also will show mine opinion."

To my apprehension, one cause why this passage is misunderstood, is, that commentators and readers generally have attached more importance to it, than it would seem to demand. It appears to be viewed by many, as a sentence formally introduced by the apostle, to assert or substantiate some important doctrine in the Christian system of faith. This supposition, to me, appears extremely erroneous. It is very evident that Christ's preaching to "the spirits in prison," is not the main subject of Peter's remarks; but is introduced incidentally, as a kind of episode, to carry out and complete the thought then in his mind. His principal topic in this whole connexion, is an exhortation to his fellow-Christians, to live in the spirit of the Gospel, virtuously and peaceably with all men, and to submit without recrimination or revenge, to the persecutions of their enemies. He instructs them, (verse 17,) that "it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well-doing, than for evil-doing." And to encourage them in "well-doing," even though they suffer for it, he turns aside from the main subject, for a moment, and adverts to their Master, who suffered only for doing good. As an example for them to bear up under sufferings, he says—"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit: by which also"—By what? The Spirit which quickened his body after his crucifixion? No: The relative pronoun "which," refers more consistently for its antecedent, to that implied benevolent principle which actuated Christ to suffer, "the just for the unjust," than to the "spirit" by which he was raised from the dead. In verse 18, the apostle reminds his brethren that Jesus had suffered for well-doing—he, the just, had suffered for the unjust. And in verse 19, he continues the same thought, and declares that by the influence of the same principle which actuated Christ to suffer for the unjust, for well-doing—he "also went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which sometime were disobedient," etc. In mentioning that Noah was saved by water, (verse 20,) the apostle's mind reverted to baptism, and from this to the ascension of the Saviour—by which the digression is continued to the close of the chapter. But at the commencement of the 4th chapter, he resumes and continues the thread of his exhortation, which he had partially dropped at verse 17 of the preceding chapter—"Forasmuch, then, as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind," etc.

It is not my design, in this article, to examine the whole ground covered by this controverted subject. I am satisfied with the usual interpretation, so far as it maintains that by "spirits in prison," Peter represented a class of people then in existence upon earth—or as Wakefield renders it—"the minds of men in prison." But I must dissent from the opinion of those who suppose that these "spirits in prison," were the Gentiles.* To my view, the weight of evidence preponderates in favor of the idea which I now venture to suggest, that the Jews of the days of the Saviour, were the spirits in prison, referred to by the apostle. The mistake upon this point, seems to have arisen from the supposition, that Christ did not preach to "the spirits in prison," until after his resurrection, when he commanded his disciples to go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. The passage does not necessarily support this conclusion. The simple circumstance, that the apostle does not mention the preaching to the spirits in prison, until after referring to the death and resurrection of Christ, is not satisfactory to me, that Jesus did not so preach until subsequent to these events. Peter, in verse 19, does not specify the time when Christ preached to the spirits in prison, but rather asserts the fact, that actuated by the same principle of benevolence, which induced him to suffer "for the unjust," he also preached to the spirits in prison—as I have above attempted to show. He mentions the death of the Saviour, to indicate how he suffered "for the unjust;" and the resurrection is glanced at, merely as a circumstance intimately connected with his death, which it is important the Christian should not forget, but nowise indicating the time of his preaching, or the persons to whom he preached. By adopting the supposition that the Jews were the spirits in prison, we avoid resorting to far-fetched arguments to prove, on the one hand, that Christ preached to condemned spirits in an intermediate world, or, on the other hand, that the apostle referred to his preaching by proxy to the Gentiles.

That the Gentiles were prisoners, or "men with minds in prison," is undoubtedly true in many respects. But that the Jews in the days of the Redeemer, were still more so—were emphatically "spirits in prison"—is to my mind, very evident. To the Jews, the Saviour directed all his teachings—he preached to them in person—and in their presence he performed his wonderful miracles. But of what avail to them were all his exertions? They heeded not the evidences of his divine mission, and indignantly rejected their Messiah. They were bound by deep-seated prejudice; and walls of granite could not have made them more truly prisoners, than did their superstition and ignorance. Jesus, on a certain occasion, declared—"In them [the Jews] is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, by hearing ye shall hear, and not understand; and seeing, ye shall see, and shall not perceive." Why did they hear and not understand? Because they were a people "with minds in prison." On another occasion he entered a Jewish synagogue, and took the book of the prophet of Esaias, and "found the place where it is written: The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives.—And he began to say unto them, this day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears"—This day in fulfilment of prophecy, do I, your Messiah, "preach deliverance" to you, Jews, who are "captives," etc. In this passage we not only learn that the Jews were captives, prisoners; but that previous to his death, the Saviour preached to these "captives," these "spirits in prison," or "men with minds in prison"! And the Jews are still "spirits in prison." While the civilized world has embraced the religion of Jesus Christ, and acknowledged him as the Redeemer, the Jews continue to reject him. They are still captives, still prisoners to their prejudice and superstition, and will so remain until the great day of deliverance—"for blindness in part is happened unto Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in"—and then the "spirits in prison" shall be delivered with acclamations—"and so all Israel shall be saved!" Why the Deity has involved his ancient people in this blindness and captivity, we know not; but that in the days of the Saviour, they were emphatically "spirits in prison," and that they continue so to the present time, must be evident to the most superficial observer.

Wakefield's translation of this passage, probably conveys the meaning of the apostle more fully than the common version. He introduces, very properly, the conjunction "as"—"By which also, he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which sometime were disobedient, as when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah," etc. This renders the passage perfect and clear, and leads to a ready understanding of it. The 19th and 20th verses are thus thrown into an antithesis or comparison—the condition of "the spirits in prison," or the people whose minds are in prison, to whom Christ preached, is compared to that of the antediluvians in the days of Noah. This renders the reference to "the days of Noah," in the 20th verse, perfectly intelligible; but without this comparison, it is involved in mystery, and we cannot conceive why the apostle should have introduced that verse at all. By following out this comparison, it will readily be discovered who were "the spirits in prison." Was the condition of the Gentiles in the days of Christ, a proper antithesis to that of the antediluvians immediately before the flood? Not at all; the comparison will hardly hold good in one particular. But I think it can be made evident that there was a striking similarity in the situation of the Jews to whom Jesus preached, and that of the antediluvians, who existed in the days of Noah. The antediluvians had become very sinful and debased—had sunk to the lowest depths of iniquity and corruption. This compares perfectly with the condition of the Jews, when their Messiah came among them. They disregarded the commandments of God—they violated the injunctions of their law—they converted their religion into a cloak beneath which they practiced every species of fraud, extortion, cruelty and lust—yea, so great was their wickedness that Jesus denounced them as a "generation of serpents and vipers." Noah called upon the antediluvians to refrain from their evil works, to repent and turn to God, or their accumulated sins would receive the severest punishment—hence he is termed by Peter, "a preacher of righteousness." In like manner, Jesus depicted to the Jews, their manifold iniquities, and exhorted them to flee "the wrath to come." Again—Noah preached to the antediluvians immediately preceding one of the most awful calamities that ever visited the earth. So Christ preached to the Jews, "the spirits in prison," shortly before the most afflictive national evil, that ever has or can come upon a people. And once more: Noah depicted to the antediluvians, the nature of the judgment impending over them, and the suddenness with which it should come upon them; but they heeded him not, but continued "eating and drinking, and marrying and giving in marriage" until the flood overwhelmed them. Thus, likewise, did the Saviour. He portrayed to the Jews the calamities which would soon overtake them—he declared that their house should be left unto them desolate—of their temple, not one stone should be left upon another, and that the fire, the sword, and the pestilence should destroy them. But they turned a deaf ear to all his forewarnings; yea, they rejected and crucified him, whose only crime was a desire to benefit them.

* See "Expositor and Universalist Review," May, 1833, p. 159, where a labored effort is made to support this supposition. Also Trumpet, March 5, 1836.

This comparison might be pursued to a greater length, if it were necessary; but space will not allow. It will be perceived that the similarity is sufficient to justify the apostle in comparing the time when Christ preached to the "spirits in prison," to "the days of Noah;" and that the comparison will hold good, only when applied to the Jews in the days of the Saviour—thus clearly indicating, not only that Christ personally preached to the "spirits in prison," before his death; but that the Jews were these imprisoned spirits.

In taking this view of the subject, I am necessarily compelled to differ from those writers in the Expositor and the Trumpet, [see note,] who suppose, that in the passage under consideration, "Peter's meaning was, that by the death and resurrection of Christ, the door was opened for the Gospel to be preached to the Gentiles." I cannot perceive that the apostle had any reference to the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles. But the subject of the "spirits in prison," is incidentally introduced, to illustrate the fact, the time, and the manner that Christ "suffered for well-doing"—"suffered, the just for the unjust." These remarks are submitted to the candid consideration of the reader.

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.....No. II.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

"It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man."

As God is possessed of every possible perfection we can trust in him with more safety than we can confide in our fellow-beings. Even finite love would secure the happiness of its objects, if it had the power, but this it does not always possess. The mother's love for her child would induce her to remove the malady which racks its tender frame, but power is wanting. In the divine Being this is not deficient, for nothing can be taken from or added to infinity.

God cannot act contrary to his nature, neither can his power move contrary to the directions of his love; therefore, as his love desires the happiness of all, his power must be exercised for this purpose till it is accomplished.

The attribute which is generally considered hostile to love, is justice. Divine justice is represented as being altogether unmerciful and vindictive. If we allow that the justice of God possesses this property, it will follow that love and justice are opposed to each others demands. But no person on calm reflection will make this admission, for it ascribes imperfection and even sin to the divine nature, since justice and mercy would be transgressing each others laws.

What is the requirement of justice? "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." That this is the demand of justice, none will deny. By comparison it will be found that love requires the same. The love of the parent requires that of the child in return, and nothing will answer as a substitute.

We are necessarily inclined to love some objects and to hate others. And would it not be unreasonable to require us to love that which is not truly lovely in its nature? We are required to love God and trust in him because he is lovely and worthy of our confidence. Love and justice both unite in this requirement, because the object of our love is not beyond our interest. The exercise of love is conducive to our happiness, for no benefit can result to the divine Being from our love to him.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CHARACTER OF GOD.

Christ said to his disciples, "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, and do good to them that hate you, that ye may be like your Father which is in heaven." Allow me to ask all who profess faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, do you believe his words? Do you believe this to be the character of your heavenly Father—that he loves his enemies? or do you ascribe to the great Eternal, the character of the publican and sinner, who love their friends, but hate their enemies? Methinks I hear you say, I know God loves sinners now, and sent his Son into the world to suffer for them, and to open a door whereby he might exercise his mercy toward them if they would come unto him. But they will not. Therefore his love will be turned into hatred, and he will come in wrath and fierce indignation against the sinner, and appoint him his portion in never-ending woe. But stop, dear reader, stop for one moment, and reflect on the character and attributes of Deity. And let that be the foundation of your religious faith; build upon it, and embrace no sentiments but such as are in unison therewith. And then you will be firm and unshaken, although the fierce winds of adverse doctrines may assail you, and the floods of fanaticism and superstition beat upon you, you cannot fall, for you are founded upon a rock.

But let us examine the Scriptures. Do they not teach us that God is infinite in power, in wisdom, and in goodness—that he is so powerful that none can frustrate his designs? For he hath said, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." And again he says, "My word shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." And again, "For the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it; and his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?"

He is also infinite in knowledge, and needs not to be informed of any thing which he did not perfectly know, from before the creation of man, or even before the worlds were framed. And the apostle, in his view of the fulness of the knowledge of God, cries out in this language, "O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory forever."

Is he not likewise infinite in goodness? O yes, the apostle says, "God is love." And in this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins"—"and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." "And who shall separate us from the love of Christ? For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Seeing, then, that the sacred Scriptures, together with reason and the universal nature of things, all unite in one three-fold declaration, that there is an infinite, eternal and unchangeable God, who rules in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. "Ah, yes," says the reader, "and he is a God of justice too." So he is. I fully and cheerfully agree with you, for if he was not just, he could not be good. Is it not good to be just? and is it not just to be merciful? Yes, reader, and it is both good and just for God to love the works of his own hands, and to exercise his mercy towards the creatures of his power. See, then, how the attributes and principles of his nature all harmonize! Do you think, reader, that God possesses principles which are adverse one to the other?—that when he exercises one principle of his nature, it is at variance with the other principles of his nature? O, no, that cannot be; for then he would be eternally at war with himself. Let me repeat again, that cannot be. There is a glorious harmony in his nature, and whatever his goodness purposes, he has wisdom to devise, and power also to perform.

We have already seen that God is love, and that he loves his enemies, or sinners. "But," says the objector, "can he who is perfectly holy, love a sinner?" Yes, he loves sinners, but hates sin, and cannot look upon it with the least approbation. If, then, God loves the sinner now, will he not eternally love him? Yes, for when he created man he could, with one glance, look through time and eternity, and behold with perfect knowledge every act that he would commit, being all present with him, even as this moment is present with us, and who cannot possibly be informed of anything which he did not then fully know. Then, let me ask again, if he ever loved the sinner will he not eternally love him? Most certainly he will. If not, there must some change take place in himself, which cannot be. If God was like man—poor, weak, feeble man, who through want of knowledge is liable to be deceived by his fellow-creatures, and who, when he is rightly informed of the truth, changes in his feelings and disposition towards them—if this were the case, I say, then might he love the sinner at one time and hate him at another. But he has said, O man, for your consideration, "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."

Now, dear readers, apply this subject to your own hearts; you who are fathers and mothers, look around upon your little family circle—you see some of your children growing up in the paths of virtue and happiness; you see others of them, whose inclination leads them to pursue a vicious course. You advise and admonish your wayward child, but it grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength. You behold this with sorrow; you most affectionately love your child, but you hate and detest the evil propensities and habits which are gaining the ascendancy over him. Now this does not lessen your regard for him—not in the least; but on the contrary, you look upon him with a love of pity which you cannot describe. You use the rod of chastisement, but you do it not in anger nor in revenge; you do it with the most tender solicitude for the welfare of your child. In short, you do every thing that lies within your power in hopes of reforming him, but alas, he goes on heedless of your efforts, until he is engulfed in the vortex of sin and the most abject misery. Ah, how would your bowels of undiminished love and pity yearn over him, and would you not cry out in the bitter anguish of your heart, "Oh, my child, my child, my love for you is great beyond expression; but alas, my power is limited, and I cannot perform that which my love for you so ardently desires to do!" Would not this be the language of every good parent's heart? I think it would. Then allow me to ask, do you not think our heavenly Father, who has infinitely greater love for his children than you can possibly have for yours—ah, yes, whose very nature is love, even to his enemies, and who possesses power to accomplish all which his goodness dictates—do you not think, I say, that he will do as much for his children as you would do for yours, if you possessed the power? Will he not, in his own good time, finally call in all his wandering sons and daughters into the great fold, and have but one fold and one shepherd? I am authorized by the word of God to answer, yes; for he has said he would finish transgression, and make an end of sin, make reconciliation for iniquity, and bring in everlasting righteousness. We also have the promise, that the devil, who is the author of sin, is to be destroyed. Heb. ii: 14, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he (Christ) also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him."
